In the age in which we live, in a civilized country, fully constituted, we are told that the means to save the life of a man are not to be pointed out! The law of protection says, in its fourteenth article, (which was read,) and this was what the judge did, and the governor violated the constitution in consummating the executions, which were neither more nor less than assassinations.

I have demonstrated that the counsel for the defense has shown little ability in seeking to throw the responsibility upon the political prefect, and it is so because the responsibility rests on the governor.

It has attempted to be maintained that the law in question was the result of the situation, and that it was only issued against bandits; it has been asserted that it was given to assure guarantees; but it has been forgotten that the guarantees of society are composed of the union of the guarantees of individuals, and that executions like these terrify a society where lynch-law is unknown.

That law is a remnant of the barbarism which exists in the United States; because, unfortunately for humanity, in the country which appears to be the most civilized, there still remain remnants of barbarism. Lynch-law, which, for the honor of the jury, should not be invoked here, is an abuse which is committed when it is thought that the judge delays the punishment of the delinquent. Then the masses rise and attack prisons, and incendiarism and death are the consequences of that stupid law.

No! let it be said, in honor of our country, the Mexican people never will precipitate themselves into such excesses, or commit such assassinations.

It has been said that the victims of the 24th of February were wretched criminals. It is not noble to insult the dead, and we do not even know whether those unfortunate beings were kidnappers or not. They entered the prison without their crime having been stated, and it is thus recorded in the books of the alcalde. On what principles were they condemned?

The constitution prohibits the suspension of the guarantees which assure the life of man; the law for punishing bandits and disturbers of the public peace has respected that guarantee; and those who, like myself, seek for the abolition of the penalty of death, can scarcely tolerate an execution being carried into effect, even after the tutelary forms of legislation have been complied with, and our blood boils against assassinations such as those perpetrated in Guadalajara.

But it is said that the circumstances exacted the publication of the law and its fulfillment, and that the alarm which existed in that State ceased with the action of that sanguinary measure. It is not true. Before and after the promulgation of that decree, up to the present moment, I have received papers and letters from Jalisco, and there is not one of them which does not speak of robberies, kidnappings, and assassinations. This contradicts in the most solemn manner the abused and calumnious rumor that the malefactors had become more bold as soon as they knew that congress was trying the governor Gomez Cuervo for the acts of the 24th of February, and that calumny, gentlemen of the jury, I contradict in the name of the nation.

Appeal is made to the circumstances; and what circumstances can there be more grave than those wherein the life of a man is endangered? It has been said that the judge applied too late. The judge acted when they called him, and earnestly endeavored to do his duty, as in the proceedings it will be seen that orders were issued at five and five minutes after five in the morning.

The governor exculpates himself by saying that he had not condemned the culprits; this answer is like Cain's, when God asked him, What hast thou done with thy brother? Señor Gomez has said that those men kept society in a state of alarm, and that if they had not been executed the people would have risen. It is not true that they would have revolted; they would have submitted to the law.

What order of a State is this, and what city, that could not consider themselves safe until five men should have perished? -

It has been sought to make a charge against the federal authority for its conduct, and it is being endeavored to justify an authority which is the one to be blamed for the insecurity existing. It is insisted that the malefactors have been reanimated by the news of this trial. It may be that no band of robbers know that we are trying Señor Gomez Cuervo.

It has been said that the people do not comprehend their rights, and that there are vacuums in the laws. The people do comprehend their rights; and if there be any vacuums in the laws we must fill them legally.

It is said that public convenience demands the absolution of the accused. This is immoral, above all, when treating of judges of the fact. We have to act with justice, and without any personal consideration. Were we not to do so, society could not exist.

It is to be determined whether the constitution and the law of federal protection have been violated.

Agreed upon that fact, we have to vote against that delinquency. Public convenience, which I shall not invoke, requires that, convinced of the culpability of the accused, we shall condemn him.

The day when the people see that a governor, or other public functionaries, fall legally, on that day will be assured the great principles of the republic.

I beseech the jury that, looking at the question in the light of justice, the governor of Jalisco be declared guilty.

Mr. Zarco resumed the chair as presiding officer.

SPEECH OF MR. SANCHEZ RAMON AGAINST THE ACCUSATION.

[From the Siglo XIX, Mexico, May 30, 1868.]

Mr. SANCHEZ RAMON. Sir, I know my incapacity, and it would make me abstain from speaking, did not the present question involve an event the resolution of which may contribute in a great measure to the well-being or otherwise of the State of Jalisco; and if I resolve on speaking, it is because I think it just, since I am in duty bound to do so as one of the representatives of that State.

The governor of a great State has at last been brought to the bar of the accused, before the grand jury of the nation. The accusation against him on this occasion, as on others, is nothing more than a means invoked for depriving him of the post to which he was elevated by an immense majority of the inhabitants of Jalisco. The present question has nothing new in it; it is the same that has been already presented on other occasions to congress under different forms, but the same ends have always been sought by the persons who accuse him.

In Jalisco, more than in other States, it has unfortunately been seen that some of its sons, legally defeated in electoral contests, forgetting or disregarding sound republican maxims, have not been willing to rest satisfied, and, without regarding the desolating and bloody past, without taking into account the future of the country, by their discontent have become the sworn enemies of the government, encouraging disunion and discord, putting obstacles in the way of the administration, and seeking to make impracticable even the measures necessary for the preservation of order and of peace—only to make unpopular and displace the elected of the people.

If a frank, reasonable, and just opposition is convenient and useful, a violent, passionate, and unjustifiable opposition cannot but produce evils, and evils of incalculable transcendancy.

The accusation which to-day, invested with an appearance of decorum, dignity, and respect to our fundamental law, occupies the attention of the grand jury, is nothing more than a political proceeding, better combined and better directed than the other steps that have previously been taken for the same purpose—that of removing from his post the man elected by the people.

That is, in reality, the question, and not one of true constitutional right, which animates the promoters; for in their place not only would they have acted in the same manner that the governor has acted, but they would even have gone further, as Jalisco has had examples when those who act to-day as accusers held office or had great influence with the government.

All the members of the jury know the afflicted situation of Jalisco when its legislature declared the circular of the 12th March to be in force, as, besides the news which through distinct channels was at that time brought to the capital, the exact account of it made by the defender of the accused has just been heard. Nevertheless, permit me to state that those circumstances were so critical, on account of the kidnappings, as was reported by the press—and I have letters in my possession proving the same—that the idea occurred to many citizens, if the authorities did not take extraordinary and energetic measures for re-establishing guarantees, of putting into practice the terrible lynch-law, which, besides being discreditable, would have brought the government into many serious difficulties. The government had the cry of the opposition against it; it saw that the measures it took were insufficient to put an end to the evil, or even for calming it. The citizens who were kidnapped, when, after having sacrificed their means, they were returned to society, frightened and cowed, did not dare to make any revelations to the authorities, the same thing happening as here, that the few who have met with that misfortune refuse to afford the information necessary for guiding the police, in order that they may apprehend these evil-doers—and all through the well-founded fear that a speedy and severe punishment would not be applied to them.

It is also known that the population of Guadalajara, tired with suffering, presented itself before the legislature to ask for the law, which at last it conceded, viz., that the above-mentioned circular should be declared in force, which law, if not similar, is very like that of the 3d of June, 1861, which, as I have manifested to congress, is the law in force against kidnappers. Five of these were apprehended and tried in accordance with said circular, who, on conviction and after confessing their horrible crime of kidnapping, were condemned to expiate their crimes on the scaffold.

A few moments before their execution it was sought to protect them through the federal authority, but, instead of addressing the proper officer, the application was made to the governor, and it is known why, after all, the protection was not verified. In those circumstances it was fortunate, because, if the kidnappers had been shielded, Guadalajara and the whole of Jalisco would have remained unprotected, as the adjoining States, with laws similar to the one that was put in practice in Guadalajara, freed themselves from that plague without being impeded by federal authorities, such as those in Jalisco, who, overzealous for guarantees in favor of kidnappers, were indifferent about guarantees for society at large.

The former insecurity would have become greater, because the bandits, emboldened by the kind of protection they found in the opposition, instead of flying terrified after escaping being caught by the police, would have joined with others of the neighboring States and have returned with fresh vigor to give full effect to their infernal plans.

The government maintained itself firm in the idea of saving society, and society has shown its gratitude by a multitude of manifestations which it has addressed to it; and this is what has given rise to the accusation which now engages the attention of the grand jury.

Are not kidnappers deprived of their constitutional guarantees which it was thought was inculcated by trying them in conformity with the law declared to be in force by the legislature of the State?

If the law of 3d of June, 1861, is the one in force, and if, according to that law, they are to be tried in conformity with certain articles of the law of 25th January, I cannot see how the constitution can be infringed. But if the exigencies of the critical and exceptional circumstances in which Jalisco was placed did not allow the governor to act otherwise than as he did; if the guarantees consigned in our code are any of them, or have been, suspended with respect to kidnappers, the inculpability of the governor of Jalisco, as regards the charges brought against him, it appears to me is evident.

But supposing that what I have said is of no value, can the grand jury declare the party accused culpable for having fulfilled his duty towards his immediate superior, the legislature, for whom he acts, the responsibility resting only on one party, and the one cannot be punished and the other left unpunished? It is clear that this is not so; and this alone is sufficient that the jury should give their vote against the accusation.

With respect to the feeling which may be entertained on account of the decree No. 88 of the legislature of Jalisco, which, as it has just been seen, is a very distinct thing, I will say that now the legislature is entirely distinct from Señor Gomez Cuervo, and that he respected the supreme measures of the congress, as his own defender has shown; and I hope, from the rectitude and good sense of which the members of the grand national jury have given proofs, that neither this occurrence, nor influences of any kind, will lead them to deviate from the right path traced out by justice for the well-being of society.

I must add that it appears just that the governments of the States should possess more liberty in providing for their internal preservation in critical cases, without having to apply to the general government; for if the federation is to be desired, it is not because it signifies a band of iron that restrains them so that they cannot move, even although the social edifice may fall and involve them in its ruins.

What is to be regretted is that, there being a determined mode of initiating these reforms in our code, another of an irregular course should be appealed to, such as that the supreme court of justice should open the respective trial in the controversy brought on by the decree No. 88, to which I allude.

Sir, these spontaneous manifestations of the people of Jalisco which have reached the grand jury show very clearly what the question is. In their name I ask, in behalf of the well-being of those people, a vote of absolution for their constitutional governor, Antonio Gomez Cuervo.

OFFICIAL CONGRESSIONAL REPORT.—SESSION OF THE 23TH OF MAY, 1868.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, June 29, 1868.—Translation.]

In the city of Mexico, on the 28th day of May, 1868, the congress of the Union being erected in grand jury for the continuation of the trial commenced against the governor of Jalisco, citizen Antonio Gomez Cuervo, in conformity with the resolution adopted on the 9th instant, the secretary read articles 141 to 156, inclusive, of the rules; and, in compliance therewith, the secretary of the section read in full the proceso verbal relative to the accusation which the citizens deputies Robles, Martinez, Moreno, Silviano, and Angulo have made against that functionary for abuse of authority and violation of articles 20, 101, and 112 of the constitution, and of the law of the 30th of November, 1861.

Account was also taken of the representations addressed to congress in defense of the said citizen by the municipal authorities of Autlan, Lagos de Moreno, Tepetitlan, Teuchitlan, Guadalajara, of the city of Sayula, and of the residents of Lagos, Alotnilco el Alto, Tepetitlan, and the reform club of Guadalajara.

In continuation, the report of the section was read, which concludes with the following proposition:

"It is declared that the citizen Antonio Gomez Cuervo, governor of the State of Jalisco, is guilty of violation of the general law of the 30th of November, 1861, and of the constitution."

The secretary of the section concluded by reading two communications, addressed by the accused—the first relative to his defense, and the second in which he names as his defender the citizen Lancaster Jones and asks to be excused from attendance on account of illness.

The said citizen read the defense, and the reading of the resolution proposed in the report having been repeated, it was placed in discussion.

The speakers against the report were MESSRS. Samonan, Canedo, Rodriguez, Ramon, and Gudiñow y Gomez; and in favor, MESSRS. Jesus Lopez, Barron, Frias y Soto, Zarco, and Sanchez Azcona.

The report having been sufficiently discussed, the question was put if it should be approved. The secretary, at the request of citizen D. Rosas, read article 105 of the constitution.

The vote, having been taken, resulted for the affirmative—108 votes against 24 in the negative; and in consequence the proceedings were ordered to be passed to the supreme court of justice for the constitutional effects. [The declaration of the sentence, the governor, meanwhile, as the effect of the action of the congress, being suspended from his office.]

No. 156.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, July 7, 1868.

SIR: On the 2d instant a special courier, dispatched by the foreign merchants of Mazatlan, reached here, bringing communications addressed to me by the United States commercial agent, the English vice-consul, and the consul of Prussia at that port, relating to difficulties which have arisen between the commander of her Britannic Majesty's ship Chanticleer, lying in that harbor, and the Mexican authorities.

These difficulties, it was stated, have reached so serious a stage that a blockade of the port had been established, and the commander of the Chanticleer had announced his intention to bombard the town; but upon the representations of the foreign consuls and merchants was induced to suspend this latter purpose, unless further provocation should be offered, until he had communicated with the British admiral on that coast, and the matter had been brought to the knowledge of the Mexican government.

The agitation and alarm among the foreign residents in Mazatlan, in view of these events, were represented to be extreme; and while commerce was already affected by the blockade, it was feared that General Corona, the chief military representative of the Mexican government in that part of the republic, in the event of hostilities being opened, would abandon his quarters in the city, and the town being left unprotected, the lives and property of the foreign residents would be in imminent danger.

At the request of Mr. Woolrich, the British vice-consul, made in anticipation of his having immediately to leave Mazatlan, the consul of Prussia inclosed to me a copy of the correspondence that had taken place between the commander of the Chanticleer and General Corona, which had had this unfortunate result, and I was requested, as the representative of a friendly nation, to lay the same before the Mexican government, and my good offices were appealed to towards bringing about a peaceable and satisfactory settlement of the affair, that thereby the destruction of life and property might be averted.

Under these circumstances it did not appear to me to be possible to hesitate about doing all that I could, without overstepping the limits of what is due to this government, to promote a prompt and pacific solution of the difficulty that has so unfortunately arisen.

I therefore had immediate interviews with the acting minister for foreign affairs, and with the President, and on the same day addressed to the government a note inclosing the correspondence that had been transmitted to me, and commending to its attention the gravity of the case therein presented.

I also inclosed to the government a copy of the notice of blockade officially communicated to the commercial agent of the United States at Mazatlan, and of two letters addressed by him to the commander of the Chanticleer, seeking an adjustment of the difficulties, and at least to avert the bombardment of the town.

A reply to my note was not made until the evening of Sunday, the 5th instant, when there was inclosed to me from the department of foreign affairs a copy of the orders that had been issued by the government to General Corona, containing its resolutions with regard to this serious affair.

The couriers bearing these orders of the government, and my own dispatches in reply to the several consular agents who had addressed me, left for Mazatlan at noon on Monday, the 6th instant.

I have now the honor to transmit to the department herewith the correspondence that I have had upon this subject, and respectfully submit my action in the premises, trusting it may meet with the approval of my government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Fuhrken to Mr. Plumb.

PRUSSIAN CONSULATE,
Porto de Mazatlan, June 22, 1868.

SIR: At the request of Mr. Woolrich, her Britannic Majesty's vice-consul, I beg to hand you the copy of a correspondence between the commander of her Majesty's ship Chanticleer and General Corona. Mr. Woolrich has to leave Mazatlan on account of this same correspondence, and cannot write himself.

You will learn by these documents the difficulties, and out of what they arose. The right of the captain to resent the insult seems to me to be beyond question; the answer of General Corona, pretending perfect ignorance of international laws, is ridiculous. He could have referred the first case to Mexico, and given full satisfaction for the insults received. He has privately recognized the captain's right, and even offered the captain to obtain private satisfaction for him from the offender. Captain Bridges has blockaded our harbor since the 20th, and at 12 o'clock to-day will open fire on the public buildings. The town is in great consternation, and as General Corona will abandon his quarters and leave us to the fury of the mob, there is imminent danger for our lives and property.

Mr. Sisson and myself have directed a communication to the captain (not answered yet) requesting him to suspend the bombardment until he may have the necessary force to attack and defend; he can consult with the admiral, and if necessary, await reinforcements. In the meanwhile Mr. Woolrich requests you, as the representative of a friendly nation, to lay these documents before the Mexican government, and to obtain for the British flag the satisfaction so unjustly denied by the authorities of Sinaloa.

The Mexican government does but an act of justice, and all the foreign population will be grateful for your influence, as you save us from heavy losses in our commerce, and prevent the destruction of lives and property.

Mr. Woolrich will report to the foreign office, and in the name of his government anticipates his sincere thanks for your valuable services, which may, perhaps, prevent a serious international complication.

I beg to add an open letter for Mr. Valarta, minister de gobernacion, and hope he will assist you in obtaining a satisfactory answer from the government.

I have the honor to be, sir, yours, very respectfully,

C. FUHRKEN.

HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SHIP CHANTICLEER,
Mazatlan, June 17, 1868.

SIR: As senior naval officer of her Britannic Majesty's navy on the west coast of Mexico, I have the honor to bring to your notice the following case of insult to an officer of her Majesty's ship Chanticleer, by the custom-house authorities, and also to their detention of the sum of $368 belonging to her Majesty the Queen of England, a permit to pass this money through the custom-house having previously been granted.

On the 16th instant Mr. Wallace, paymaster of her Majesty's ship Chanticleer, received the sum of $633 from Mr. Fuhrken, for the use of her Majesty's service, and a permit to pass the custom-house was procured. A portion of this sum was expended on shore in payment of provisions for the use of her Majesty's ship under my command. On this officer's arrival at the wharf in company with myself he was ordered into the custom-house, and was told that he was suspected of having money in his possession for which no permission had been granted, and was ordered to produce the money he had about him. He immediately gave the balance of the $633 he had received from Mr. Fuhrken, and was asked if he had any more money; he replied no; but afterwards, upon being told to be very careful what he replied, he stated he had some private money, of small amount, which he produced, and which was returned to him. After producing the whole of the money and stating he had no more, he was then ordered to be searched in the presence of the commandant; the permit having been produced, no notice was taken of it, but the money was confiscated; and on application again on the same day, and subsequently this morning, the custom-house authorities refused to return it.

When the paymaster was ordered into the custom-house I directed him not to give up the money, or go into the custom-house, as the permit would be brought. A person who spoke English explained to me in an insulting manner that I had no authority or command there, and was insulting in his manner. I therefore asked him what he was, and went away. (This person was the same as applied to me, some short time since, to give him protection, on General Martinez's defeat, as he stated he was implicated with him.) Having failed to procure the money from the custom-house authorities, I beg to submit the injustice of the detention to your consideration, and request you will be pleased to order its repayment.

The insult the custom-house official above referred to states he received, I beg to inform you, is untrue; and I consider an officer of this ship has been grossly insulted.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. W. S. BRIDGES,

Commander, and Senior Officer West Coast of Mexico.

Commander-in-chief of the Mexican forces at Mazatlan.

SEÑOR COMMANDANTE: I have received your communication of yesterday, in which you were pleased to inform me of the occurrence which took place the preceding day on the wharf of this port, there having been confiscated from the paymaster of her Britannic Majesty's ship Chanticleer a sum of money amounting to $368, notwithstanding the competent permit to export the same was exhibited, and asking me to order the return of the money, as its seizure is considered unjust.

In due reply, I have the honor to state to you that the resolution of this affair is not within the competency of the headquarters under my charge, as by the laws of the country it pertains to the jurisdiction of the tribunals of the federal treasury.

You will therefore understand that it is to the said tribunals that you should address yourself in order that justice may be administered, with the assurance that the same will be rendered to you in a full and prompt manner in conformity with the laws.

I protest to you, Señor Commandante, my attentive consideration.

Mazatlan, June 18, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of this day, informing me that it is not in your power to accede to the demands contained in my note of yesterday's date, requiring the restitution of the money forcibly taken from an officer of this ship, and referring me to the local tribunal for redress.

Your excellency must be aware that it is not the custom, in cases of insult and robbery by officials of any government upon the persons or government property of another nation, to arrange such matters by a local court, and I am of opinion that the extreme urgency of the case I have brought under your notice can hardly have been viewed by you in the light it merits.

I therefore request you will reconsider your reply to my application, and it becomes my duty to inform you that unless the money is repaid on board this ship by noon tomorrow, the 19th June, I shall be under the necessity of then considering what measures I must take to repel the insult offered, and to recover the amount illegally abstracted from an officer of her Majesty's ship under my command.

The particulars having been fully set forth in my letter of yesterday's date, it is not necessary to repeat them here.

Having informed myself of its contents, I have again taken into consideration your No. 1, received yesterday, and my reply to the same; but not finding reasons for a change of opinion, I have to insist that the affair pertains to the jurisdiction of the federal tribunals, in conformity with the laws of the country, as it treats of an infraction of the fiscal regulations with reference to the export of money.

I have the honor to repeat to you the assurance of my consideration.

HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SHIP CHANTICLEER,

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday's date, informing me that you had no reason to alter your decision relative to the restitution of the money taken from the paymaster of this ship, and again referring me to the law courts; the question of the insult offered to the officer and myself you entirely ignore.

It becomes my duty, in relation to the above facts, to protest most strongly against the illegality committed, and the insult that your officials have thought fit to offer to myself and the officer under my command.

I have now to bring to your notice that a still greater insult was offered to me yesterday afternoon, and I request you will give me an explanation at your earliest convenience.

On my arriving at the pier yesterday afternoon, to embark in my boat, I was arrested by a guard of three men and ordered into the custom-house. On entering an empty room, a man forced me in a most insulting manner against a wall, and then in the roughest and most outrageous way searched my person, and also that of an officer who was in my company. This gross insult was perpetrated without the presence of an officer or a word of explanation.

To comment on this outrageous conduct is quite unnecessary; but I demand a full explanation, which must be immediately followed—

First, by the disavowal on the part of the government of Mazatlan of any participation in the conduct of its officers who have been instrumental in offering the gross insult to me, and, through me, to the government of Great Britain.

Second, by the production of the officer ordering the insult on board the ship, and his immediate punishment to my satisfaction.

Third, by the repayment of the money abstracted from the paymaster of this ship on the 16th instant, and an apology for the insult he was subjected to.

Should these commands not be complied with in twenty-four hours from noon to-day, I shall then take such measures as I deem necessary to repel the insult, and to cause the uniform of her Britannic Majesty's officers to be respected.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

MEXICAN REPUBLIC, FOURTH MILITARY DIVISION, GENERAL-IN-CHIEF.

SEÑOR COMANDANTE: I have received the communication which, under the number 3 you have been pleased to address to me, dated to-day.

In it you attribute to the officials under my command the insults which you state have been committed against your person, and that of the paymaster, searching your pockets, and confiscating a sum of three hundred and sixty-eight dollars, which the said paymaster was taking out, on the 16th instant, from the port; and also the outrages which were repeated yesterday against yourself.

I presume that the want of information on your part of the attributes of the employés of the republic in the various branches into which the administration is divided is the occasion of the error into which you have fallen in addressing yourself to me, believing that I am the superior of said employés.

To remove that erroneous impression, and that you may use your rights in a manner more in conformity with the laws, I have to state to you that I am the chief of the fourth division of the Mexican army, now accidentally stationed in the State of Sinaloa, discharging a special commission from the President of the republic, and that none of the officials of my division have part, directly or indirectly, in the acts of which you speak.

If any officer under my orders had such participation, I should consider myself obliged to take action in the premises; but this not being the case, I cannot do so, but have to leave others to respond for their own acts.

From motives of courtesy, and in order that you may separate from the course that should be followed, I will state to you also that the authors of said acts, being employés of the maritime custom-house, you should address yourself with your reclamations to the administrador citizen Francisco Sepulveda, as their immediate chief; and if he does not render justice, you can apply, as I have before stated, to the tribunals or to the national government.

Having made the preceding explanations, I trust you will be convinced that I am not the authority to whom you should address yourself, and that my character of general-in-chief, under the orders of the supreme government of the republic, does not authorize me to interfere in questions foreign to the discharge of my military commission.

Having, with what I have stated, answered the communication referred to at the beginning of this note, I renew to you at the same time the assurances of my consideration.

On a new representation, signed by all the foreign consuls and principal merchants of the place, Captain Bridges has suspended his action against the city. He offers, on the strength of our request, to be lenient until he receives satisfaction, or instructions from the admiral, but reserves his firm intention of proceeding to extreme measures should new provocations be offered him.

In consequence of this, the mercantile community has resolved to dispatch this letter by express to you, and I have the honor to request you to return your answer, and that of the Mexican government, by the same opportunity.

Captain Bridges's conduct has highly obliged us, and we strongly hope the government will take it into consideration and hasten to correspond by a prompt and satisfactory answer.

Mazatlan, June 23, 1868.

SIR: Owing to a question of a very serious nature having arisen between the commander of her Majesty's ship Chanticleer and the authorities of this port, I was on the point of embarking yesterday on board the mail steamer for San Francisco, and requested the Prussian consul, (who was himself addressing you,) in my name, to beg of you to use your friendly influence in arranging the matter of the gross insult offered to Commander Bridges, who intended taking summary measures to punish the same, having failed to obtain any redress from the commander-in-chief of the 4th division, (General Corona,) who, although the highest representative of his government, has expressed his inability to act in the matter or to punish the offender, and referred the commander to the collector of the custom-house, with whom he could not enter into communication on a national question of such a serious nature.

The Prussian consul has brought all the facts relating to said insult fully before you, and will also inform you that Commander Bridges has been prevailed upon to desist from bombarding the public buildings until he has communicated with Admiral Hastings, and the matter has been brought to the knowledge of the Mexican government. I have also to request you, as the representative of a friendly nation, (my government holding no diplomatic intercourse with Mexico,) to use your influence with the supreme government in obtaining prompt satisfaction for Commander Bridges, and thereby avoid destruction to life and property.

I anticipate you my best thanks for all that you may do towards bringing about a peaceable and satisfactory settlement of this matter.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

C. WOOLRICH,

Her Britannic Majesty's Vice-Consul.

Hon. E. LEE PLUMB,

United States Minister Resident, &c., &c., in Mexico.

Mr. Sisson to Mr. Plumb.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Mazatlan, June 23, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to forward you two inclosures—No. 1, a copy of the notice I received from Commander W. W. Bridges, of her Majesty's ship Chanticleer; No. 2, copy of two letters sent by me to Commander Bridges.

As the correspondence is all in the hands of the English consul, who informs me that they are to be remitted to your honor by courier this day, I do not see that I can give you further information.

I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,

ISAAC SISSON,

United States Commercial Agent.

Hon. EDWARD L. PLUMB,

United States Minister, Mexico.

Commander Bridges to Mr. Sisson.

HER BRITANNIC MAJESTY'S SHIP CHANTICLEER,

Mazatlan, June 20, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you, that having failed to procure redress from the Mexican authorities in Mazatlan for gross insults offered to myself by the customs department, that I am compelled to take summary measures to repel the insult. I therefore shall, from noon this day, close the port of Mazatlan, and make such seizures as I may consider necessary. Should force be required to carry out my intentions I shall be obliged to resort to it, but it will be my desire, while inflicting punishment on the government of Mazatlan, not to injure private property if possible. I beg you will be so good as to display the United States flag over your consulate, and that you notify to your countrymen in Mazatlan my intentions. Before opening fire on the custom-house and other public buildings I will display the English flag at the main and fire a blank gun, in order that the inhabitants may remove from danger.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

W. W. BRIDGES,

Commander and Senior Officer West Coast of Mexico.

The CONSUL for the United States, Mazatlan.

Mazatlan, June 20, 1862.

SIR: At the request of citizens, Mr. Abwua, consul of Ecuador, and myself called on General Corona this morning to try and arrange the difficulties between yourself and the Mexican authorities. General Corona stated that he intended to address you a note, and insists in the want of jurisdiction to give the satisfaction required.

Very respectfully,

ISAAC SISSON,

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mazatlan, June 21, 1862.

SIR: In connection with the English and Prussian consuls I feel it my duty to call your attention to the great destruction of life and property that must be the result from the bombardment of this city. As the city is defenseless, and most of the property belonging to foreigners, I truly hope that you may be able to obtain redress in some milder way.

Very respectfully,

ISAAC SISSON,
United States Commercial Agent.

Commander W. W. S. BRIDGES, R. N.,
Her Majesty's ship Chanticleer.

Mr. Plumb to Señor Azpiroz.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, July 2, 1862.

SIR: By dispatches which reached me this morning by extraordinary courier from Mazatlan, I am informed of very grave difficulties which have arisen at that port, between the commander of the English man-of-war Chanticleer and the Mexican authorities.

These difficulties, as I am advised, have reached so serious a stage that a blockade of the port of Mazatlan has been established, and the commander of the Chanticleer had declared it to be his intention to bombard the town; but upon the representations of the foreign consuls and merchants, was induced to desist from this latter purpose until he should have communicated with the British admiral on that coast, and the matter had been brought to the knowledge of the supreme government of the republic.

Under these circumstances communications have been addressed to me, inclosing to me the correspondence that had taken place between the commander of the Chanticleer and General Corona, the chief military representative of the Mexican government, in that part of the republic which has had this lamentable result, and my good offices have been appealed to as the representative of a friendly nation, and the only foreign diplomatic agent in this republic, to lay this correspondence before the Mexican government, and to use my influence to the end that due satisfaction may be rendered, and thereby the destruction of life and property be avoided.

I have therefore the honor to inclose herewith a copy of the correspondence referred to, as it has been transmitted to me, and very respectfully but earnestly and seriously to commend the attention of the Mexican government to the gravity of the case therein presented.

I cannot but entertain a confident hope that the government of the republic will take such a view of this affair as will lead it at once to dictate such orders as shall fully meet the exigencies of the case, and avert more serious consequences, which it is to be feared may lead to very grave international complications, if, as the inclosed correspondence would indicate, subordinate officials, without the knowledge of the Mexican government, have committed acts that require immediate redress.

I also beg to inclose herewith copy of the notice of blockade, officially communicated to the commercial agent of the United States, and of two letters addressed by him to the commander of the Chanticleer.

The agitation and alarm among the Pacific foreign residents in Mazatlan, in view of these serious events, is extreme, and I trust the government of the republic will enable me to transmit, by the return of the present courier, such assurances as will show that this affair will have an immediate pacific solution, honorable alike to the government of Mexico and to the nation aggrieved.

To no party will such result afford more gratification, I am sure, than to the government, and I have the honor to represent.

With sentiments of the highest consideration, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. MANUEL AZPIROZ,

Chief Clerk in charge of the Department of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Mexico.

Señor Azpiroz to Mr. Plumb.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Mexico, July 5, 1868.

SIR: In due reply to the note of the 2d of this month, which you pleased to remit to me, with copies of various communications relative to events which occurred at Mazatlan on the 16th and subsequent days of June last past, showing that on addressing said communications to you, recurrence was had to your good offices, because you are the representative of a friendly nation, and the only foreign diplomatic agent in this country, I have the honor to say to you that the government has taken under consideration all that you have pleased to communicate to it, as well as the contents of a communication, with its annexes, from the general of division, Ramon Corona, in command of the fourth division of the army, and of another communication from the commander-in-chief of the navy department of the south, sent to the department of war and navy, giving to it information of the events indicated.

Through the medium of the department of war and navy there have been already ordered suitable measures, which are communicated to the general in chief of the fourth division of the army in the dispatch transcribed for this department, of which I send you a copy.

The government duly appreciates your desire to contribute, through your good offices and influence, to the smoothing away of the difficulties that occurred at Mazatlan, and will have the satisfaction of availing itself of them should needful occasion happen.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MANUEL AZPIROZ.

Mr. EDWARD LEE PLUMB,

Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America in Mexico.

[Translation.]

No. 15.—DEPARTMENT OF WAR AND NAVY—SECTION 1.

To-day I say to the general of division, Ramon Corona, in command of the fourth division, as follows:

"I have laid before the consideration of the President of the republic your communication of the 22d of June last, with a copy, and the printed matter annexed, upon the reclamations of Mr. W. Bridges, commander of the ship of war of her Britannic Majesty the Chanticleer, anchored in the bay of Mazatlan. Your communication, with its annexes, and another from the chief in command of the navy at the south, brought by special mail, are the only documents which the governor has received, there not having arrived by that or other channel any communication or document from the maritime custom-house to the proceedings of which the reclamations relate.

"For this reason the President has decided, that through the department of the treasury the administrator of the maritime custom-house be notified by an express mail to transmit, if that has not been done, a report of all the circumstances in connection with what has happened, stating the reasons why he had not given immediate information, so that the government might at once have appreciated the events with exactness the moment they trench upon national interests. Notwithstanding the absence of any statements from the custom-house, and with reserve always of what may be determined when they may be received, the citizen President has taken the business into consideration, so far as till now set forth and appearing on the documents received.

"The first reclamation of the commander of the frigate set forth that the agents of the custom-house, on the 16th of June, collected a sum of money which the purser of the vessel had with him at the time he was going on board the ship. The captain asked that the amount should be restored, complaining that himself and the purser had been insulted. It seems, from the very words of the commander in his first communication, that the agents of the custom-house made requisition from the purser when he had reached the wharf, which seems to signify that he was about to embark without making a manifest of the money, and that he had not with him even any permit to ship any amount; but that at the time of the discovery of that which he was carrying he said he had a permit for a smaller sum, which he was ordered to draw from a merchant, and presented afterwards; and that the commander says he warned the purser that he should not deliver the money nor go to the custom-house, which was to warn him that in Mexican territory he should resist and should not obey the agents of the Mexican authority. In the absence of reports from the custom-house, it is to be presumed that it collected the money, and then refused to restore it when afterwards the permit was presented, because it had not been used for making a manifest of the money, in the act of his going to take it on board. If by general rule this way of acting were permitted, a permit kept in a merchant's office would serve for embarking a large amount in small quantities shipped in succession without manifests, trusting that, if at some time the fiscal officers should note and detain some partial amount, the permit would then be ordered to be brought and presented.

"The examination of the purser was not an offense or insult, especially when the fact appeared that he was going to ship a sum without the usual forms. Examination at the custom-house is not an exclusive practice of Mexico; there, on the contrary, it is not customary to make them so scrupulously as in other countries. Still less could the commander of the frigate consider himself offended by the simple fact that some one should have notified him that he could not exercise any power or authority on shore. He himself shows in his first note that he cautioned the purser, while on shore in Mexico, to resist and disobey the agents of the Mexican authorities. In place of the commander being offended, his warning might well appear to be an offense against, and disrespect of, Mexican laws and authorities. The officers and crew of a vessel of war anchored in a foreign port, when they go ashore are under obligation to hold in respect the authorities of the country and observe its laws, being responsible for their infraction or for disregard thereof. Although the commander of the frigate characterized as an insult what happened primarily with him and the purser, doubtless he did not think it sufficiently clear and demonstrated that there had been offense, because he limited himself to requesting in his two first communications the return of the money retained, without expressing that he wanted other satisfaction. He did not ask that until his third note, after what happened on the 18th June, with the same commander, who considered the fresh act as the greater offense. Until the government receives the report from the custom-house, it will not be enabled to appreciate the circumstances of the second act; but it may be considered, in view of the documents received, that the demands and measures of the commander of the frigate do not appear to be in conformity with the law of nations, nor founded on justice. In no way could it be just, nor could the authorities of the republic admit the demand of Commander Bridges, that the officer who had directed the occurrence of the 18th of June should be sent on board his vessel and be punished as should be satisfactory to him.

"Grave as the captain may consider the fault, he can only ask, in conformity with the principles and laws of civilized nations, that the offender or offenders should be tried, not by the offended but by their own judges, nor punished at the pleasure of the offended party but in such manner only as should satisfy justice. As little could it seem just or in conformity with the law of nations, that the commander of the Chanticleer should declare, of his own authority, the blockade of Mazatlan, and no less that he should attempt it upon his own authority to bombard an undefended city. Although by the attempted foreign intervention in Mexico the relations between Mexico and England have been interrupted, it is a fact that there has not for a long time been any hostilities between the two countries. Under such circumstances it could not be in conformity with the law of nations that the commander of an English ship of war should establish, of his own authority, a state of hostilities without orders from his government.

"This beginning of hostilities would be so much the less justifiable on the part of the commander of the Chanticleer, inasmuch as, if the acts of some public functionaries of Mazatlan were considered to be irregular, they would be deemed to be entitled to seek proper reparation; but the case had not happened in which it could be believed that this had been refused by the government of the republic.

"Far from so believing, it should be considered that it has been and is the constant purpose of the policy of the government not to give any well-founded motive for complaint, even to subjects of countries which have interrupted their relations with Mexico, although, indeed, the resolution may be held to make all the efforts and sacrifices necessary to uphold the dignity and the rights of the republic. On these subjects the conduct of the government has been in accordance with the enlightened opinion of the generality of the Mexican people, which has well demonstrated, in a recent epoch of trial, its determination to treat not merely with justice, but with kindness, all foreigners of every country who may reside in the republic or may desire to come to it.

"Observing the same principles in respect to what has happened at Mazatlan, the government would not consent to any irregular requisition, but as little does it question of being able to dispose of the proper investigation of the facts, so that if there have been wrongs they may be remedied as may be correspondent with justice. With this object the President of the republic has determined that the department of Hacienda issue appropriate orders on the two points following:

"1st. That the money taken from the possession of the purser of the frigate Chanticleer be held under the quality of a deposit until the government receive the reports of the maritime custom-house, in order to resolve, upon seeing them, whether the government can of itself determine that the amount be returned, or whether it is indispensable under the circumstances of the case, that it be submitted to a judicial decision.

"2d. That there be placed at the disposal of the judge of the district of Mazatlan, that he may proceed in accordance with the laws, the persons employed in the maritime custom-house who interfered in what happened on the 16th and 18th days of June last, in respect of the commander and officers of the frigate Chanticleer, as well as the employé who gave order to do those acts, giving information every week to the government of the state of the proceedings during which said employés may be absent from duty, until, in view of the result of the trial, the government may determine as to those who are ready to return to duty.

"The President has also determined to commission you to act in this matter in conformity with the following directions:

"1. The provisions of this communication shall be without effect if, at the time of their receipt by you, the difficulties mentioned as having happened at that port shall already have been satisfactorily settled.

"2. In the contrary case you will please address a note to the commander of the frigate Chanticleer, sending him a copy of this communication.

"3. If, notwithstanding the disposition made by the government, the commander of the Chanticleer should insist in maintaining the blockade, and if he should again threaten to bombard Mazatlan, you will act in either case in conformity with the instructions I give you in a separate dispatch."

And I send it to you for your information.

Independence and liberty! Mexico, July 5, 1868.

MEJIA,
Minister of Foreign Relations.

Mr. Plúmb to Mr. Fuhrken.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, July 6, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, on the 2d instant, of your communication of the 22d, with postscript of the 23d ultimo, with which you have been pleased to transmit to me, at the request of Mr. C. Woolrich, the vice-consul of Great Britain at Mazatlan, copy of correspondence between the commander of her Britannic Majesty's ship Chanticleer and General Corona.

This request is made of you by Mr. Woolrich in the anticipation of his having immediately to leave Mazatlan.

And you add that Mr. Woolrich requests me "as the representative of a friendly nation to lay these documents before the Mexican government, and to obtain for the British flag the satisfaction so unjustly denied by the authorities of Sinaloa."

You also express to me in your communication the alarm and consternation which prevail among the Pacific foreign residents at Mazatlan in view of what has occurred, and refer to the loss of life and property that must ensue if the difficulties that have arisen between Commander Bridges and the Mexican authorities shall not be brought to a pacific solution.

It is with great pleasure that by the postscript to your letter I have learned that, acceding to the timely representations of the foreign consuls and merchants, the threatened bombardment of the town, which would inflict most damage upon innocent parties, has been desisted from by Commander Bridges, and it is to be trusted the blockade of the port, also seriously affecting neutral commerce, may, by a happy solution of these difficulties, speedily be raised.

In view of the appeal that has been made to me, and of the circumstances presented in your communication, I have not hesitated to use every influence compatible with my position to induce the Mexican government to take such action as shall facilitate a pacific solution of the difficulties which have arisen, and I cannot but most earnestly hope such a result may be attained.

Inclosed herewith I beg to transmit to you a copy of the note with which I communicated to this government the correspondence you desired me to lay before it, and also a copy of the reply which I have received from the department of foreign affairs.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

C. FUHRKEN, Esq.,

Consul of Prussia, Mazatlan.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Woolrich.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

City of Mexico, July 6, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, on the 2d instant, of your communication of the 23d ultimo, relating to the difficulties which have arisen at Mazatlan between Commander Bridges of her Britannic Majesty's ship Chanticleer and the Mexican authorities.

I have also received the communication from the consul of Prussia at that port, to which you refer, with which there has been transmitted to me a copy of correspondence which has taken place between Commander Bridges and General Corona.

While advising me of the difficulties that have taken place, you request me, as the representative of a friendly nation, (your government holding no diplomatic intercourse with Mexico,) to use my influence with the supreme government to obtain prompt satisfaction for Commander Bridges, and thereby avert the destruction of life and property.

The occurrences to which your communication refers have deeply impressed me, and I have not failed immediately to use every exertion consistent with my position, in favor of such action by this government as shall lead to a pacific solution of the difficulties which have arisen.

I cannot but earnestly hope such a solution may be attained, and that thus the destruction of life and property and the interruption of commerce may be averted.

By this opportunity I have addressed the consul of Prussia, in reply to his communication, and have inclosed to him a copy of the correspondence I have had with this government upon the subject referred to.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt, on the 2d instant, of your communication of the 23d ultimo, transmitting to me copies of a notice received from and of two communications addressed by you to Commander Bridges, of her Britannic Majesty's ship Chanticleer.

You also refer to a correspondence which you were informed by the English consul would be transmitted to me, and which has been remitted by the consul of Prussia, relating to the recent events at Mazatlan.

I have now to inclose to you herewith a dispatch for the consul of Prussia, with which is transmitted a copy of the correspondence I have had with this government upon the subject referred to.

I also inclose herewith a dispatch for the English vice-consul at your port, which, together with the above, I beg you will duly deliver.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 8, 1868.

SIR: I have just received directly from the United States consul at Monterey, in the State of New Leon, a copy of the deposition of the United States citizens who were the subjects of the late indignity at that place. They make a case in which the police of the city, acting under the direction of the secretary of the State government, committed great indignity and inexcusable outrage against the persons, rights, and sensibilities of the complainants.

While it is very manifest that the federal government of Mexico could neither have authorized nor contemplated the possibility of such an outrage, it is, at the same time, equally manifest that the authorities of the State were unrestrained by any consideration of prudence or of respect for the United States. The government and people of the United States cannot but feel deeply grieved by the outrage, unless it shall be explained in a satisfactory manner; and if not so explained, shall be promptly rebuked by the government of Mexico. You will lose no time or occasion in soliciting such redress.

In this communication the desire is expressed that I should at once communicate the contents of the same to the government of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Mexico, July 10, 1868.

SIR: By the annexed copies of a communication which, under date of the 8th of the present month, has been passed to this department by that of government, and of other communications addressed to that department by the governor of the State of Nuevo Leon, to that governor by the military commandant of the Mexican line of the Bravo, and to that military commandant by the consul of Mexico in Brownsville, you will see that the enemies of the public order of Mexico do not rest in their criminal machinations, but have carried the same to the territory of the United States, and are there addressing themselves to the disturbance of the peace of this republic.

The Mexican government is confident that that of the United States will prevent the development of these projects, and the realization of their objects immediately that the same shall become known to it, because if in this manner every government maintaining a condition of strict neutrality would proceed, that of the United States has for proceeding in this manner, besides, the motives of well-manifested friendship, and of a common interest for the maintenance of order and of peace in this republic, which closely unite it with the government of Mexico.

It is therefore necessary that the government of the United States be informed that within its territory efforts are being made to organize troops of filibusters with the intent to invade the Mexican territory, in order that it may, on its part, prevent the execution of such plans.

The government of Mexico does not doubt that you will be so good as to transmit to that of the United States the contents of this note, and of the documents annexed, with the efficacy proper to your character of representative of a nation friendly to Mexico.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF GOVERNMENT.—SECTION 4.

Under date of the 28th ultimo the governor of the State of Nuevo Leon addressed to this department the following official communication:

Under date of the 25th instant the military commandant of the line of the Bravo writes to this government as follows:

"I inclose to you copy of a communication and copies of letters which, under date of the 20th instant, have been addressed to me by the Mexican consul in New Orleans. Said communications corroborate the information that the detectives I have among the insurgents resident in Brownsville daily give me, as the assurance is notorious with which the said traitors labor to attain or to carry forward the enterprise they have undertaken of inaugurating revolution on this frontier.

"Four of the traitor leaders who were in Brownsville left day before yesterday, in the direction of Lareto, to confer with Juiroga, who is in accord with them, and yesterday eleven men left in the same direction, and, as I am informed, are to serve as escort.

"I communicate the same to you for your information, requesting that if anything occurs with reference to this matter in the part of the river Bravo which is within the State under your worthy command, you will be so good as to communicate the same to me, and I will keep you informed of what occurs in the line which is under my charge.

"And I have the honor to transcribe the same to your department, remitting at the same time the copies to which this note refers, and stating to you that the information they contain confirms the fears that some time since this government communicated to the general government of the republic, that the traitor Juiroga designs to disturb the public order in this part of the frontier, and that there is consequently a necessity that the supreme government should dictate the most urgent and efficacious orders to the end that the government of the State may count with security upon sufficient resources for the payment of the force which it has organized, and such further force as may be necessary to make head against the situation in case the peace of the State should unfortunately become disturbed."

And I transcribe the same to you for your information, remitting also a copy of the documents to which the communication herein inserted refers.

DEPARTMENT OF GOVERNMENT, SECTION 4, MILITARY COMMAND OF THE LINE OF THE BRAVO.

CONSULATE OF THE MEXICAN REPUBLIC.

New Orleans, June 20, 1868.

Besides the information which you will see in the inclosed copies, with reference to the expedition of filibusters that, by order of the ex-Mexican General Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, is preparing in this city, I inform you of other details which I have been able to obtain, in order that you may make such use of them as you may think proper. That the expedition is to be directed to Texas is more than probable, as the enlisted men have orders to answer in case they are arrested, as they fear they may be by the American authorities, that they have been engaged to work upon a railroad that is about to be commenced in the State of Texas, and in my opinion they will disembark not far from Brownsville, where, as I am informed, are already some of the leaders and officers, who are to place themselves at the head of this horde of pirates.

To-morrow at seven o'clock in the morning over one hundred of these men are to meet at a café that there is in Bienville street, No. 119, (one of the points of enlistment,) and are to take the railroad train for Opelousas, and to stop at a point some fifty miles from here, where it is said a camp is formed.

In renewing to you the assurances of my consideration and esteem, it only remains for me to beg that you will be so good as to give information of all that I have communicated to the President of the republic.

CONSULATE OF THE MEXICAN REPUBLIC, NEW ORLEANS,
New Orleans, June 8, 1868.

To the Governor of the State of Vera Cruz:

The annexed communication for the department of relations I send open, for the purpose that you may inform yourself of its contents, and take such measures as you may believe convenient, begging of you that you will send it rapidly forward.

RAMON S. DIAZ.

NEW ORLEANS, June 18, 1868.

To the Minister of Foreign Relations of the Republic of Mexico:

There being no vessel direct to Vera Cruz, I send the present by way of Havana. By the annexed copies you will be informed of the expedition which is preparing here to invade Mexico. All is done for account of the ex-General Santa Anna, who yet remains in the capital of Cuba. From a private letter I have just received from Havana I copy the following:

"It is necessary to have here a person who has relations with some officers of the regiment of Spain, to obtain details of what there is with respect to Santa Anna and his expedition, for I have positive information that it is in this corps that there is the greatest number of officers for the purpose proposed by Santa Anna and General Marquez. The war steamer General Leso is about to be sold at auction, and it will be adjudged completely found and armed, to the imperialists, for it is for this object that it is to be put up at public sale.

"Remissions of men, arms, and money continue to be made by schooners to Yucatan and Campeche, which are the cardinal points of departure for all the operations they undertake."

From this it will be seen that the expedition from Havana is in accord with that from this city. There the enlistments continue, and what appears to me very necessary is that great vigilance should be exercised on the line of the Rio Bravo, and above all in the vicinity of Matamoras, to the authorities of which place I will give information by the first opportunity.

NEW ORLEANS, June 16, 1868.

To the Consul General of the Republic of Mexico in New York:

Yesterday I sent to you a telegraphic dispatch, advising you that an expedition of filibusters is being formed here for the invasion of Mexico, by way of Matamoras.

Annexed hereto is a copy of the communication which, with reference to this scandalous affair, I have addressed to General Buchanan.

The enlistment is being publicly effected, and I have learned so far of three different places where the names of the enlisted men are registered, which are: the Spanish fonda and café in St. Philip street, between Old Levee and Chartres street, known by the name of the Punuladas; a café situated in Bienville street, corner of Dauphin, and in Toulouse street, in front of No. 126, a boarding-house. This is where a so-called colonel lives who lately figured among the invaders of the republic, and who is the one who makes the enlistments.

This individual has been wounded to-day at half-past three in the afternoon, in the left hand, by one of the adventurers of the expedition, in a quarrel which they had.

In this house in Toulouse street, up to recently, the imperialist Perez Gomez was stopping, and another Mexican named Aguilar is now living there, who also figured in the famous empire. The expedition is formed here, and by different small vessels they are sent off in squads to Ship Island, from whence, I am informed, the expedition will leave, and that it is to be directed to Matamoras.

Last night, by the American steamer Star of the Union, emissaries arrived here from Havana, from Santa Anna, for whose account the expedition is made.

NEW ORLEANS, June 15, 1868

General Buchanan, Commander of the 5th Military District:

GENERAL: I have this morning learned that a military expedition is being formed in this city, for the purpose of invading the republic of Mexico; the landing to be made at Matamoras.

According to the information I have received said expedition is to embark from the island called Ship Island, near Lake Pontchartrain, where there are already to be found over three hundred men and two schooners. The expedition is to be composed of one thousand three hundred men.

I trust, general, that you will be pleased to adopt the necessary measures to the end that the laws of neutrality shall not be violated.

RAMON S. DIAZ,
Consul of Mexico.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, July 11, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday's date, inclosing to me copies of a communication received by your department from the department of government, and of communications addressed to that department by the governor of the State of Nuevo Leon, to that governor by the military commandant of the Mexican line of the Bravo, and to that commandant by the consul of Mexico in New Orleans, by which you state that it will be seen that the enemies of the public order of Mexico do not rest in their criminal machinations, but have carried the same to the territory of the United States, and are there addressing themselves to the disturbance of the peace of the Mexican republic.

You also state that the Mexican government is confident that the government of the United States will prevent the development of these projects, and the realization of their objects, immediately that the same shall become known to it. You also add that the government of Mexico does not doubt that I will transmit to that of the United States the contents of your note, and of the documents annexed thereto, with the efficacy proper to my character as the representative of a nation friendly to Mexico.

In reply I beg to state that a copy of your note, and of its inclosures, will be at once transmitted by me to the government of the United States at Washington.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

SIR : I have to inclose to you a copy of a communication received from T. W. Scott, consul at Matamoras, in reference to the seizure of an amount of gold coin by the custom-house authorities at that port, belonging to Dr. W. L. Hutchinson, a citizen of the United States.

You are instructed to make an investigation of this case and report to this department.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Matamoras, June 29, 1868.

SIR : I have the honor to state that I have been appealed to by Dr. W. L. Hutchinson, an American citizen, to make a protest against an illegal seizure and confiscation of $1,600 in Mexican gold belonging to him, taken by the Mexican officials of Matamoras, about the 12th of May last, as he was leaving this city for his home in Tuxpan, Mexico.

I wrote Mr. Plumb on the subject, May 27th, but have received no reply. The basis upon which I made the protest dated May 21, 1868:

1. The charge was an attempt to export the money without paying duties; evidence to the contrary produced.

2. The proceedings were illegal.

3. The Mexican official did not report the full amount taken, and an attempt made to conceal a portion of the money while counting in the custom-house, which was discovered by an American who was called in as a witness.

4. The said Mexican official did propose to make a compromise with said Hutchinson, by proposing to pay him $250 of his own money, provided he would sign a receipt in full, and obligate himself not to take any further action in the case. I had satisfactory evidence of the truth of the above, and the receipt referred to, written by a Mexican official, before me at the time I protested against the proceedings. I have a copy of said receipt on file. In reply I was informed that they could not take into consideration my protest.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

THOMAS W. SCOTT,
United States Consul.

Hon. F. W. SEWARD,
Assistant Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Matamoras, May 21, 1868.

I, T. W. Scott, consul of the United States of America for the port of Matamoras, and the dependencies thereof, do hereby certify that W. L. Hutchinson, an American citizen, to me well known, personally appeared before me this day, who, being by me duly sworn, deposes and says that his home is in Tuxpan, Mexico. Deponent says that, on or about the fourth of this instant, as he was attempting to leave this city he was arrested by the custom-house employés, and his money, amounting to $1,600 in Mexican gold, was taken from him; and he, said Hutchinson, deposes and says that he assured said official that he did not intend to export said money, and if he had violated any law he was not aware of it, and he was ready and willing to pay any legal charge if any. He was referred to the courts for redress, and, after which, deponent was informed that his money was confiscated, but they, the custom-house officials, would give him $250, provided he would take no further action in the case, and sign a receipt to that effect, which he, said deponent, refused to do.

W. L. HUCHINSON.

Sworn to and subscribed before me this day and date above written.

In testimony whereof witness my hand and seal of this consulate.

United States Consul.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, July 16, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 144, with the accompanying affidavits, relative to the unprovoked indignity to certain citizens of the United States at Monterey, has been received. You were last instructed upon this subject by the dispatch from the department (No. 75) of the 8th instant. Herewith a copy of a note from Mr. Romero, of the 29th of June, in regard to it is transmitted.* It appears that Mr. Davila, the secretary of the governor of New Leon, is the person who gave the order for the arrest of the complainants. For this and for their subsequent harsh treatment, he should be held accountable. You will urge this view of the case upon the attention of the Mexican government.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

EDWARD L. PLUMB, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Seward.

No. 161.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, July 17, 1868.

SIR: Among the important provisions of the Mexican constitution is the power given to the congress, "of approving the federal estimates of expenditures, which shall be annually presented by the executive, and of imposing the taxes necessary therefor." (Art. 72, clause 7.)

This is followed, in the general provisions of the constitution, by the prescription that "no payment of money shall be made that is not embraced in the fiscal estimates or determined by previous law." (Art. 119.)

For the first time, however, since the adoption of the present constitution, in 1857, has the congress of Mexico, as stated by the president of that body in his address at the adjournment on the 31st of May last, occupied itself with these labors. In the second period of its late sessions, in compliance with the constitution, it gave preference to financial affairs, and after mature deliberation revised the estimate of expenditures, and issued a law classifying the revenues, as also an estimate of receipts.

* For inclosure see correspondence with the Mexican Legation.

These recent laws, therefore, afford the most reliable data attainable regarding the revenues and expenditures of the republic of Mexico, and the sources from whence its income is proposed to be derived.

The publication of the estimate of expenditures, or appropriation bill, as it would be termed with us, was not completed until the 8th instant, and I am consequently only now enabled to transmit to the department, as I do herewith, translations of the three laws which embrace the above important subject.

In the law classifying the revenues there is established what is the national property, and what are the revenues of the federal government, as distinguished from those of the States.

The sources of federal revenue that are specified are twelve in number, and are as follows:

1. Duties on importations.
2. Duties on exportations.
3. Assay and coinage.
4. Stamped paper.
5. Half of the proceeds of the public lands, the other half belonging to the States.
6. Guano deposits.
7. Pearl and other fisheries.
8. Interest on capitals due the treasury.
9. Post office.
10. Patents.
11. Taxes in the federal district and territories.
12. Such other imposts as in conformity with clause 7, of article 72 (first cited) of the constitution, may be decreed by congress. Of these sources of revenue, not all appear to be available at the present time.

In the law of estimate of receipts the supposed income for the present fiscal year is set forth.

It is to be derived from nine sources, which are specified, and the different amounts with the sum total estimated as follows:

1. From the maritime and frontier custom-houses—
Duties on importations.....	$11, 742, 711
Duties on exportations.....	1, 254, 000
	12, 996, 711
2. Excise duties in the federal district.....	1, 500, 000
3. Stamped paper.....	2, 000, 000
4. Direct contributions in the federal district.....	500, 000
5. Nationalized church property.....	600, 000
6. Coinage and assay.....	200, 000
7. Tax in favor of public instruction.....	100, 000
8. Public lands and other sources.....	300, 000
9. Tax on carriages.....	25, 000
Total estimated receipts.....	18, 221, 711

It will be observed that one-ninth of the above sum is derived from taxes in the federal district; one-ninth from stamped paper, and that more than six-ninths, or a little over two-thirds of the entire estimated income, is to be derived from import and export duties, and of this sum nine-tenths from duties on importations.

If, then, importations should fall off, or the possession of the ports not be maintained, or their revenues not be duly received, the income of the general government, it is obvious, would be very sensibly affected.

On the other hand, should the tariff of the republic be simplified and be everywhere equally enforced, trade, with the maintenance of peace, would be stimulated and the revenue would undoubtedly be largely increased.

The most immediate and effective stimulant that could probably be applied, within this country, to the revival of its industry and commerce, in addition to the maintenance of tranquillity and security, would be the removal of the burdens now resting upon its most available and peculiar means of wealth—its mining interests.

In my dispatch No. 149, of the 24th ultimo, I referred to the appointment by this government some time since of a commission to examine into the subject of the present condition of the mining interest, and especially the burdens now resting upon it; and I alluded to the recent report of this commission, which, with the approval of the minister of treasury, Mr. Romero, had been submitted to congress just at the close of the last session, and in which the entire exemption of the products of the mines from all imposts and duties was recommended.

I also transmitted with that dispatch statements showing that the burden now resting upon that branch of industry is upwards of 25 per cent. upon its gross products, in addition to the loss of nearly as much more of the silver contained in the ore, in the process of reduction.

In the law of estimate of federal receipts the congress has taken a step in the direction of this important reform, by the abolition of five of the charges heretofore made on mining products, viz :

The three per cent. mining tax.

The real per mark, equal to one and one-half per cent.

The federal contribution of twenty-five per cent. on the two preceding charges, or one and one-eighth per cent.

The circulation duty of two per cent. and the federal contribution of twenty-five per cent. on the export duty (five per cent.) and above circulation duty, making one and three-quarters per cent.

The sum of these several reductions is nine and three-eighths per cent.

In place of the former export duty of five per cent. on silver, however, that duty has been raised by congress to eight per cent. The net reduction, therefore, made by the congress amounts to six and three-eighths per cent.

But since congress adjourned decrees have been issued by various of the States, re-establishing these duties on their own account.

The State of Guanajuato, for instance, by a law issued on the 28th ultimo, has established, from the 1st instant, a duty of four and one-half per cent. on silver deposited in the assay offices of that State, and two per cent. extraction duty on all coin and bullion taken from the State. I inclose herewith translation of this decree and also of a similar law issued by the State of Michoacan, imposing a circulation duty of two per cent. and an extraction duty of the same amount, both increased by an additional duty of fifteen per cent. upon each charge.

In this connection I also transmit translation of a decree recently issued by the legislature of the State of San Luis Potosi, imposing a tax of one and one-quarter per cent. upon all mercantile transactions, such as sales of merchandise, the collection of bills of exchange, &c.

A further valuable reform has been attempted in the law of estimate of receipts, in the abolition of the duty on mortgages in the federal district, and the duty on transfer of real estate throughout the republic.

The first of these duties was two per cent. on the sum expressed in a mortgage, payable upon the execution of the same, and another two per cent. payable at the redemption.

The duty on the transfer of real estate was ten per cent. upon the amount of the sale, payable in government obligations, which were worth, say eight per cent. on their face, and twenty-five per cent. upon the ten per cent. payable in coin, making a total of, say, three and one-third per cent. government charge upon the amount of each sale of real estate.

But the repeal of this latter tax by the general congress appears also to be nullified, for by the decrees of the States of Guanajuato and Michoacan, inclosed herewith, it will be seen that it is already being reimposed by the States.

In Guanajuato that duty is now fixed at five per cent., and in Michoacan at two per cent.

The difficulty in carrying out reforms in this country is greatly increased by the want of sufficient control on the part of the general government over the States, and the action of the former is often for this reason entirely nullified.

In article four of the same law of estimate of receipts, a very important reform has been really achieved in the abolition of the system of special funds, which has so long prevailed in this country.

Under this system, in each collection office accounts were kept of the different purposes to which funds collected were to be applied, and special orders were constantly being given by the government for the separation in subordinate offices of specific amounts for account of special objects, to the extreme confusion and embarrassment of the general financial administration.

This was especially the case in the different assignments and engagements made on account of the foreign debt.

All funds collected are now to go into a common chest, and to be paid out only by the general treasury, in conformity with such appropriations as shall be made by law.

In my dispatch No. 45, of the 12th of December last, I called the attention of the department to a decree issued on the 19th of November, by this government, in the exercise of the extraordinary powers not then expired, which abolished all tolls upon the public highways of the republic, and to provide means for the preservation of the roads substituted therefor a tax of fifty cents per thousand on landed property, manufactures, and mills, a tax on stages, and a duty of one dollar for every two hundred pounds' weight upon all foreign effects introduced into the republic, including machinery, agricultural implements, &c., that before had been free.

In article 2 of the present law of estimate of receipts, the tax for the above purpose on landed property, manufactures, and mills, is repealed; and as the tax on stages or carriages, item 9 article 1, is estimated at only twenty-five thousand dollars, it is seen that the entire burden of the maintenance of the roads of this country, to the extent of the amount that may be derived from the charge of one dollar on each two hundred pounds, weight of foreign effects imported, falls upon foreign commerce, and mainly upon commerce with the United States; for under this form of duty two hundred pounds of heavy machinery, agricultural implements, of flour or lard, from the United States, pays the same as a case of the same weight of silks or the finest goods from France.

In other words, assuming a ton of machinery to be of the value of one hundred dollars, or flour at ten dollars per barrel, this duty amounts to ten per cent., while on a case of silks or fine goods weighing two hundred pounds, of which the value may be one thousand dollars, this duty amounts only to the one-hundredth part of ten per cent., or one-tenth of one per cent. Ten dollars per ton upon heavy effects, articles of first necessity, from the United States, amounts to a very considerable charge, and operates to our direct disadvantage, while the commerce in fine goods, articles of luxury, from Europe, is favored.

The amount and the several divisions of the estimated expenditures of the republic for the present fiscal year, which commenced on the 1st instant and is to terminate on the 30th of June, 1869, under the law of estimate of expenses, or appropriation bill inclosed herewith, are set down as follows:

1. Legislative corps.....	$735, 360
2. Executive power.....	52, 880
3. Judicial power.....	488, 290
4. Department of foreign relations.....	124, 540
5. Department of government.....	1, 025, 080
6. Department of justice and public instruction.....	380, 640
7. Department of fomento.....	2, 292, 932
8. Department of treasury.....	5, 143, 726
9. Department of war.....	8, 450. 990
Total.....	18, 694, 438

The first part, that for the legislative power, is the expense of the congress of the Union. The second, for the executive power, is for the salary and other expenses of the President of the republic, exclusive of an item of $18,332, under the head of the war department, for the expense of his staff.

That under the head of the judicial power is for the supreme and circuit federal courts, and the civil and criminal courts of the federal district.

The appropriation for the department of foreign affairs embraces at the present time only a legation in the United States, and consuls at New York, New Orleans, San Francisco, and Brownsville.

It is stated in the body of the law, in a note, that, "If there should occur within the proximate (now present) fiscal year, the necessity of making appointments for legations, or consulates established by previous laws, there will then be resolved what may be convenient."

Thirty thousand dollars is appropriated for the secret and extraordinary expenses of the department.

In the expenditures of the department of government the principal items are, $115,000 for the subvention of land and maritime mail lines, $433,260 for four corps of rural police, $48,000 for superintendence of police, $87,000 for police of city of Mexico, $120,000 for municipal guard of infantry, and $108,000 for municipal guard of cavalry. All of these items, except that for mail lines, being for expenditures within the federal district, and forming nearly four-fifths of the expenditures of that department.

The expenditures set down under the head of the department of justice and public instruction, being separated from those under the head of judicial power, which come within that department, are mainly confined to the appropriations for public instruction, which amount to $334,920.

The department of fomento, or public works, embraces appropriations for the repair of roads to the amount of $799,482, for roads to be opened of $400,000, survey of the public lands $36,000, telegraph lines $36,000, works in the ports $152,000, on the national palace $48,000, for the drainage of the valley of Mexico $308,400, and subversion to the proposed horse-car railroad from Vera Cruz, by way of Jalapa, $465,000.

The two remaining departments are the departments of treasury and of war. In the appropriations for the former the expense of the maritime and frontier custom-houses of the republic appears to be $568,470, of the federal treasury offices in the different States $107,600, administration of stamped paper $204,540, collection of the revenue of the federal district $114,178, mint houses and assay offices, so far as they are yet in the hands of the general government, the most of them having heretofore been leased under contract, $146,280, retired list and pensions $192,498.

The appropriation on account of the public debt, foreign and domestic, is $3,500,000. The working of this appropriation is as follows:

"For the cancellation (amertization) and payment of the public debt, interior and foreign, $3,500,000."

In the debate which took place in the Mexican congress upon the adoption of this item, and which was participated in both by the minister of the treasury and the minister of foreign affairs, the position was taken by the government that it did not propose to pay the interest on any of its public debt, except upon the bonds issued in the United States, and that was to be left to the discretion of the executive; but in place thereof a system of auctions for the buying in of their debt would be maintained. With my dispatch No. 135, of the 27th of May, I transmitted to the department a full report of the debate which took place on that occasion.

The largest item of the expenditures of the Mexican government is that under the head of the war department. Of the $18,600,000 total appropriations, over eight millions are for this department.

According to a report just published, made under date of the 20th of February of the present year, by the late minister of treasury, Mr. Iglesias, the military force at the command of the constitutional government, under arms in July, 1867, could not be calculated at less than eighty thousand men. This has now been reduced to somewhat over sixteen thousand men, divided into four principal divisions of four thousand men each, and a fifth, less important, of which the number is not stated.

The appropriation for each of the principal divisions is $921,882, or upwards of $4,000,000 for the four principal divisions of the Mexican army. For four brigades of artillery the appropriation is $564,000, for the marine department $42,313, medical corps of the army $148,000, special battalion of "supremas paderes" $160,000, corps of carbineers $111,000, invalid corps $95,000, military command of Vera Cruz and other ports in the Gulf and on the Pacific $734,000, retired corps $191,000, pensions $387,000, material and armament $587,000, military colonies on the frontier of the north and in Yucatan $500,000, extraordinary expenses $500,000.

The sum of the appropriations for the war department is $8,450,990.

As before stated, the total amount of the estimated expenditures of the government of the republic is $18,694,438.

The estimate of receipts is $18,221,711.

From the extreme commercial prostration now existing in this country, it may be doubted whether the anticipated amount of revenue will be realized the present fiscal year.

In the law of estimate of receipts it is provided, article 5th, that if the products of the estimated revenues shall not suffice to cover the estimated expenses, the necessary reductions shall be made in the latter in the following order:

1. In the assignments on account of pensions and the retired list, up to one-half the amount of the same.
2. In the auctions destined for the cancellation of the public debt.
3. In the sums assigned for the payment of the floating debt.
4. In the outlays of the department of public works.
5. In the expenses of the ministry of government.
6. In the salaries of civil functionaries, and of the military who are not in campaign, up to one-third the amount of their assignments.
7. In the expenditures of the department of war, so far as circumstances may permit.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

LAW FOR THE CLASSIFICATION OF THE REVENUES.

[From the Diario Oficial, June 2, 1868.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE AND PUBLIC CREDIT—SECTION 4.

The citizen President of the republic has been pleased to address to me the following decree:

The citizen Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known:

That the sovereign congress of the Union has been pleased to decree as follows:

The congress of the union decrees:

ARTICLE 1. The revenues and properties of the federation are:

1. The duties on importation and such others as are collected by the maritime and frontier custom-houses of the republic, on foreign goods of whatsoever denomination they may be, with the exception of twelve and a half cents on each bale which the ayuntamientos of ports are authorized to collect as municipal funds.
2. The duties on exportation.
3. The products of smelting, coining, and assaying of the gold and silver introduced into the mints.
4. The product of the sale of common stamped paper, and of that which serves for the payment of the federal contributions.
5. The half of the proceeds of the sale, rent, or use of waste lands throughout the republic; the other half to remain for the benefit of the States in whose territory they may be.
6. The product of the sale, rent, or working of guano deposits.
7. The product of the duties which may be levied on pearl, whale, otter, and seal fisheries, and other analogous objects.
8. The interests and capitals which, by any title, may be owing to the federal treasury.
9. The products of the post office.
10. The duties on privileges and patents of invention.
11. The taxes established, or which may be established, destined for the expenses of the federation, in the federal district and the territories.
12. The products of such other imposts as, in conformity with fraction VII of article 72 of the constitution, may be decreed by the general congress.
13. The castles and fortresses, the citadels, magazines and arsenals of artillery, post offices, mints, and such other edifices as through purchase, donation, or any other title, may be national property.
14. Islands and shores, ports, anchorages, bays, lakes, and navigable rivers.
15. Vessels of war, custom-house cutters, transports, and other craft belonging to the federal treasury.
16. The rights the republic may have in banking business, railroads, or any other undertakings of general interest which may be authorized by the congress of the Union.
17. All unowned property which may exist within the federal district and the terriories, and of hidden treasures which may be discovered in the same places, that portion which, in conformity with the laws, belongs to the treasury.

ART. 2. The law for the classifying of the revenues issued on the 12th September, 1857, is repealed.

Hall of the congress of the Union, Mexico, May 29, 1868.

LAW OF ESTIMATE OF FEDERAL RECEIPTS.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, June 3, 1868.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE AND PUBLIC CREDIT—SECTION 4.

The citizen President of the republic has been pleased to address to me the following decree:

The Citizen Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known:

That the sovereign congress of the Union has been pleased to decree the following: The congress of the Union decrees:

ARTICLE 1. The estimate of revenue of the federal treasury for the financial year, which will commence on the 1st of July of the present year and end on the 30th of June, 1869, will be comprised of the following sums:

First. From the products of the maritime and frontier custom-houses, in the following terms:

Duty of importation.....	$6,583,948
Duty of material improvements, twenty per cent on import duty.....	1,316,789
Duty of railroad shares, fifteen per cent. on import duty, with the reservation of what congress may decide respecting this duty.....	987,592
Interior duty, ten per cent on import duty.....	658,395
Duty of counter register, including the federal contribution, which shall be paid in coin, twenty-five per cent. on import duty.....	1,645,987
Duty on export of coined silver, at eight per cent., the entire duty.....	1,200,000
Duty on export of coined gold, one and one-half per cent.....	30,000
Tonnage, light-house, and pilotage.....	150,000
Import per package on foreign imports, in place of road tolls.....	400,000
Imports on the extraction of woods.....	24,000

Second. From the products of the principal administration of rents of the district, and the subordinate offices, according to the basis on which the collection may be established, with the understanding that the duties comprised in the varied nomenclature under which are collected the duties belonging to the treasury, including the twenty-five per cent. of the federal contribution, which shall be paid in coin, shall be reduced to one sole quota, formed from the sum of those corresponding to each article, excepting the municipal tax, which shall be made out and collected separately; and that in the quotas of the tariff in force a reduction of seven per cent. shall be made on the duties of alcabala, (excise duty,) and three per cent. on the municipal duties.....

Third. From the product of stamped paper, in the following terms:
Common stamped paper.....

Stamped paper of the contribution on imposts of the States and municipalities.....

Fourth. From the product of direct contributions in the district, with exception of tax on mortgages and on transfer of real estate, and remaining included the federal contribution, which shall be paid in coin, as a part of the sole quota which shall be collected.....

Fifth. From the proceeds of nationalized property.....	$600,000

ART. 2. The following imposts in favor of the federal treasury are abolished:

The rial (12½ cents) per marck ($8 25) on silver.

The three per cent. of minería, (tax on the products of the mines.)

The duty on mortgages, established in the federal districts.

The duty on circulation of money.

The duty of fortification of Vera Cruz.

The duty on transfer of real estate throughout the republic.

That of the mercantile tribunal, which has been collected in the States for the department of public works.

That of tobacco in the same States.

That decreed on the 19th of November last, on landed property, factories, and mills.

ART. 3. The funds proceeding from the imposts which form the estimate of the revenues of the federal treasury shall be collected and distributed under the direction and responsibility of the department of finance, which shall open credits in favor of the other departments within the limits of the appropriations.

ART. 4. The products which form the estimate of revenues or income shall be distributed by the general treasury of the nation, all special funds being expressly prohibited.

ART. 5. If the products of the estimated revenues should not suffice to entirely cover the estimated expenses, the necessary reductions shall be made in the latter in the following order:

1st. In the assignments on account of pensions and the retired list, up to one-half the amount of the same.

2d. In the auctions destined for the cancellation of the public debt.

3d. In the sums assigned for the payment of the floating debt.

4th. In the outlays of the department for public works, such as may not be of absolute necessity for the reparation and preservation of the public edifices, or those for public roads, railways, or drainage.

5th. In the expenses of the home department, (ministry of government,) especially in such as are of an extraordinary character.

6th. In the salaries of civil functionaries and employés, and of the military who are not in campaign, up to a third part of their assignments.

7th. In the expenditures of the department of war in as far as circumstances may permit.

IMPORTS IN THE STATE OF GUANAJUATO.

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT OF THE FREE AND SOVEREIGN STATE OF GUANAJUATO—SECTION OF TREASURY.

The citizen General Florencio Antillon, constitutional governor of the free and sovereign State of Guanajuato, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known, that the congress of the State has decreed the following:

No. 28.

The second constitutional congress of the free and sovereign State of Guanajuato decrees:

ARTICLE 1. From the 1st of July next the silver and gold that may be presented at the public assay office of the State shall pay to the treasury of the same, the first a duty of four and a half per cent. upon its value, and the second three per cent., there being included in the first the duty called "realde minería."

ART. 2. From the same date there shall be collected two per cent. upon the treasure that may be extracted from the State, in the same terms in which the duty known as circulation duty has heretofore been collected.

ART. 3. There shall continue to be collected, as a revenue of the State, the five per cent. of transfer of real estate, the duty of fifty cents per "arroba" (twenty-five pounds) upon tobacco in leaf, or sorted, that may be introduced, and one dollar upon the worked.

ART. 4. The duty upon native raw cotton within the State shall cease, and that known as the drainage duty.

ART. 5. The decree No. 10 of this honorable congress is hereby repealed; but this repeal shall not take effect until the 1st of October of the present year.

The governor will be informed of the present and will direct that it be printed, published, and circulated for its due compliance.

Dated in Guanajuato the 26th of June, 1868.

JOSE ZAMBRANO Y CONTRENAS, President.

JOSE BRIBIESCA SAAVEDRA, Secretary.

JUAN DE DIOS BELAUNZARAN, Secretary.

Wherefore I order that it be printed, published, and circulated for its due compliance. Palace of the government of the State in Guanajuato, June 28, 1868.

IMPOSTS IN THE STATE OF MICHOACAN.

The citizen Justo Mendoza, constitutional governor of the State of Michoacan de Campo, to all of its inhabitants be it known, that the congress of the same has decreed the following:

The Congress of Michoacan de Campo decrees:

No. 51.

ARTICLE 1. From the 1st day of July next the following imposts shall commence to be in force:

I. The duty of circulation at the rate of two per cent., which shall be caused by coined money taken from the State.

II. That of extraction, which shall be two per cent. upon the value of gold and silver in bullion, the product of the mines of the State.

III. That of consumption upon native tobacco in leaf, sorted or worked, at the rate of seventy-five cents upon each arroba (twenty-five pounds) of the first class or good, and of twenty-five cents per arroba upon that known as Macuche or Mije, estimating in both cases the gross weight.

IV. That of transfer of real estate reduced to two per cent., which shall be paid in the cases and terms fixed in the laws now in force.

ART. 2. With respect to the duty of circulation the following provisions shall be observed:

I. The payment of the impost shall be made at the place from whence the treasure leaves.

II. The simple transit by the territory of the State will not cause this duty; but to enjoy such exemption the introducers must previously justify that circumstance in the first administration, or collection office of the revenues by which they pass in their transit through the State.

III. Nor will this impost be caused when the sum extracted does not amount to one thousand dollars.

ART. 3. The executive will dictate such provisions as may be necessary to make effective the collection of the duty of extraction on gold and silver in bullion, without the necessity of the establishment of the assay offices to which the law of the State No. 11, of the 16th of March, 1835, refers.

ART. 4. The imposts specified in article 1 will cause the fifteen per cent. additional duty in favor of primary instruction; the collection of the same remaining subject, so far as possible, to the laws and regulations in force that have been dictated with reference to both, as well as such as may be issued by the executive for the better observance of this law.

ART. 5. The defraudation of said imposts shall be punished with the penalties and in the terms that the laws have established for the defrauders of the excise.

The executive of the State will direct that the same be published, circulated, and observed.

ANGEL PADILLA, Vice-President.

LUIS GONZAGA GUTIERREZ, Secretary.

FELIX ALVA, Secretary.

Wherefore I order that it be printed, published, circulated, and that due compliance be given to it.

FRANCISCO W. GONZALEZ, Secretary.

IMPOSTS IN THE STATE OF SAN LUIS POTOSI.

The citizen Juan Bustamante, constitutional governor of the free and sovereign State of San Luis Potosi, to the inhabitants of the same, be it known:

That the honorable congress of the State has been pleased to decree the following:

No. 83.

The constitutional congress of the State has thought proper to decree the following:

ARTICLE 1. The tax on sales upon time and for cash, and upon mortgages, drafts, due-bills, promissory notes, and orders for collection, which at the rate of one-half of one per cent. was imposed by decree No. 60, will be caused in future at the rate of one and one-quarter per cent., with continuance of the exceptions to which article 2 of the said decree refers, and the following:

I. Drafts that have to be protested for non-acceptance.

II. Sales at wholesale which the proprietors of estates may make of their products, outside of the bounds of their estates, and of those made within the limits of the same, whether at wholesale or retail.

ART. 2. The dispositions of decree No. 60, not modified by the present decree, remain in force, as also the obligations imposed upon brokers, judges, and notaries, and those submitted to the syndics outside of the capital.

ART. 3. The present tax shall commence to be caused eight days from the publication of this decree for the sale of merchandize and obligations in the State, and within one month with respect to drafts from without the State.

The executive of the State will take knowledge of the present, and will cause the same to be published, circulated, and obeyed.

Dated in San Luis, the 29th of May, 1868.

MANUEL MURO, President.

PEDRO DIONISIO GARZA Y GARZA, Secretary.

ROMAN FERNANDEZ NAVA, Secretary.

Wherefore I order that the present decree be executed and complied with, and that all the authorities cause it to be complied with and observed, and that it be printed, published, and circulated for the consequent ends.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, August 4, 1868.

SIR: With reference to the case of the seizure by the custom-house authorities at Matamoras of an amount of gold coin belonging to Dr. W. L. Hutchinson, a citizen of the United States, regarding which I am instructed in your dispatch No. 76, of the 15th ultimo, to make an investigation, and report to the department, I beg to state, that on the 12th ultimo I received from the consul at Matamoras a letter under date of the 27th of June, of which copy is inclosed herewith, to which I replied as per copy I beg also to inclose, and that I have addressed to that officer to-day a note of inquiry requesting the transmission to me of such evidence as can be furnished.

I have also noticed in the Diario Oficial of this government the reference to the case that will be seen in the articles and translations likewise inclosed herewith. In the latter appears what purports to be the protest made by the consul at Matamoras against the seizure of the money in question, and request for its return, and a copy of the reply of the collector at Matamoras.

I beg to call the special attention of the department to the temper and character of this reply to what appears to have been a moderate and proper protest, made by the consul of the United States in the line of his duty.

No further data is attainable by me here, and I have therefore to wait the reply of the consul to the inquiries I have addressed to him to-day.

The facts, so far as they are within my knowledge, regarding the regulations for the carrying of money from point to point within this country, are as follows:

In the interior of the republic no restriction is placed upon the right of such conveyance, and no pass is necessary.

A case, as I am informed, has lately been decided where merchants in Durango sent two hundred thousand dollars from that place to Monterey; on arriving at the gates of Monterey it was stopped, and a pass or permit demanded by the customs officials.

Not having such document, the money was seized on the charge that it was destined for the frontier for fraudulent exportation, there being an export duty on coined gold and silver. Bonds having been given, the money was released, and the case, which has been under trial for some years, has been decided in favor of the merchants, on the ground that in conveying money from one point to another, in the interior, no permit or license is necessary.

But on the coast or frontier, or going to the same, the local custom-house regulations, if not national law, appear to establish a different rule, and to there require that in carrying money above the sum necessary for immediate personal expenditures, a pass, or custom-house "guia," as it is termed, to show the legality of its destination, and to prevent clandestine exportation, shall be obtained.

I am not aware that there is any other country on the face of the globe, except, perhaps, one or two of the Spanish American States, that seeks a revenue by placing an export duty on money, or, as has been the case in this country, until the passage by the national congress of the law of estimate of federal receipts of the 27th of May last, a translation of which was transmitted to the department with my dispatch, No.

161, of the 17th ultimo, that has charged a duty upon the circulation of money.

These laws, especially the export duty on coined silver, which is now eight per cent., and on coined gold, one and one-half per cent., are the constant source of difficulties with this country, as in the recent case of the commander of the English man-of-war at Mazatlan, the affair of the steamer Danube at Vera Cruz, that of an American vessel wrecked near Matamoras, in December, 1866, and now in the present instance, and are not less unwise and injurious for Mexico, under all sound theories of finance and commerce, than they are vexatious to all engaging in business transactions here, and especially to foreigners temporarily sojourning in this country, or who may have occasion to convey funds from one point to another, along the coast or frontier, where facilities of exchange or remittance by commercial drafts do not exist.

If a custom-house permit is taken out, it is a notice which is almost the certain occasion of the person so carrying money being robbed.

If it is not taken out, the customs officials assume that the intention was to defraud the revenue by a fraudulent export, and seize and confiscate the sum carried, one-third of the amount so seized accruing to the benefit of the person furnishing information leading to the seizure.

In the case of Dr. Hutchinson, under consideration, it appears probable from the statement of the consul at Matamoras, that in proceeding, as stated, from Matamoras to Tuxpan, he either was afraid to take out a permit for the above reasons, perhaps traveling alone, or was unaware that such license was necessary. If his journey was bona fide as is asserted, his case is one of great hardship, and of no legitimate utility to Mexico, if there is any desire in this country to encourage foreign immigration.

On this ground, even if the local regulations at Matamoras require a permit, and Dr. Hutchinson had none, it would seem only the part of good comity for the government of Mexico to order the restitution of the money.

As to the right of the consuls of the United States to intervene for the protection of the interests of American citizens in such cases, and to protest when it may be necessary, which is denied in the very offensive communication from the collector at Matamoras to the consul of the United States at that port, a copy of which, as published in the official paper of the supreme government of this republic, I have inclosed herewith, I do not doubt the department will make such assertion in the present instance as may be necessary.

Awaiting your further instructions, I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Scott to Mr. Plumb.

UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
Matamoras, Mexico, June 27, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state to you on or about the 27th day of May last I sent a dispatch directed to you containing a statement of the seizure and illegal detention of one hundred (100) ounces of gold belonging to Dr. W. L. Hutchinson, an American citizen, whose residence is in Tuxpan, Mexico. As I have as yet received no dispatch acknowledging the receipt of the same, I am apprehensive that it has not been permitted to reach you, and I see very erroneous statements in the newspapers in regard to the same.

I have sent a statement of the case to the Two Republics for publication; you will please give the case your consideration in justice to an American citizen, and in case my dispatch of the 27th of May has not come to hand, you can get in substance the statement of the case in the Two Republics, if they publish my letter of to-day. It is well known here by disinterested parties that Dr. Hutchinson did not attempt to evade the law, and he also made it known to his friends, some time previously to his starting for Tuxpan, that this money was to purchase land in the Tuxpan Colony and as he is a poor man, the robbery completely stops all his business.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

T. W. SCOTT,
United States Consul.

Hon. E. L. PLUMB, United States Minister, Mexico.

[From the Two Republics, Mexico, Wednesday, July 15, 1868.]

"JUSTICE TO ALL."

We insert the communication of Mr. Thomas W. Scott, United States consul at Matamoras, with the double view of gratifying a worthy gentleman, and as an act of "justice to all," including the indefatigable and efficient American consul at the port stated:

"UNITED STATES CONSULATE,
"Heroic Matamoras, June 27, 1868.

"Editor of the Two Republics:

"SIR: I see in your paper of June 10th an article headed justice to all, in which you say 'Dr. Hutchinson attempted to introduce a hundred ounces in gold into Mexico without paying the duty. For that violation the funds were seized and held subject to the courts. At once the American consul protested against enforcing the law, and demanded the return of the money.' As you must have been erroneously informed, you will please allow me to correct the statement through your columns.

"In the first place the statement is incorrect, where you say Mr. 'Hutchinson attempted to introduce a hundred ounces without paying the duty.' He was only attempting to carry his money from Matamoras to Tuxpan, Mexico, (his place of residence) and was not aware that it was necessary for him to get a special permit to carry his money from one town to another in Mexico, and so soon as he was informed that it was necessary, he manifested a willingness to comply with the law. The Mexican officials did not claim at that time there were duties to be paid on the money, but he had failed to get a permit, which would have cost him twenty-five cents, and for this the money was seized, and is still held by the Mexican officials. In the second place your statement is incorrect when you say that the American consul at once protested against enforcing the law against an American sovereign. The protest was not made for several days after the seizure of said money, hoping that the matter would be settled after an investigation, and the money returned, as it was only a simple act of justice that it should be. As the Mexican officials failed to account for all the money taken, and proposed to compromise with Dr. Hutchinson by giving $250 of his own money, providing he would sign a receipt drawn up by themselves, relinquishing all his right to the $1,600, and obligate himself to take no further action in the case, I, having the blank receipt referred to on my desk at the time, I protested against their proceedings, a copy of which can be seen in the consulate when called for, which was sufficient evidence to me that they had not proceeded strictly according to law. They had a legal right to all of said money, or had no right to any of it. The heading of your article referred to is good, but in order to be 'just to all,' we must be correctly informed.

"I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

"THOMAS W. SCOTT,
"United States Consul."

By the above it will be seen that the $1,600 seized by the custom-house officer at Matamoras was not attempted to be introduced into Mexico, without paying duty, as was stated in our paper of the 10th ultimo. Dr. Hutchinson was only carrying his money from Matamoras to Tuxpan, Mexico, his place of residence, without knowing that a special permit was required to carry money from one town to another in Mexico. It must be a source of great annoyance and mortification to the government to be called upon so frequently to correct the conduct of the insatiable sharks of the custom-house.

The custom-house department of the government is the only one where the subordinates seem to be endeavoring to enforce the law. In every other department of the government there is a lamentable laxity of duty. But in the custom-house there is a zeal which carries its employes "over to the other side" of justice. Why this great difference in the different departments? The question is answered that money is the motive power, and corruption is the means employed. We are constantly in receipt of intelligence of these corrupt practices in the custom-houses. Not on the Rio Grande only, nor on the Pacific coast; but elsewhere and nearer to the fountain source of law and justice. The case at Matamoras is a clear one of corruption. The officials offer to restore $250 out of the $1,600, if Dr. Hutchinson will obligate himself to hush up the matter. The act of retaining the $1,350 appears to be dishonest from the fact that the officials required "that no further action should be taken in the case." The dishonesty of the act appears only to be exceeded in the unblushing shamelessness of the perpetrators. They have no shame and care nothing for the exposure; but only demanded that they should not be prosecuted. The consul took the right ground when he assured that the officials "had a right to all of said money, or had no right to any of it;" and that they had not proceeded strictly according to law.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Scott.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, July 13, 1868.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt on the 23d ultimo of your communications of the 3d, 7th, and 11th of June, and on the 30th ultimo of that of the 17th of June, together with the documents accompanying them, respectively, all relating to the claim of J. B. de Gruy and Rosa Baca de Gruy. I have also to acknowledge the receipt on the 12th instant of your letter of the 27th ultimo, relating to the case of Dr. W. L. Hutchinson. No previous communication from you upon that subject has reached me. All of your communications have received my attention. In addition I would suggest that, if you have not already done so, it would be advisable for you to send a clear and full statement of each of these cases, with the respective documents, as of such other cases as may arise, direct to the Department of State at Washington. Such special instructions may then be sent to me as the circumstances may require.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

THOMAS W. SCOTT, Esq.,
United States Consul, Matamoras.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Scott.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, August 4, 1868.

SIR: Instructions have been sent to me from the Department of State at Washington relating to the case reported by you to the department on the 29th of June, and referred to in your communication to me of the 27th of that month, of the seizure by the custom-house authorities at Matamoras of an amount of gold coin belonging to Dr. W. L. Hutchinson, a citizen of the United States. I have therefore to request you to forward to me such evidence as can be furnished in the case and particularly upon the following points, viz:

1. As to where Dr. Hutchinson was proceeding when the money in question was seized; and as to his intention of using the same in the country or of exporting it.
2. As to the regulations in force at Matamoras regarding the carrying of money from that place to any other point within the republic, along the coast or to the interior, whether any pass or permit is required.
3. As to whether Dr. Hutchinson had such pass or permit.
4. As to the nature and amount of the penalty for carrying money without such permit.

I would further suggest that a copy of such evidence be also forwarded direct to the Department of State, if not already transmitted in accordance with the suggestion in my letter to you of the 13th ultimo.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

THOMAS W. SCOTT, Esq.,
United States Consul, Matamoras.

[From the Diario Oficial, City of Mexico, June 10, 1868.—Translation.]

TAMAULIPAS.

An American, Dr. Hutchinson, tried to smuggle out from Matamoras to Brownsville a hundred ounces (pieces of sixteen dollars) of gold; the inspector discovered the fraud and the ounces were confiscated.

It appears that the American consul protested and asked from the custom-house authorities the return of the money. The Observador says that the protest is inopportune and unfounded, and recommends energetic proceedings.

The papers of Brownsville have raised a great cry about this affair, and pretend that the American government will intervene.

[From the Diario Oficial, City of Mexico, June 14, 1868.—Translation.]

TAMAULIPAS.

The Observador of Matamoras published the two following documents relative to the ounces of an American, of which our readers have already heard:

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Heroic Matamoras, Mexico, May 21, 1868.

[MY DEAR SIR: I have the honor to protest against the seizure and detention of one hundred ounces of Mexican gold, or $1,600, belonging to Dr. W. L. Hutchinson, a citizen of the United States, and I respectfully request that you will be pleased immediately to return the said sum to that gentleman.]

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS W. SCOTT.
United States Consul.

Señor D. PEDRO A. GALVAN,
Collector of the Maritime Custom-house of Matamoras, Mexico.

MARITIME AND FRONTIER CUSTOM-HOUSE OF MATAMORAS.

I received yesterday the communication which, under date of the 21st instant, you addressed to me. In it you protest against the seizure and detention of one hundred ounces of Mexican gold belonging to Mr. W. L. Hutchinson. You ask also that the said sum shall be immediately delivered to that gentleman. In your communication you have fallen into a slight error. There were not one hundred ounces seized, but ninety-nine. Mr. Hutchinson kept in his pocket the ounce that is lacking to complete the one hundred, according to official information that I have received. The seizure of this sum was made on the 16th instant at the gate of Puertas Verdes, which is the outlet from this city for Boca del Rio, (the mouth of the river.)

Mr. Hutchinson did not exhibit the documents with which he should have accredited the legality of the carrying of the money; it was therefore seized, and judicial proceedings have to be followed, to investigate whether the money was carried or not with the requisites prescribed by the laws, and consequently whether or not the penalty of confiscation has to be imposed. This is sufficient to show to you that I cannot take into consideration your request that the money seized should be returned, and that the judicial proceedings cannot be interrupted on account of said request.

With reference to your protest it can neither be taken into consideration by me, because the office under my charge does not admit steps of that character. I have a superior to whom I give account of my conduct; that superior is the Mexican government, to whom you can address your protests by means of your minister in Mexico.

The law which determines the nature and extent of the faculties which belong to foreign consuls in the republic is that of the 26th November, 1859. I invite you to fix your attention upon it. I also call your attention to our fiscal laws and the requisites exacted for the conveyance of treasure, and to what is provided for cases such as the present. All these laws will very clearly indicate whether the position taken by you in this affair is that which its nature requires.

With this motive I protest to you my attentive consideration.

Independence and liberty! Heroic Matamoras, May 23, 1868.

PEDRO A. GALVAN.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copy of a telegram and of subsequent communication by mail, received from the United States commercial agent at Mazatlan, reporting that the English government had taken upon itself the adjustment of the difficulties occurred at that place, and inclosing a communication addressed to him by the commander of her Majesty's ship Chanticleer, stating that all restrictions placed upon the port of Mazatlan were from that day, July 20, removed.

Copy of a previous dispatch from Mr. Sisson, under date of July 6, is likewise inclosed herewith. I have also the honor to transmit herewith copies of communications I have to-day received from the English vice-consul and the consul of Prussia at Mazatlan, acknowledging those addressed to them by me on the 6th of July, of which copies were transmitted to the department with my dispatch (No. 156) of the 7th ultimo.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Mr. Sisson to Mr. Plumb.

No. 2.]

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mazatlan, July 6, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that for want of time, I could not write by the extraordinary, giving you the information I wished.

On the 16th of June last, Captain Bridges, of her Majesty's ship Chanticleer, and his paymaster, were passing the custom-house on the way to their boat, when the latter was arrested and taken into the custom-house and searched. They found on him three hundred and sixty dollars in ounces, and about fifty dollars of change, which the paymaster said was his pocket money, (the captain and paymaster at the time protesting against the act.) The authorities kept the three hundred and sixty dollars, but gave back the pocket money. The next day the captain wrote to General Corona asking for the money to be returned. Corona wrote back in answer, as you will see by the correspondence, stating it was a matter for the courts and not for him to decide.

On the 18th the captain came on shore accompanied by one of his lieutenants, both in full uniform, and on their returning they were both stopped by a custom-house official and searched; then commenced the correspondence that is now laid before you.

The blockade is still kept up in regard to Mexican vessels, but no others. On the 27th ultimo, the United States steamers Saranac and Resaca came into port, and I immediately reported the case to the commanders; the Saranac leaves to-day for San Francisco, the Resaca remaining. I understand, but not officially, that the blockade will be kept up until the English admiral is heard from.

I have the honor to remain your obedient servant,

ISAAC SISSON,
United States Commercial Agent.

HON. EDWARD L. PLUMB,
United States Chargé d'Affaires, Mexico.

Mr. Fuhrken to Mr. Plumb.

PRUSSIAN CONSULATE,
Pto. de Mazatlan, July 17, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 6th instant.

Please accept my most sincere thanks for the generous attention bestowed on my request.

Mr. Woolrich will recognize direct the important service you have rendered to his government.

I beg to add the expression of gratitude I personally, and the community at large, feel for the prompt and most efficacious action you took in the matter of her Britannic Majesty's ship Chanticleer.

I have handed your note, and the answer of the Mexican government, to Mr. Woolrich, who will communicate them to Captain Bridges when he returns.

The Chanticleer left us a few days ago, probably with the object to replenish her stores in San Blas. We expect her back in a few days, together with the Cameleon, due here since the 1st instant.

The admiral's answer may come to-morrow, by the steamer from California.

Captain Bridges, in the meanwhile, has permitted the coasting vessels to enter and leave the port.

I did not see him personally since the 18th June, but heard from him through Captain Farly of the United States steamer Saranac, and Commander Bradford of the United States steamer Resaca, who happened to touch here with their vessels.

Both are old acquaintances of mine, and we have frequently talked on the subject. They consider the insult offered Captain Bridges a very serious one, which could not be overlooked by his government. At the same time they do not consider the established blockade as legal, and I attribute it partly to their conciliatory advice that Captain Bridges has observed so much leniency of late.

With the same desire for reconciliation on the part of the Mexican government, the difficulty would be easily settled, but I fear their reluctance in giving a decisive answer, the ample field left to our authorities to build up new expedients according to their wishes, will lead to new complications and not spare us the fate of being the victims.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant, the Prussian consul,
C. FUHRKEN.

BRITISH VICE-CONSULATE,
Mazatlan, July 18, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your communication of the 6th instant in reply to mine of the 23d ultimo, and beg to thank you very sincerely for the trouble and interest you have taken in the matter on which I took the liberty of addressing you.

Although the Mexican government does not seem to have given so much attention in their comments upon the gross insult offered to Commander Bridges, as upon the matter of the money taken from the paymaster of the Chanticleer, still, I have no doubt that in their private instructions they will have been more explicit, and have authorized General Corona to do every justice, and afford an ample satisfaction.

The blockade of the port has been merely nominal, as Commander Bridges went out to sea and allowed the Mexican vessels to leave the port, returning only this morning to his anchorage after a cruise of some eight days, in anticipation of the arrival of the San Francisco steamer, which has not yet come in sight.

I have the conviction that this question will have a pacific solution, and the satisfaction to know that your kind interference will have contributed largely towards effecting the same.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient, humble servant,

C. WOOLRICH.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, August 12, 1868.

SIR: Under the instruction contained in your dispatch No. 75, of the 8th ultimo, relating to the outrage inflicted by Mexican authorities upon a number of citizens of the United States, at Monterey, I addressed a note on the 7th instant to this government, embodying mainly the terms of that dispatch.

A copy of the same is inclosed herewith.

I have now to transmit to the department a copy of the reply of the Mexican government, addressed to me on the 11th instant.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Plumb to Señor Azpiroz.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, August 7, 1868.

SIR: The Secretary of State of the United States has received from the United States consul at Monterey the depositions of the citizens of the United States who were the subjects of the late indignity at that place.

A copy of the same is inclosed herewith.

These depositions make a case in which the police and subordinate officials of the city of Monterey, acting under the direction of the secretary of the state government, committed great indignity and inexcusable outrage against the persons, rights, and sensibilities of the complainants.

While it is very manifest that the federal government of Mexico could neither have authorized nor contemplated the possibility of such an outrage, it is, at the same time equally manifest that the authorities of the State were unrestrained by any consideration of prudence or of respect for the United States.

The government and people of the United States cannot but feel deeply grieved by the outrage, unless it shall be in a satisfactory manner explained, and if not so explained, shall be properly rebuked by the government of Mexico.

I am instructed to lose no time or occasion in soliciting such redress.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. MANUEL AZPIROZ,

Chief Clerk in charge of the Department of Foreign Affairs of the Republic of Mexico.

Señor Azpiroz to Mr. Plumb

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Mexico, August 11, 1868.

SIR: I have received your note of the 7th instant, and the copies annexed, relating to the proceedings that were employed in the city of Monterey, on the night of the 21st of April last, with six American citizens, who were placed in the prison of that city on account of having been accused of drunkenness and disturbance.

You state in your note that the consul of the United States at Monterey had remitted to the government of the United States the depositions (copies of which are the annexes to which I have referred) of the said citizens of that republic, and that both the government and the people of the same cannot but feel deeply grieved by those proceedings, unless they shall be explained in a satisfactory manner, and if not so explained, shall be rebuked by the government of Mexico.

These desires are very just, assuming the injuries of which the said American citizens complain to have taken place, and the government of Mexico under that supposition will not delay a moment in satisfying them in conformity with the indications you make in the name of your government, immediately that it receives the official documents in this affair existing in Monterey, which it has lately asked from the governor of Nuevo Leon, directing that the same be punctually remitted by return of mail.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MANUEL AZPIROZ,
Chief Clerk.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, August 21, 1868.

SIR: Under the instructions contained in your dispatch No. 65, of the 29th of May last, received by duplicate on the 13th instant, relating to the death of Mr. John Braniff, a citizen of the United States, from wounds inflicted by a band of robbers while at work upon the Puebla branch of the Mexico and Vera Cruz railway, in April last, I addressed a note to the department of foreign affairs of this government, on the 14th instant, of which I beg to transmit a copy herewith.

I have to-day received a reply, under date of the 18th instant, from Mr. Azpiroz, in charge of the department, of which I beg also to transmit a copy and translation herewith.

In this reply it is stated that as there are not in the department of foreign affairs antecedents relative to whether the apprehension of the murderers of Mr. Braniff has been effected, the necessary information has been asked from the governors of the States of Puebla and Tlaxcala, and that when it arrives the government will direct what in justice may be required.

Mr. Azpiroz takes exception to the observation contained in my note, that cases such as that treated of are unfortunately common in Mexico, and that their frequency is no doubt owing to the comparative impunity of the offenders.

I have not thought it necessary to make any reply to his remarks under this head, unless I should receive your instructions to that effect.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Plumb to Señor Azpiroz.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, August 14, 1868.

SIR: In a dispatch under date of the 29th of May last, but which only reached me yesterday, I am advised that the Department of State at Washington has been informed by Mr. Black, the vice-consul of the United States in this city, of the death of Mr. John Braniff, a citizen of the United States, from wounds inflicted by a band of robbers at a bridge on the Puebla branch of the Mexico and Vera Cruz railway, in April last.

The Secretary of State adds, that although such events may and do happen in every country, they are unfortunately common in Mexico, and their frequency is no doubt owing to the comparative impunity of the offenders.

I am instructed to bring this case to the attention of the Mexican government, and to express the expectation of the government of the United States that the government of Mexico will exert all its authority to bring the murderers of Mr. Braniff to justice.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

HON. MANUEL AZPIROZ,
Chief Clerk in charge of the Department of Foreign Affairs of the Mexican Republic.

Señor Azpiroz to Mr. Plumb.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Mexico, August 18, 1868.

SIR: I received yesterday your note of the 14th of the present month, in which you have been pleased to communicate to me that you have instructions from your government to submit to the consideration of the Mexican government the case of the assassination committed by certain robbers upon the person of the citizen of the United States, Mr. John Braniff, at Santa Cruz, between Apizaco and Puebla, in the month of April last; and to state that the government of the United States expects that of Mexico will use all its authority to have the assassins delivered up to justice.

As there are not in this department antecedents relative to whether the apprehension of the murderers of Mr. Braniff has been effected, the necessary information was yesterday asked from the governors of Puebla and Tlaxcala, and when it arrives the government will direct what in justice may be required.

To this I should limit myself, if in your said note there was not found the idea that to the impunity which, up to a certain point, criminals have in Mexico, it is due, without doubt, that cases such as that treated of are more frequent in this than in other countries.

If with impartiality the circumstances of Mexico are considered—due to the war which for a long time has overthrown public order in this country, and to other causes well known to all, but beyond the volition and against the interests of the people and of the government of Mexico—neither the government nor the people of Mexico can be blamed because robberies and assassinations are committed here; nor, in comparing these crimes with those that are found to be committed in established countries in identical circumstances with those of Mexico, can the statement be ventured that they are here more frequent.

Notorious are the efforts that the government has made and is making to completely re-establish security for the lives, the rights, and the property of all the inhabitants of the republic. These efforts have so far had the best possible results.

The malefactors apprehended are submitted to the tribunals, or exemplarily punished in the act of being caught en flagrante, in conformity with the laws of the country.

The constant and efficacious persecution of evil doers, and their treatment according to the laws, is very far from signifying impunity.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

MANUEL AZPIROZ,
Chief Clerk.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, August 22, 1868.

SIR: As presenting what may be considered the almost universal public sentiment at present existing in this country with regard to the renewal of diplomatic relations with European powers, I transmit herewith translation of an editorial article upon that subject which appeared in the leading journal of this city, the Siglo XIX, on the 13th instant, and bears the signature of the editor-in-chief, Mr. Francisco Zarco, formerly minister of foreign affairs under President Juarez, and lately president of congress, and now one of the most prominent members of that body, as also probably the most influential of the newspaper writers of the republic.

While this article may not altogether express the views of the government, its action may doubtless be influenced to a great extent by deference to prevailing public sentiment.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

FOREIGN RELATIONS OF MEXICO.

[From the Siglo XIX, City of Mexico, August 13, 1868.—Editorial.—Translation.]

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

The republic, since its triumph over foreign usurpation, has been found deprived of all kinds of diplomatic relations with the European powers. From such situation there has not resulted any evil to the country, nor to the foreigners who reside in it. The government has been free from the pressure which the legations of Europe have always pretended to exercise, and foreigners have been favored and protected by the Mexican laws and authorities, it being noted that the insolence of those pretensions, which had for their object to create a situation superior to that of the natives of the country, and to claim indemnizations for losses originating in fortuitous cases, has diminished.

If diplomatic relations have ceased, that is to say, the relations of governments with government by means of legations, there have not been interrupted the relations between people and people, which consist in navigation and in commerce. Mexico has declared by the organ of its supreme authorities that it considers as broken the treaties which united it with all the powers that recognized the so-called empire; but it has declared, also, that its laws protect all foreigners, and that its ports are open to the commerce of the entire world.

This conduct—dignified, prudent, and moderate—has given good results. It is true that in Europe they continue propagating calumnies against our country, but it is also true that our most bloody enemies are obliged to recognize that the government makes laudable efforts to establish regular order, that the republic in the hour of triumph has been generous and magnanimous with its enemies, and that foreigners, without excepting the French, enjoy guarantees and security.

No injury, therefore, has been caused to any one by the interruption of diplomatic relations between Mexico and the European powers, and what has occurred has demonstrated that these relations are not indispensable, either for the development of commerce or for the exchange of ideas between peoples, or for the interests of foreigners who reside in Mexico, and that at any moment they can have recourse, the same as the Mexicans, to the tribunals and other authorities.

Without the necessity of legations, a part of the foreign debt has been paid, and equitable arrangements have been made between the government and claimants in some affairs which, perhaps, treated diplomatically, would have given origin to a thousand difficulties and embarrassments.

Such a state of things has, without doubt, led public opinion in Mexico to see with absolute indifference the news which from time to time is put out with reference to the disposition in which various of the European governments are with regard to the renewal of diplomatic relations with that of the republic.

The history of these relations enables us to understand that from them we cannot expect to derive any advantage or any positive good, and that, on the other hand, they may be the cause of new conflicts and of serious difficulties. This leads it to be generally desired that the actual situation should be prolonged, notwithstanding its inconveniences and irregularities, as it is neither one of peace nor of war, and gives rise to such disagreeable incidents as those of the packet Danube, in Vera Cruz, and the frigate Chanticleer, in Mazatlan. Because this desire exists it is not to be inferred, in any manner, that Mexico is a country of Chinese or Japanese ideas; that it entertains hatred to foreigners; that it seeks to isolate itself, to deliver itself up to its own fate, and separate itself from all contact with civilized peoples. Nothing of this. Mexico, in looking with repugnance and suspicion upon diplomatic relations with Europe, because they have been to it injurious and prejudicial, desires direct relations of people with people, and offers to the foreigner the same advantages that are afforded to its own citizens, upon the condition only that they shall have the same obligations.

The Spanish American republics, upon conquering their independence by their own efforts, fell into the error of believing that they required for their existence the recognition of the great powers, as if these great powers did not have for their rule of conduct to admit accomplished events. Such recognition signifies nothing, nor is it necessary to implore it, when it has always to be the precise consequence of the maintenance of whatever nationality. The Mexican republic, in its happy restoration, has not incurred the error of its early years, and we are seeing that the republican government neither to exist nor to exercise its functions, neither for the pacification nor for the reorganization of the country, requires in any way diplomatic relations with Europe.

The foreigners who reside among us have to acknowledge, if they are sincere, that nothing is lost by not having the protection of their legations, that before exposed them to grave inconveniences.

While these legations were a constant embarrassment, and a continual difficulty for our government, they afforded no protection to foreigners, nor did they render any aid towards the improvement of their interests, or in favor of the cause of progress and civilization; but, on the contrary, violating the rules of neutrality and of public law, they allied themselves almost always with the retrograde faction, and with those who are systematically hostile to foreigners.

The French deputy, Jules Favre, had more than sufficient reason to state in full legislative corps, that the bonds of Jecker were the sole cause of the French intervention, with all its consequences. Private reclamations, speculative affairs, unjust pretensions, unfounded indemnizations, excessive brokerages, these have been the affairs with which the European legations have been occupied.

We repeat, in nothing have these legations promoted either in favor of their citizens in general, or of the cause of civilization. It is true that the governments of Europe have acted in the same manner, for when the government of Mr. Juarez sought to elevate the freedom of religion decreed by the laws of reform, to the rank of an international stipulation, giving it a place in the treaties with the governments of Europe, who make so much parade of liberalism, they did not even answer this notable initiative of the Mexican republic, which sought to place throughout the entire world freedom of conscience, under the protecting guarantee of public law.

That Mexico is in the right in considering as broken the treaties with the powers that recognized Maximilian, is an unquestionable point, since these powers treating with the usurper were those who failed in all their engagements with the Mexican nation.

This point is still more unquestionable with respect to England and Spain, who made so many protests on signing the convention of London, that it was not their intention to intervene in the affairs of Mexico, nor to change its institutions.

The decorous determination of the republic to hold the treaties as broken so long as the European powers do not ask to enter into new relations under equitable bases, it can easily be understood, has wounded in the most lively manner the susceptibilities of the foreign offices, and has occasioned vacillations in them, as to the conduct they have to observe with respect to our country. Some governments have to take care, above all, not to disgust the man of the Tuilleries, and something of this is discovered in what has passed in the court of Florence, where French influence still predominates.

For our part, we persist in the opinion that nothing, absolutely nothing, should we do to hasten the re-establishment of our diplomatic relations with Europe; that our attitude should be that of mere expectative, and that in making new treaties we should be exceedingly cautious—reject the old clause of falsely called reciprocity, and establish that foreigners in Mexico have to have the same rights and the same obligations as Mexicans.

This will not prevent that at the same time we should give the greatest freedom to the commerce of importation; that we should liberally reform our tariff; that we should make a point of national honor of hospitality and protection to all foreigners; and, in fine, that we should exert ourselves to attract to our soil an intelligent and laborious population, which we so much require to cement peace and consolidate our institutions.

Nor will this prevent Mexico from cultivating and drawing closer its good relations with the United States, in which there is not the least peril, neither for our nationality nor for the integrity of our territory. At the same time Mexico can and should promote the alliance of all the American republics against all projects of re-conquest, of invasion, or of intervention, on the part of Europe.

We have believed it convenient to enter into these considerations, now that the question of the re-establishment of diplomatic relations has become the order of the day, by the repetition of the news that the governments of Italy and of North Germany have resolved to send legations to Mexico, and that the English bondholders will treat directly with our government, without asking the diplomatic protection of the British government.

As is seen, these reports do not refer to the powers that had a responsibility in the work of the intervention—that is to say, Spain and England—and there must be much fewer difficulties in treating with the King of Italy, and, above all, with the German Confederation, which is a new political entity that has come into the world since the fall of Maximilian, and for that reason did not recognize the so-called empire.

However, with Italy and with Germany, we counsel the same precautions as with whatever other power.

This is not the moment to enlarge upon the advantages of establishing close relations with the Germanic peoples, nor of examining the situation of Europe, with respect to the United States, in order to select our friends upon the old continent.

This is a task we will undertake when we believe it opportune; but we can now declare that it appears to us the most strange and inapplicable of illusions, the idea of going in search of European alliances to avert from us perils more or less remote from the side of the United States.

What occurred in the war of Texas, it appears to us, affords us sufficient light in this respect.

In our belief, the strength of Mexico, as an independent nation, has to be derived, not from foreign alliances, but from its own political institutions, and its material progress.

The last news which has been transmitted by telegraph, and which we published day before yesterday, appears to us very satisfactory. Lord Stanley declares that for the renewal of diplomatic relations with Mexico it is necessary that the republic should take the initiative. May it be far off! Well should we abstain from taking such a step.

The French government has assigned four millions of francs for the payment of the bonds known as Franco-Mexican, after scandalous revelations made in the legislative corps. This is also very well.

We are glad this time that France is sufficiently rich to pay for its glories—the glories of the intervention and of the Jecker affair.

FRANCISCO ZARCO.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: With my dispatch No. 46, of the 12th of December last, I transmitted to the department copy of a law issued on the 27th of the preceding month, putting in practice the decimal system of coinage, and providing that from the 15th of September of the present year the circulation of money of the so-called imperial coinage, and of twelve and a half and six and a quarter cent pieces, should be abolished.

As of some interest to commerce, I now transmit herewith translation of an executive order published in the Diario Oficial of this government of the 22d instant, continuing the former coinage in circulation until further orders.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

EXECUTIVE ORDER CONTINUING IN CIRCULATION THE FORMER COIN.

[From the Diario Oficial, August 22, 1868.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 5.

The citizen minister, in an official note of the 15th instant, states to this department as follows:

"In reply to your attentive communication of the 11th instant, in which you have been pleased to transcribe to me that which, under date of the 5th instant, was addressed to you by the citizen governor of the State of Puebla, inquiring what he had to do to give compliance to the provisions of article 13 of the law issued by this department on the 27th of November of last year, I have the honor to state to you that although the government continues occupying itself with what relates to the arrangement of the coinage, in my opinion, it would be very convenient that by the department under your worthy charge it should be provided by circulars to the governors of the States that, until there should be published the dispositions relative to the redemption of the so-called imperial coinage, and of that which is not in conformity with the decimal system, it be directed that the circulation be continued, as until now, in order that the poorer classes of society be not prejudiced."

And I transcribe the same to you, by order of the citizen President, to the end that you make known to the inhabitants of your State (district or territory) that the coinage actually in circulation is to continue in its legal course so long as the change is not made to which the department of fomento refers.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 28, 1868.

SIR: On the 25th of June last, the United States consul at La Paz wrote to this department that the present military commander and political chief of that territory had just then issued a decree imposing a tax of eight and a half per cent. on the export of all bullion or uncoined silver, in place of the previous tax of only two and one-half per cent.

The consul writes further that the military commander declares that this proceeding was taken by order of the general government of Mexico. The consul, however, gives us no evidence in support of this statement. He writes that so heavy a tax must lead to great loss, and that it is already causing a suspension of work; that nearly one-fourth of the territory derive their support from two reducing establishments which are in operation in the territory, being the only ones there, and both owned by citizens of the United States who have invested much capital therein.

It is the undoubted right of Mexico to levy duties upon exports as well as imports, provided that they are not levied so as to discriminate injuriously to the prejudice of the citizens or subjects of foreign countries. The custom of friendly nations allows any one who suffers inconvenience by revenue legislation to make a representation of that inconvenience.

You will, therefore, after entering upon the duties of your mission, seek a convenient opportunity to converse informally with the minister of foreign affairs upon the subject indicated.

Your proceedings in the premises are approved.

Long prior to the receipt of your dispatch, the attention of this government having been drawn to the organization to which it refers, prompt and it is believed effectual measures were taken for their suppression and the maintenance of our laws for the preservation of neutrality. DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, September 1, 1868.

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 4th of August, No. 167, which treats of a complaint in the case of Dr. Hutchinson. It appears by that statement that the regulations of the revenue service in Mexico require that persons who are transporting in the interior a larger amount of money than is reasonably necessary for traveling purposes shall secure a custom-house permit. It further appears that this regulation has been adopted as a security against a clandestine exportation of coin, and that coin transported without such a permit is liable to forfeiture. Dr. Hutchinson, having neglected to procure such a permit, sixteen hundred dollars in coin, which he had while traveling, was seized by the revenue officers, and judicial proceedings were instituted for its confiscation. The regulation is one which it is competent for the Mexican government to make, and the proceedings seem thus far to be regular. If there shall be ground for diplomatic remonstrance on the occasion, that ground does not yet appear, nor can it become available until after the judicial proceedings shall be closed and the whole matter shall become a subject for review.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

City of Mexico, September 11, 1868.

SIR: With my dispatch No. 150, of the 30th of June last, I transmitted to the department translation of proceedings had in the Mexican congress just prior to the close of the last session in the impeachment of the governor of the State of Jalisco.

Under the Mexican constitution such proceedings have two instances. First, congress, acting as a grand jury, declares the guilt or innocence of the accused; and secondly, the supreme court, acting as a jury of sentence, as it is termed, pronounces the penalty.

In the present case congress declared the culpability of the governor of Jalisco. This declaration, under the constitution, works what is held by some to be a suspension from office, and by others to be a permanent removal.

In the present case another feature was introduced by the fact that as yet no law has been framed establishing the penalties in the cases of official responsibility.

Under these circumstances the supreme court, on the 22d of last month, pronounced a decision in this case.

It declares the verdict of congress to have involved only a suspension from office, and by the suspension already experienced the governor of Jalisco to have been purged from his offense, and places him at liberty and restores him to office.

This action has naturally given great satisfaction to the friends of the governor of Jalisco, while it is a severe disappointment to those who favored the action taken in this matter by congress.

As illustrating the course of proceedings in such cases in this country, I beg to transmit a translation of the decision referred to, herewith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

DECISION OF THE SUPREME COURT IN THE CASE OF THE GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF JALISCO, IMPEACHED BY THE NATIONAL CONGRESS.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, August 29, 1868.—Translation.]

SUPREME COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE NATION.

In the city of Mexico, this 23d day of August, 1868, being met in the hall of sessions of the supreme court of justice of the United Mexican States, the citizens Chief Justice Lerdo de Tejada, Justices Riva Palacio, Lafragua, Ordaz, Cardoza, Castillo Velasco, Guzman, Valasquez, Zavala, and Garcia Ramirez, and Prosecuting Attorney General Guzman, for the purpose of acting as a jury of sentence to pronounce the corresponding decision in the cause instituted against Don José Antonio Gomez Cuervo, constitutional governor of the State of Jalisco, for not having respected the order of the district judge of Guadalajara, that declared open the proceedings of amparo, (protection,) and ordered the suspension of the execution of five criminals, which act was deemed culpable by the congress of the Union, erected in jury of accusation, as there was therein involved an infraction of the law of the 30th of November, 1861, and of the constitution. The record of the proceedings in the case having been read in public audience; having been heard the opinion of the prosecuting attorney, (fiscal,) which concludes asking that the supreme court of justice declare that the governor of Jalisco, Don José Antonio Gomez Cuervo, has not incurred penalty whatever, there being no law which designates the same, and that in equity he should be held to be compurged with the time that has passed of suspension from his office, in consequence of the verdict of culpability; the allegation of the accusers, citizens Apolonio Angulo and Silviano Moreno, in which, without fixing the penalty merited by the offender, they insist in manifesting that the separation ordered by article 105 of the constitution involves a formal destitution from office; the defense of the accused, by his counsel, the citizen Alfonso Lancaster Jones, opposing the arguments of the accusers, and asking that it be declared that the accused has not incurred any penalty for lack of a special law of responsibility, or that he be considered sufficiently punished by the suffering already experienced; having been seen the record of the proceedings, with all else that has been presented and that has relation to the cause.

Considering, in so far as relates to the understanding that should be given to the words "shall be immediately separated from said office," which are used in article 105 of the constitution—

First, that the argument that is alleged, that from the said words a true destitution is to be understood, which consists in that the design of the constituent congress of 1857 was to establish in the republic the impeachment trials of the United States of the North, is not exact, as it appears from the history of the said congress that the project was rejected.

Second, that the idea adopted for trials of responsibility was that of the citizen deputy Marcelino Castañeda, and from his remarks it appears that the first trial only works the suspension of the functionary until the termination of the proceedings.

Third, that these proceedings being intrusted to two juries, the one of fact and the other of sentence, and destitution being evidently a penalty, it cannot be decreed by the judges of the fact.

And fourth, that whatever may have been the design of the legislators, there is no legal motive to alter the signification of the words used in article 105, and particularly when in the preceding article the same words are used to signify solely the suspension of the accused, as has been understood and recognized by all without the natural sense of the same having been placed in doubt.

Considering, in so far as relates to the penalty which should be imposed upon the accused—

First, that the jury is found under the precise obligation of pronouncing a condemnatory sentence, admitting the declaration of culpability made by the congress of the Union erected in grand jury, and the disposition that it made of the criminal.

Second, that the examination being concluded and the proceedings terminated, it is indispensable to fix the condition of the criminal by a definitive sentence, the court proceeding with the authority given to it by the constitution and conformably to law, as to leave uncertain the status of the person prosecuted for an indefinite time, perhaps without termination, would be the most unjust violation of the constitutional guarantees.

Third, that in the proceedings there appear circumstances proved which very greatly extenuate the offense, and which any ordinary judge should take into consideration, and still more a jury, by the very nature of its institution.

Fourth, that these circumstances attenuate in such a manner the culpability that they have influenced the minds of the jury to impose a minimum penalty.

And, fifth, that no special law having been issued regulating official offenses and fixing the penalties.

The jury having in consideration the reasons expressed, decrees—

First, the separation of Don José Antonio Gomez Cuerva from his office by virtue of the verdict of the congress of the Union, only implies the suspension from office until the penalty should be imposed by the jury of sentence.

Second, Señor Gomez Cuervo is to be held compurged with the time that has elapsed of suspension from office, and the other sufferings experienced. In consequence he shall remain in absolute liberty, and be replaced in his office of constitutional governor of the State of Jalisco.

Third, let certified copies of this decision be remitted to the congress of the Union, returning to it the papers in the case, to the government of the Union, and to the government of the State of Jalisco, for their knowledge; and to the district judge of Guadalajara, that it be notified to the citizen Gomez Cuervo, and that the bail which has been given be ordered to be canceled.

Let it be known and published. So was accorded by a majority of the votes of the citizen magistrates who form the jury of sentence, and they signed.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, September 10, 1868.

SIR: The efforts of this government to put an end to the insurrections that have occurred in various parts of the republic since the outbreak in Yucatan in December last, appear to have been signally successful.

Near the close of last month the forces under General Alatorre effected the complete suppression of the rebellion in the sierra of the State of Puebla, with which General Negrete and the remnant of his followers had united.

A short time before, the forces under the orders of General Escobedo put an end to the revolt in the sierra of the State of Queretaro.

Aureliano Rivera, who pronounced in the sierra of Ajusco, in this State, has not been heard of since the first few weeks of his movement when forces were sent against him, and appears to have altogether disappeared.

Recent risings in the State of Vera Cruz have also quickly been suppressed.

The differences in the State of Guerrero appear finally to have been adjusted, and a general election has now been called in that State.

The insurrection in the State of Sinaloa, under Martinez, was quickly put down by the federal forces under General Corona; and thus, so far, in every instance success has attended the arms and the measures of the government, until it may now be stated that at no period since the accession of President Juarez to the chief magistracy, in February, 1858, has the whole country been under such entire acquiescence in the rule of the constitutional government, and the measures of reform put in practice by the constitutional party, as it is to-day.

The military forces and the civil employés of the federal government are now regularly and promptly paid.

This may be one of the important causes of the improved state of affairs; but I think it must also be acknowledged that the people generally throughout the republic are showing a greater unwillingness to look quietly upon, or to permit a resort to unauthorized armed movements as a means of redress for local or federal grievances, and are more clearly seeing that there are sufficient and surer remedies by peaceful means through the press, the tribune, and the ballot.

It is too early yet safely to assert that the round of pronunciamientos may not again be recommenced, or that legislative differences may not occur to mar the present favorable prospects; but it must be admitted that there are hopeful signs that a greater degree of tranquillity will be maintained hereafter.

The condition of general insecurity for life and property throughout the country continues to be most undesirable, but the government manifests a determination to now turn its attention to that necessity, as its most important work.

President Juarez has expressed to me his personal assurances under this head, and unquestionably feels the most earnest desire to accomplish what is so vitally demanded in this regard.

His confidence in the future of his country appears not only to be unabated but strengthened; and he sees perhaps more clearly than many how important an element time is in the difficult task of giving to Mexico, under all the disadvantages the past has left as its legacy, a durable peace, order, and progress.

There appears to be also on the part of the government, and of their public men generally, an increasing appreciation of the necessity of giving an impulse to the material interests of the country.

Should the coming session of their congress meet the public expectation and the promises of its leading members, and the government use the initiative it can in this regard, a great improvement in the state of affairs here cannot but take place.

In this point of view the proximate session is looked upon as of critical importance. Employment, to keep the people from the necessity of crime and revolt, is a vital requirement of their present situation.

A useful document, which is at the same time an encouraging sign, has recently appeared in the shape of a manifesto from General Gonzalez Ortega, issued shortly after his recent unconditional release from confinement.

In this paper he relinquishes any claim he may have been supposed to have to the executive office or to the presidency of the supreme court, and admits the necessity as well as propriety of accepting the existing order.

His constitutional term as Vice-President expired on the 31st of May last, and that office is now filled by Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, but the manifesto of General Ortega is useful as showing the convictions and expressing the advice of one who was the only claimant of the position President Juarez occupies.

I beg to inclose a translation of this document herewith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

MANIFESTO OF GENERAL GONZALEZ ORTEGA.

[From the Diario Oficial, city of Mexico, September 1, 1868.—Translation.]

The citizen Jesus Gonzalez Ortega to the Mexican nation.

Useless it appears to me to make here a statement of the occurrences that, relative to my person with the character of President of one of the supreme powers of the Mexican federation, have taken place before and after the decrees of the 8th of November were issued, and before and during the time of my imprisonment, because the circumstances of all these events appear in official documents and papers that have been published.

It remains to me, therefore, only to say a few words to my fellow-citizens as the sincere voice of my heart and of my head, as the intimate expression of my conscience, as the result of the liberty in which I now find myself, and after profound meditations in view of accomplished events, and in the presence of imprescindable measures which are exacted by the interests of the country and the peace of the republic.

On the 1st of the present month there was transcribed to me the communication of the general government, dated the 18th of July last, in which it was ordered that I should be placed at liberty, to the end that I might reside at the place that I might myself select.

As in the said note the supposed offenses were insisted upon, of flight and abandonment perpetrated by the general and by the president of the supreme court of justice, I had to return the note, asking only in a verbal manner, if, notwithstanding that step that the honor of the nation obliged me to take, I could make use of the liberty that was offered to me, to which I believed myself entitled, as, without motive whatever, I had been deprived of it; and an affirmative answer having been returned to me, I have removed to the capital of the State of Coahuila. I had thought of proceeding, in order to issue this manifesto, to some other capital of the more central States of the republic, but accidental causes have prevented me from realizing my purpose.

Placed at liberty, possessed already of my rights, and consequently of the faculty to emit my thoughts and to speak to the nation in compliance with the duty imposed upon me, the first that I have done has been to direct a retrospective view in order to examine the past with relation to the present, and another view to the actual situation in order to examine in the present the events to which the same past now has given an authority.

The order of things actually established is an accomplished event which rests in the most grave and vast interests. The legislatures, the tribunals of justice, and the governments of all the States of the republic being installed, the councils of all the municipalities of the same States being elected; the congress of the Union having been in session; the supreme court of justice of the republic exercising its functions, no voice has been raised protesting in the name of the people against the violation of law, against the decrees of the 8th of November, against the imprisonment of the president of the supreme court of justice, and if there have been some isolated voices with reference to this latter event, and they have been heard in congress, they have become silent soon after without result whatever.

Nearly all of the eminent men of the liberal party are forming or have formed part of the actual administration. The legislatures of some of the States have graced medals, have emitted votes of thanks and issued titles of well-deserving in favor of the author of the decrees of the 8th of November, and all without distinction have called legitimate government, constitutional government, that of which the head is the author of those same decrees; titles which have also been given in the press and the tribune by many of the democratic notabilities.

The author of the said decrees being accused by me before the national representation, the latter has not been willing to occupy itself with this affair and has seen with indifference, the same as all the authorities of the nation, the imprisonment of the president of the supreme court of justice, and by mandate of the law, President ad interim of the republic.

The men who, with myself, have raised the voice to defend the immunities of the law, some early, some later, and some at the last hour, have disappeared to form a part of the actual administration, or to recognize it tacitly or expressly.

No one do I accuse before the present or before history. I state facts, whose causes, perhaps grave and patriotic, I am still ignorant of, and I state them because those same facts not only authorize it, but reclaim in the name of the country the course that I am going to adopt.

I have remained, therefore, alone, absolutely alone, and without other support than that which a tranquil conscience affords when, in its judgment, a painful and difficult duty has been fulfilled.

To that same conscience I have addressed these inquiries, not once but many times. In the midst of this general abandonment common to all men and to all peoples, in view of so many interests created by a power tolerated by the people, under constitutional and democratic forms or appearances, and which interests cannot be destroyed except among rivers of blood, in the presence of grave diplomatic complications between Mexico and powerful nations, is it desirable, is it just, is it patriotic to put forward my individuality, by the official character which I have, as a constant menace to the public peace and tranquillity?

Is it desirable, is it just, is it patriotic to retain titles in the name of the people when that same people have not desired to save them nor even to recognize them, notwithstanding there are established, legally or illegally, all the democratic organs by means of which they could have caused their rights to have been enforced, or at least their voice to have been heard?

Is it just, is it patriotic, is it desirable to retain titles which the law has given, when the violation of the law is an event consummated or tolerated by the nation itself, and when their retention, under the present circumstances, might bring civil war, the only means that the representation of the people has left to save them, a war which would put an end, perhaps, to the Mexican nationality?

The voice of the passions silenced, conscience has answered these inquiries in the negative.

All of them involve a political problem; and of the present, whose prompt solution the epoch exacts, the interests of the republic reclaim, and to which I am led by my political position, passed events, and the affection without limits that I have for my country. One of two extremes I have to touch in order to give this solution—to launch with the law in my hand, into civil war, or to abdicate in a patriotic and sincere manner the titles with which the nation has invested me.

Between these two extremes I have not vacillated for a moment in accepting the latter, and much more when this acceptance is imposed upon me by the reasons before stated, and is not indirectly exacted from me in the darkness of a prison.

I separate myself, therefore, from the constitutional titles and powers with which I have been invested by the vote of the people and the precepts of the law; whether as constitutional president of the supreme court of justice, or as President ad interim of the republic, I renounce them, and I return them complete and without spot to that same people, when so it is required by the force of past and present events and the peace of the nation.

In returning to the obscurity of private life, accompanied by the calmness and tranquillity of my conscience after a prolonged and stormy struggle, I have no embarrassment in order to remove all pretext for civil war, in recognizing, as I recognize, with my character of simple citizen, the authorities and functionaries actually established, to the end that under the shadow of the existing order, the patriotism of good Mexicans can secure the peace, the liberty, the progress, and the well-being of our exhausted republic.

No unpatriotic caprice, no ignoble and unfounded ambition, has led me to defend, with the force of truth and of reason and not with the force of arms, the isolated cause on the side of which I have been found until to-day.

I have defended with loyalty what, by my oath, I was required to do. The fulfillment of my obligations I have believed absolutely necessary to the national honor. Besides, I have always felt in the depths of my conscience that I have defended the best of causes. I abdicate it when the entire nation so exactly by means of a multitude of events which it has sanctioned. In abdicating it I have adopted the measure which is most in harmony with the public interests.

Upright, patriotic, and disinterested have been my intentions; upright, patriotic, and disinterested they are to-day. May the God of the universe, who knows my sincerity, grant that they shall contribute to the happiness of the dear land that has given me birth.

I should blush before myself if any ignoble passion should remain in my heart; if in it there should be given place to any low and base resentment against men and against events, and still more should I be ashamed when I know that the torrent of the latter almost always bears the former forward by unexpected, unknown, and even involuntary ways.

Mexicans, I swear to you before God, in addressing to you the fullness of my last official word, no sacrifice will I omit, not even that of going to seek an asylum and a tomb in a foreign land, if this shall be necessary, in order that there shall be realized the prayers that I make to-day for the peace of Mexico; no sacrifice is there that I will shun, if from this sacrifice shall result to my country honor and prestige at home, honor and prestige before the enlightened peoples of the world, honor and prestige in the present, and honor and prestige before history.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, September 12, 1868.

SIR: A renewed application having been made by President Juarez to the supreme court for leave for Mr. Lerdo de Tejada—since the 31st of May last the chief justice and Vice-President of the republic—to continue in the cabinet as minister of foreign relations, such permission, in reverse of the action of the court on the 5th of June last, which caused the retirement of Mr. Lerdo from the cabinet, has now been granted, and yesterday that gentleman again assumed the charge of the department which for so long a period previously had been under his control.

The usual official notice was addressed to me by Mr. Lerdo yesterday, and I have to-day replied in such terms as I have thought proper to the occasion.

A copy and translation of Mr. Lerdo's note is transmitted herewith, as also copy of my reply.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Señor Lerdo de Tejada to Mr. Plumb.

MEXICO, September 11, 1868.

SIR: have the honor to inform you that the President of the republic having been pleased to appoint me minister of foreign relations, I have taken charge to-day of that department.

It is very satisfactory to me to assure you that I will always have the greatest desire to cultivate the most friendly and cordial relations with the legation of the United States of America, of which you are very worthily in charge.

I am, sir, with the greatest consideration, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
S. LERDO DE TEJADA.

Mr. EDWARD LEE PLUMB,
Chargé d'Affaires of the United States of America in Mexico.

Mr. Plumb to Señor Lerdo de Tejada.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Mexico, September 12, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of yesterday, informing me that the President of the republic having been pleased to appoint your excellency minister of foreign relations, you had that day taken charge of that department.

Your excellency has also been pleased to assure me of the great desire you will always have to cultivate the most cordial and friendly relations with the legation of the United States.

It is with very great satisfaction that I have learned that your excellency has resumed the direction of the department which, for so extended a period previously, had been under your excellency's able and worthy charge, and I am assured I shall correctly represent the sentiments of the government of the United States in expressing the conviction that in the future, as in the years that have passed, the relations between our two republics cannot but be drawn more and more closely together in the ties of peace, friendship, and mutual commerce, under the enlightened efforts that your excellency will make, and toward which common and desired end, I am confident you feel certain, no effort on my own part will ever be wanting.

Availing myself of this occasion, with great pleasure, to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration and particular esteem, I have the honor to be your most obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Minister of Foreign Relations of the Republic of Mexico.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 12th of August, No. 171.

I entirely approve of the letter which, on the 7th of August, you addressed to the Mexican minister for foreign affairs on the subject of the recent ill treatment of citizens of the United States at Monterey, by the authorities of that place.

The prompt and just reply of Mr. Azpiroz is satisfactory at the present stage of the proceeding. The development will be awaited with much interest.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 17, 1868.

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 21st of August, No. 178, which relates to the death of Mr. John Braniff, a citizen of the United States, of wounds inflicted by a band of robbers, while at work on the Mexico and Vera Cruz railway.

Your proceeding is approved, and the engagement which the Mexican government has made to investigate the complaint, and its assurance that upon such investigation the government will direct what justice may require, is entirely satisfactory.

In my dispatch No. 65, I did, indeed, say, in connection with this case, "that though such events may and do happen in every foreign country, they are unfortunately common in Mexico, and their frequency is no doubt owing to the comparative impunity of the offenders."

The Mexican minister seems to except to this remark. When writing that dispatch I was not forgetful of the civil war through which Mexico has so recently passed, and the strenuous efforts of the new government to restore peace and order throughout the republic. I think that no nation has showed itself more just and liberal, under those circumstances, to the Mexican authorities than the United States. It is the earnest desire of this government that mutual confidence may exist between the people of the two republics. The Mexican government cannot be unaware that very sedulous efforts are made by its enemies in the present hour of its trial to destroy this confidence on the part of the American people. The fact that murders and robberies are frequently committed on the public highways of the country, notwithstanding the efforts of the Mexican government to prevent and punish them, is a weapon in the hands of those enemies of which I earnestly desire to disarm them.

It is both natural and right in itself that the people of the United States should be disturbed and excited by reiterated complaints of wrong, indignity, and injustice to their fellow citizens in Mexico as in other foreign countries. I seek to bring this painful fact to the attention of the Mexican government.

With this explanation I trust that the remark to which the Mexican minister for foreign affairs refers will not be regarded as having been made in a spirit either unfriendly or unjust towards Mexico.

You may read this dispatch to the minister for foreign affairs and give him a copy of the same, if he shall desire it.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, September 18, 1868.

SIR: The fourth constitutional congress of Mexico opened the third period of its ordinary sessions on the 16th instant. I have the honor to transmit to the department herewith, translations of the discourses pronounced by the President of the republic and the president of congress on that occasion.

The 16th of September is the anniversary of the proclamation of Mexican independence, and is the day appointed by the constitution for the opening of the first period of the regular annual sessions of congress.

On no previous occasion, however, since the adoption of the constitution of 1857, has the session been opened on that day either a want of promptness in the attendance of members has delayed the opening, or war has prevented their assembling.

But this year, on the 5th instant, the day designated by the permanent deputation for the commencement of their customary preparatory sessions, for the purpose of organization, a quorum was already present in the capital, and for the first time the annual session has been commenced on the day designated by the constitution.

In the discourses pronounced on this occasion, no allusion whatever is made to the foreign relations of the republic. It was anticipated that some reference would have been made to the conventions recently concluded with the United States, but they are not mentioned.

The address of President Juarez gives an authoritative, interesting, and encouraging account of the political situation of the country; and that of the president of congress indicates harmony between the legislative and executive powers.

The opposition to the administration in congress, it is reported, has been diminished in numbers during the recess by the course of events, and it is hoped that its character may now be less violent.

The question of the material interests of the country appears, also, on all sides to be receiving more attention, and a very general hope seems to be entertained that the labors of the present session may be productive of some positive progress in this regard.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

OPENING OF THE MEXICAN CONGRESS, SEPTEMBER 16, 1868.

Speeches of the President of the republic and of the president of congress.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, September 16, 1868.—Translation.]

SPEECH OF PRESIDENT JUAREZ.

CITIZEN DEPUTIES: I congratulate you with great satisfaction upon seeing you again assembled together to discharge your high functions.

Without any of the obstructions of past times, which have rendered it difficult for the representatives of the people to come from remote points, you have commenced this new period of your labors upon the precise day designated by the fundamental code.

Since the adoption of the constitution, for the first time has there been united on this day two great motives of public rejoicing, and of flattering hopes for the future.

We, to-day, jointly celebrate the anniversary of the proclamation of independence, affirmed by the triumph in a foreign war, and the new meeting of congress, which demonstrates the consolidation of the republic, and the tranquil and regular march of our institutions.

At the conclusion of the previous period of the sessions of congress, the campaign in the sierra of Puebla, to repress those who had there rebelled against the functionaries of the State, was pending.

For some time the executive employed prudential measures without avail, having in the end to aid efficaciously the authorities of the State in compliance with its constitutional duty.

This revolt was promptly suppressed, with the same success with which before had been combated those that had occurred in other States against the local authorities.

These disturbances have been but few, and less than what was to have been feared after a civil and foreign war, that so profoundly and for so long a time had commoved the nation.

Now there only exists a band, few in number, that has recently revolted in Tamaulipas against the local government, and that cannot occasion any serious danger in that State, where peace is assured by sufficient forces of the federation.

All of the States now enjoy the constitutional regimen. The difficulties that existed in Guerrero having been adjusted, the people have been convoked that they may, with full liberty, hold the special elections of the State.

Tepic is still continued as a military district by reason of its special circumstances; but it is to be hoped that they will very soon permit that congress should occupy itself with this affair, in order to determine what it may judge convenient.

If the valor and loyalty of the military forces of the Union, which have repressed the late revolts, merits just eulogiums, combating as worthy republican soldiers, it is also just to observe that they have been efficaciously aided by the good spirit of the people.

With great reason should we felicitate ourselves in view of the energetic and unanimous aspiration of all of the people of the republic to maintain peace and to enjoy its benefits under the protection of the constitution and the laws.

Under these auspices we may be confident that no difficulty will distract the attention of congress from its important labors in issuing the laws that are required by various branches of the public administration.

The government will co-operate towards this end by means of various initiatives.

It will present one with reference to the protection of individual guarantees, and another with reference to the establishment of juries in the federal district for all criminal trials.

Another is being prepared with reference to public instruction, and another with reference to the courts of appeal in military trials.

With the earnest desire that our legislation may be soon improved, the commissions charged with the formation of projects of civil and commercial codes have been reorganized and are laboring actively.

The commission charged with the project of the criminal code has continued and is very far advanced in its labors.

An initiative will be presented with reference to reforms in the ordinances for the mints, and another is being prepared with reference to the ordinances for public surveys.

The government has received already two of the mints which were rented, having for some time had the determination to make now new leases and to terminate those existing as fast as their stipulations will permit.

With respect to the new routes of communication decreed by congress, the necessary surveys have already been made, and work upon them will very shortly be commenced.

The necessity of promoting and of stimulating material improvements, by all possible means, being so fully recognized, congress, in this important subject, will meet with the most zealous and efficacious co-operation of the general government.

Attending to the condition of some of the tax-payers who have been unable to meet the extraordinary imposts which were decreed by the general-in-chief of the army of the east, on account of the circumstances in which they were placed before the termination of the operations of the war, the government will present the initiative proposing that the payment of what remains due shall be made with recognized credits of the public debt.

The payment of all the branches of the administration has continued to be made with entire regularity, and in conformity with the law of appropriations.

Immediately that the latter commenced to be in force, all special funds ceased, according to the provisions made by congress.

In the new organization of the corps of the military divisions, difficulties have occurred in its immediate execution, a portion of the forces being occupied in the campaign of the sierra of Puebla, and others disseminated at great distances. However, it has been directed that it be proceeded with, with all possible dispatch, holding in reserve the initiation to congress of the modifications that may be judged necessary, and without any expenditure having been made above the sum approved in the appropriation law, which the government has taken care, and will take care, shall be exactly complied with.

The people that have defended with their blood our free institutions have imposed upon the public authorities the constant and sacred duty of faithfully observing the constitution and the laws, which assure the rights and the guarantees of the citizens, and are a sure pledge of the peace and the progress of society.

Receive, citizen deputies, the wishes that I offer for the success of your deliberations, in which I have no doubt you will continue to seek the highest good and prosperity of the republic.

SPEECH OF THE PRESIDENT OF CONGRESS, MR. JUSTINO FERNANDEZ.

CITIZEN PRESIDENT: The congress of the Union, after a period of legal recess, has returned to meet again to-day, as the day designated by the constitution, to continue its legislative labors, and exercise the important attributes of its elevated charge; this august ceremony of the solemn inauguration of its sessions coming to crown the festivity of the day consecrated to the memory of the glories of the country and those of its greatest and most illustrious sons who have known how to sacrifice themselves in its behalf.

The solicitous diligence and strict punctuality with which, to a large number and from all of the States of the federation, their representatives have repaired hither to take part in the deliberations of the period now to commence, furnishes a new proof that republican institutions are firmly established among us, that such alone are the institutions desired by the people, and that in them alone the nation finds its hopes of social reorganization and of well being and of prosperity; and also furnishes a sure presage that the citizen deputies, animated by the same patriotic zeal and laborious activity as in the previous period of sessions, will consecrate themselves in this to comply fully with the duties of their honorable commission, with entire dedication to the same, and guided always by the highest aspirations for the public good.

Grand, immense, and difficult in the extreme is the task that in the present period of sessions congress has to discharge. Innumerable are the affairs with which it should occupy itself, and varied and complicated the subjects to which they have relation.

Without indulging the hope that all the work intrusted to its charge will be fully finished, confidence may be entertained that the important and grave affairs which remained to be discussed from the previous period, and which only for want of time could not be submitted to its deliberation, will now be the object of preferential attention.

Such are the projects with reference to organic laws without which it is not possible for the constitutional system which governs us regularly and perfectly to perform its functions, or that the public liberties can be preserved or individual guarantees be assured.

Such are those that refer to the maintenance and consolidation of peace and the establishment of personal security; as is for the first that which will determine the condition and fate of those unfortunate Mexicans who offended their country, lending aid or their services to the intervention or to the empire; and for the second that which will determine the proceedings of the trial and the penalties with which highway-robbers and kidnappers shall be tried and sentenced, that horrible leprosy of evil, implanted among the most atrocious of the criminals by foreign adventurers who have mixed in our civil dissensions.

Such are various projects with reference to railroads, especially that which proposes to unite this capital with Vera Cruz, and that which will establish the general basis and conditions under which concessions may be made in the future to empresarios who shall undertake them; for these improvements open a wide field to labor, and upon them depends very directly the well-being of a multitude of persons, and they will contribute to the greatness and prosperity of the republic.

Such are also various projects which propose to encourage and protect commerce and industry, mining and agriculture, which it is to be desired should be treated of at the same time in order to provide that all these branches of wealth shall prosper and be developed equally, and that they be placed in the most perfect harmony the one with the other.

Such are, in fine, various others of greater or less importance the enumeration of which would be tiresome, and which will be taken into consideration in the turn which belongs to them, or with the preference which may be accorded.

Congress will also occupy itself with the very important initiatives which have just been indicated by the citizen President, and with all that may be brought before it in the course of its sessions.

In this respect congress should express how satisfactory it is to it that the government makes use of the constitutional faculty of initiating new laws, or asking the repeal or reform of those in force.

This faculty, exercised with a profound knowledge of what may prejudice or promote the public good, is one of the most solid and sure guarantees of good administrative order.

Happily congress can dedicate itself to the discharge of its arduous and difficult labors with the calmness and tranquillity which are so necessary to deliberative bodies, in order that their labors may be fruitful and their resolutions always bear the seal of the most clear and strict justice. So at least this assembly is led to hope, by the exposition which you have just made, citizen President, of the orderly manner in which the affairs of the republic progress.

You have assured us that peace is re-established in all its territory; that in it the constitutional system rules; that the appropriation law has been strictly observed in all the branches of the administration; that the payments of the treasury have been made with the greatest punctuality; that a considerable amount of the public debt has been redeemed; that the labors are prosecuted with zeal in opening the new routes of communication decreed at the last period of sessions, and in repairing the old; and that, in fine, there are already prepared many initiatives whose sole enumeration with reference to what they embrace demonstrates the great and decided desire which the government entertains to improve the administration of public affairs and place it on a level with the civilization and the requirements of our society.

All this is highly satisfactory; all this contains guarantees of good success for the future; and all this, in fine, demonstrates unequivocally that there is morality in the administration, and a true and enlightened patriotism on the part of those who direct the public affairs.

For this congress expresses its sincere congratulations, and it offers the most ardent wishes that the most complete harmony may be maintained among the powers of the Union, in order that they may thus be dedicated to the consolidation of peace in all of the republic.

This assembly confidently expects that the government will dedicate all its efforts, and place in action all the preventive and repressive means of which it can dispose, to preserve and consolidate this peace, conquered at such a cost, and which is the most inestimable good which is now hoped to be enjoyed by all the inhabitants of the Mexican republic, as without it there cannot be security or tranquillity, and all progress and well-being is impossible.

The national representation, the faithful interpreter of the desires and aspirations of the people, believes that it satisfies them, making this energetic recommendation to the government, and offering it at the same time its most firm and efficacious co-operation.

With positive satisfaction is accepted, citizen President, the offer which you have made, to faithfully guard the constitution, and comply with the precepts of the law.

This programme, strictly observed, will be, it cannot be doubted, the bond of liberal union, and the flag under which there will cluster at the side of the government all those who profess progressive principles and desire the advancement of our society, and the glory and grandeur of the republic.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Secard.

No. 192.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, September 21, 1868.

SIR: On the 16th instant Mr. Mariscal, late chargé d'affaires in the United States, who since the 17th of June last has occupied the position of minister of justice and public instruction in the cabinet of President Juarez, retired from that position, and took his seat in congress in consequence of his election as a member of that body.

On the 17th instant, a communication was addressed to congress by the minister of foreign relations in the name of the President, asking that license be conceded for Mr. Mariscal to return to the charge of the department of justice, and for Mr. José Maria Iglesias, minister of treasury for a long period prior to the entry of Mr. Romero into that department, and since a deputy in congress, to take charge of the department of government, recently vacated by the resignation of Mr. Vallarta.

On the following day the desired leave was granted in both cases by congress, without discussion, and on the 19th instant these gentlemen entered upon the charge of their respective departments.

With the return of Mr. Lerdo de Tejada to the department of foreign relations, the entrance of Mr. Iglesias into that of government, and the continuance of Mr. Mariscal in that of justice, the cabinet of President Juarez is again complete, Mr. Romero remaining as minister of treasury, General Mejia as minister of war, and Mr. Balcarcel as minister of fomento.

All of these gentlemen are old and tried personal friends of President Juarez, and most of them have been long associated with him, and while the charge is urged, by the opposition, of partiality and exclusivism in the selection of ministers, the cabinet will have the great advantage of a perfect knowledge of late affairs, and entire unity of action.

The administration is also believed to have a large working majority in congress.

The late proceedings of the supreme court in granting leave to Mr. Lerdo de Tejada to continue in the cabinet, referred to in my dispatch No. 186, of the 12th instant, having been published in the Diario Oficial on the 19th instant, I am enabled to transmit a translation of the same herewith, as a matter of interest from the novelty of this incident as compared with the practice in the United States.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

THE QUESTION OF GRANTING LEAVE TO THE PRESIDENT OF THE SUPREME COURT OF JUSTICE TO REMAIN IN THE CABINET OF PRESIDENT JUAREZ.

[From the Diario Oficial, September 19, 1868.—Translation.]

SUPREME COURT OF JUSTICE OF THE NATION.

Minutes of the 9th of September, 1868.

Present, the citizens Riva Palacio, who presided; Lafragua, Ordaz, Cardozo, Guzman (Simon) Velasquez, Zavala, Garcia Ramirez, Attorney General Altamirano, and Solicitor General Guzman, (Leon.)

The preceding minutes having been approved, the following communication from the section of chancellaria of the department of relations was taken into consideration, which, word for word, is as follows:

"Peace having been re-established in the republic, the government has the important duty of consolidating it, and to comply with this requires the co-operation of the persons who, as ministers of state, have taken part in the carrying out of its action, which has so far produced happy results.

"Besides, the government will, in many cases, have to inform the congress of the Union in its proximate sessions of the antecedents of public affairs, particularly of those relating to foreign affairs; and to do this with the promptness and correctness that is due, it deems it desirable that there should serve as its organs the persons who have assisted as heads of departments during the period of the war against the foreign intervention.

"In view of the foregoing considerations the citizen President of the republic has thought proper to determine upon insisting in asking the leave that is required for the citizen Sebastian Lerdo de Tejada to separate from the functions of president of the supreme court of justice, in order to take charge again of the portfolio of foreign relations.

"In compliance with this determination I have the honor to address you the present note, begging that you will be pleased to give account of its contents to the supreme court for the effect indicated.

"Independence and liberty! Mexico, September 7, 1868.

"MANUEL AZPIROZ, Chief Clerk.

"The Citizen JUSTICE, temporarily presiding, of the Supreme Court of Justice, present."

The presiding officer directed that the preceding communication should be placed in discussion.

The citizen Solicitor General Leon Guzman proposed that the discussion be suspended until the citizen justices who are not present at the session of to-day be cited to attend.

This motion being placed in discussion was rejected, there voting in favor of it the citizens Solicitor General Leon Guzman, Attorney General Altamirano, Simon Guzman, and Cardozo; and against it the citizens Garcia Ramirez, Zavola, Velasquez, Ordaz, Lafragua, and Riva Palacio, the motion therefore being lost.

The vote was then proceeded with upon the question whether the license should be conceded; and there voted in the affirmative the citizens Garcia Ramirez, Zavola, Velasquez, Castillo Velasco, who, not being present, sent his vote in writing, Ordaz, Lafragua, and Riva Palacio; and in the negative the citizens Solicitor General Leon Guzman, Attorney General Altamirano, Simon Guzman, and Cardozo; it therefore being accorded that the license should be conceded.

The citizen Leon Guzman, in giving his vote, stated that he desired that the reasons should appear upon which he based it, and he expressed the same in the following terms:

"The leave that is solicited, asked by the citizen President of the republic, it would, perhaps, be necessary to concede, as it is asked by a very elevated source, and the person whose license is solicited is to dedicate himself to the public service; but it should also be considered that if it is the will of the citizen President that Mr. Lerdo should aid his government in one of the departments, the will of the people and that of the national congress has been that Mr. Lerdo should act as president of the court. As between these two desires that of the people has the preference, my vote is that leave be not granted to Mr. Lerdo de Tejada."

In the order when the vote of the citizen Castillo Velasco was to be accorded, who, not attending in person, sent his vote in writing, the same was read, and it having been accorded that it should appear upon the record, it is here inserted, as follows:

"When some time since I refused, for my part, the leave to Mr. Lerdo, which was solicited by the executive, that he might separate from the supreme court of justice, and take charge of the department of foreign relations, I was led to vote in this sense by the idea that the separation of Mr. Lerdo from the government being effected a change of cabinet would take place, and with it a change in the policy of the government, which, according to my humble opinion, being based in exclusivism and in the idea of the infallibility of power, enervated the progress of the country, and impeded its advancement.

"But neither a change in the cabinet nor in policy occurred, and, under these circumstances, I believe that, to insist upon my refusal of the license which is again solicited by the government would not now have any other significance than a repulse merely personal to Mr. Lerdo, and it does not enter into my thoughts to attack individuals, but only principles.

"I have followed and shall continue to follow those of the opposition, because I do not agree with their practical application made by those politicians who proclaim equally the government, and those that in practice dissent from its mode of judgment; but I understand that in the exercise of the functions of the magistracy there are not the necessary means to obtain from the executive the modifications that public opinion, with which I accord, believes to be just, and that this belongs to the congress of the Union; because, in truth, to refuse leave to a magistrate when it is seen that such refusal produces no practical result, and cannot influence in the formation of the cabinet, as can be done by congress, is to accept the disagreeable part of the affair without benefit to the republic.

"It is for these reasons that, deploring as I do deplore the continuance of a policy with which I disagree, I have desired to omit this vote in writing in order that it should be manifested with the disinterestedness and loyalty which no one can deny to me, because I have never been wanting to those qualities.

"The vote in favor of leave to Mr. Lerdo is interpreted as a separation from the opposition, in which I am so long as I consider it just, and this is absurd; or as the result of a bribery which only can be believed by those who are capable of receiving it, and with respect to myself, those who do not know the pride of my poverty and the immovable firmness of my political beliefs, of which I have given proofs.

"The vote against the license is interpreted either as the expression of personal ill will, which in no case do I desire should be attributed to me, or as the inert expression of a despite I do not feel, for with respect to myself personally, it is indifferent whether one citizen or another governs, as I always hold myself aloof even from the residences of those in power.

"Under these circumstances, and assuming that the policy has not been changed on account of Mr. Lerdo having left the department of relations, that the court has no determined legal influence to obtain a change of cabinet; and that the only recourse that it might exercise has much that is offensive and nothing of efficacy for the desired object of a change of policy; I have no difficulty in conceding the leave that is solicited by the government, and I vote in this sense.

"MEXICO, September 9, 1868.

"J. M. DEL CASTILLO VELASCO."

On the motion of the citizen solicitor general, it was accorded that it should appear in the minutes that the citizen Ogazon gave notice to the secretary, in order that it might be transmitted to the tribunal, that he could not be present at the session.

On motion of the citizen Riva Palacio, it was resolved that it should appear in these minutes that the citizen justices who have not been present at the session of to-day, had knowledge that in this session the question was to be treated of conceding or not the license asked by the executive of the union for the citizen Lerdo de Tejada to return to the charge of the department of foreign affairs.

In consequence of the vote with reference to the conceding of the license, it was accorded with reference to the communication remitted by the section of chancery of the department of relations, in the following terms:

"Let it be answered that the license is conceded."

MEXICO, September 10, 1868.

A true copy, which I certify.

LUIS MARIA AGUILAR,
Secretary.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Seward.

No. 193.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, September 25, 1868.

SIR: I beg to inclose to the department herewith a copy of the Diario Oficial of this government, of yesterday, in which certain late documents are published, from which it appears that the ex-General Santa Anna has established a military headquarters in Havana, and is seeking to prepare from there military expeditions against Mexico, proceeding both directly to Vera Cruz and by way of the United States, proposing to avail for his purposes of a transit through the United States to the Rio Grande frontier, and the use there of our territory as a point of departure.

While all of these projects of Santa Anna are now of utterly impossible realization, they are yet the means of mischief, and are an international annoyance, inasmuch as deluded Americans may be drawn into such schemes to their subsequent peril, and the authorities on our frontier are required to maintain a constant vigilance in order to prevent the departure of any such expeditions from our territory.

In this point of view it would seem that there should be a limit to the extent to which the Spanish port of Havana can with propriety be used as an asylum for persons engaged in such movements, and much less for the establishment there of their military headquarters.

I do not doubt that the department, on receiving these documents, will take such action in the premises as the circumstances of the case in its judgment may require.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[From the Diario Oficial, City of Mexico, September 24, 1868.—Translation.]

CONSPIRACY OF ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA, IN HAVANA, AGAINST THE MEXICAN REPUBLIC.

We publish to-day the documents relating to the conspiracy of Santa Anna and other traitors, now residing at Havana, in the Island of Cuba.

The government attaches little importance to those machinations, for it is ready to meet all such schemes; but it thinks proper to make the facts known. The conspirators boast that they are aided by the Spanish authorities in Cuba. Whether this be true or not, the presumption is that the authorities there connive at the conspiracy, otherwise we cannot understand how military preparations can go on, for such purposes, without being known to the police, that find out everything. The publications of to-day will show what truth there is in the pretended neutrality of the Spanish authorities in Cuba.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, OFFICE OF WAR AND MARINE.

I, Pablo Lopez, notary, certify the following documents in the suit against Cosme Padilla.

Letter of A. Taboada, Santa Anna's quartermaster general, to Colonel Cosme Padilla.

"QUARTERS OF THE GENERAL-IN-CHIEF OF THE MEXICAN ARMY OF RESTORATION,
"Havana, Cuba, August 21, 1868.

"I have the pleasure of sending you the commission of colonel of infantry, conferred upon you by his serene highness, in the belief that you will be useful to the nation. I am also instructed to advise you to go by the first vessel to Vera Cruz, and take all the men you can get to go with you, engaged as laborers for the railroad. Be careful how you land, and bid the men keep silence. As you are a man of sound experience, I will give you no advice. If you need aid in Vera Cruz, apply to Honorato Dominguez and José Prieto, and tell them the general-in-chief has the utmost confidence in them. All who engage in this meritorious work will be well rewarded. His serene highness will make all things right when he arrives in Vera Cruz. Whoever heads the movement shall be commander of Vera Cruz.

"God preserve you. Yours, &c.,

"A. TABOADA."

Second letter of Antonio Taboada to Cosme Padilla.

"HAVANA, August 22, 1868.

"COLONEL: His serene highness instructs you, on entering Vera Cruz, to call a meeting of the principal merchants, and ask a loan of one hundred thousand dollars of them, to be sent here in a special steamer. You will inform those men who thus contribute, that they will be well paid when the new order of things is established; but that General Santa Anna must show his presence in Vera Cruz immediately, to attend in person to the great plan of national independence, and the establishment of an enlightened and paternal government.

"You are also authorized to form a board of finance, to take charge of the public funds, and repay the loan of one hundred thousand dollars. We have determined upon this work of social regeneration, and we will accomplish it at the risk of our lives.

"Act with moderation and justice, and preserve strict discipline among your subordinates. Our motto must be, protection to persons and property, as the only assurance to a people who have never enjoyed the rights common to other civilized nations, though they have been promised by all political parties for more than half a century.

"As commander-in-chief of the eastern army, you will collect all the forces of the department and hoist the banner of independence in the heroic city of Vera Cruz.

"Do not neglect to inform our fellow-countrymen of the infamous treason attempted by the notorious Matias Romero, in the name of Benito Juarez, by offering to sell to the government of the United States, our mortal enemy, our four rich departments of the north, to be paid for by a Yankee protectorate, pledged to sustain Juarez in power, and by assuming the debts of Mexico to foreign nations.

"This fact is evidenced by a letter from Romero to a member of the cabinet at Washington, which I have seen.

"We expect much from your loyalty and patriotism in the execution of this important mission.

"Yours, &c.,

"A. TABOADA."

Proclamation of General Taboada to the people of Mexico.

MEXICANS: The powerful hand of that invisible Being who rules the destinies of nations has called me from the seclusion in which I had resolved to live, to intrust me with a mission that is as great as it is dangerous. Believing it an inspiration from above, I undertake this great, imminent, and sacred task—the regeneration of a people on the verge of an abyss, into which they might fall and disappear from the map of free and civilized nations.

Yes, Mexicans, the hand of God guides me; otherwise my insignificance, my little merit, my obscure name, and my humble position would have made me shrink from the difficulties and dangers of the perilous situation in which our unfortunate country is at present placed.

Do not judge of my advent upon your shores, my fellow-countrymen, with your hearts still bleeding from the wounds of your political misfortunes; but judge me with your consciences, in reason and in truth. Measure my actions with the meter of justice; look back upon the half-century history of your sanguinary civil wars; and then cast your glances upon the future that is offered to your sight. Do not rank me among revolutionists, nor class me with the representatives of any political party; neither think that rash ambition urges me to take up arms again for the acquisition of power, so frequently contended for by many political parties. This vain struggle for political power is the true cause of all our sorrows. No, my countrymen, it is a greater ambition, more noble, more holy, that calls me once more among you, to lead you to the field of honor, of duty, and of patriotism. Do not decide against me yet; but wait for the progress of events, the development of ideas yet unrealized; then judge me, and take the destiny of your country in your own hands.

Our present most urgent duty is to find a remedy for the many ills that afflict our dying body politic; to put a barrier to the destruction that threatens us; to arrest the demoralization that is fast leading us to barbarism; to restore the empire of law, justice, religion, and public order; to assure protection to natives and to foreigners; to preserve the precious legacy bequeathed to us by our heroic ancestors, and sealed with their blood, and which we have not held in just integrity.

Can this end be gained without union, fraternity, and harmony? Is there a single Mexican, however obstinate, who will not waive past grudges, private interests, and personal ambition, when his country calls him, in the plaintive tones of a loving mother, who wails the outrages of her own children, and is almost ready to succumb? Is there a single son of the soil who would hesitate to give up a passing power for the salvation of his native land? Is not the painful experience of near fifty years of continued revolutions, with shameless destruction of life and property, enough to make us halt, reflect, and join together in one last effort for the salvation of our country?

What can we expect from our eternal discord? What can the triumph of any party or any candidate for place and power offer, when sustained solely by the bayonet, and not by the free and spontaneous will of the nation, that cannot be heard amid the clangor of arms, however loudly the voice may be sounded?

Beautiful theories, fallacious promises, high-sounding phrases, full of patriotism, unmeaning plans, proclamations filled with national fervor, glorious deeds of bloody strife, brilliant antecedents, great merits for high positions, everlasting hopes—such are the records in the annals of our terrible history ever since the social emancipation of Mexico—ever since our independence. And what have we accomplished? What have we done in our fifty and three years of independent existence? We have torn up our constitutions, lacerated the vitals of our country, and proved to the world that we are not worthy of independence; our pen has written falsehoods, and our words are not worthy of belief; there is no respect shown us, for our acts have belied our promises, and we have no more right to credit from abroad; we have shown that we are incapable of self-government, and other nations, stronger than we are, have arrogated to themselves the right to absorb us, and thus put an end to our own scandal exhibited before the world, and to benefit themselves by the untold wealth that God has hidden in our privileged soil, and which we have misused to our own destruction and ruin.

This, my deluded countrymen, is the lamentable picture of independent Mexico! this the history of our political existence! this the vision of our future!

Will you continue in this ruinous career? Will you again shed your brothers' blood in contest for a power that belongs to none of you, for the nation gives it to no one man? Do you not feel humiliated by the contempt of Europe, and even of your brothers of the Western Continent—the country of Columbus? Do you not dread the maledictions of your unborn children, who will have no country; the ghosts of your fathers that will rise from their tombs to curse you with their malisons?

But there is yet time, O my countrymen, to save ourselves and regain the esteem of civilized nations, for I believe that the last sentiment of honor and patriotism has not yet been extinguished in your breasts. I believe the breath of life still stirs in the bosom of a community that was almost dead, and religious faith inspires me with hopes of salvation, if we will only rally round the sacred banner, which, though torn to tatters, still waves over the fragments of our unhappy land, and calls us to defend it with all our former gallantry. Yes, that blessed banner, borne by our revered ancestors in their struggles to make us independent, may once more wave, by our united efforts, upon the battlements of the palace of the Montezumas.

Let all Mexicans of courage, honor, and true patriotism assemble now; hasten, all of you, to the call of your country, now made through me; lay down your arms and organize your government by force of speech; forget your rancors, and for once give up your personal interests; cast away the assassin's dagger, and extinguish the incendiary torch but lately in your hands, and resume the implements of agriculture, the tools of trade, the industry of commerce, the profits of science, and you may be sure you will regain your freedom, enjoy the security that every ruler has promised and none has given, and when peace is once more secured, you may easily elevate your country to the pinnacle of glory, power, and grandeur.

ANTONIO TABOADA.

Another proclamation, not signed:

TO ARMS, MEXICANS!

The work of Juarez is about to be consummated; the loss of your independence is almost accomplished; your nationality cannot survive your political demise.

Romero's journey to the United States is now known; all the papers of the neighboring republic confirm the terrible truth, and begin to discover the sad perspective of your future. Will you cowardly yield, without a single struggle for your salvation? Will you patiently bear the heavy chain, fashioned for your limbs in the political forge of the white house, by that infamous party that assumes the appellation of liberal?

What a terrible destiny! A nation of eight millions of inhabitants, that would be invincible if united, allows itself to be sold to its mortal enemies by a minority faction that ought to be smothered by national indignation, and buried forever in the abyss of its own crimes. Unhappy country of Montezuma and Iturbide! Most precious gem in the continent of Columbus! What curse of God has been breathed upon you to make your children pollute your virgin soil, and deliver it without pity to the terrible eagle that spreads its watchful wings above you, and soars in anxious expectation that its ready talons will soon hold you in their grasp.

Shame upon such people! Eight millions of Mexicans are beholding in criminal indolence the malicious machinations of a few traitors who have usurped the supreme power, to rob you of your social and political existence, while one million of Paraguayans are astonishing the world by their heroic efforts to preserve the inheritance of their ancestors. Where are your Hídalgos, Iturbides, and Guerreros? Your Osollos, Miramones, and Mejías? Alas, we will not invoke their illustrious names, lest they arise from their tombs, and beholding our shame, lie down again to their eternal sleep, and repent that the first three gave us a country, and the last three poured out their blood to save it for us.

The name of Mexico, once beloved and respected by the whole world, because it was believed we Mexicans knew how to be independent, and would place our country in the rank to which it rightly belongs, is now the scorn and execration of all the nations of the earth. None consider us worthy of being free, and we are abandoned to our sad destiny. If there are any brave Mexicans left, they will hang their heads in deep humility at the aspect of this sad reality.

Is that sublime sentiment of patriotism, which ennobles and encourages nations, and which is the only thing that can save us now—is that feeling extinct in your bosoms? Do you not dread the dominion of a race so different from yours, its rule over the land that gave you birth, to its dictation even in your families, and that is sworn to your extermination? Will you suffer this grand legacy, sealed by your fathers' precious blood, to be taken from you, and your children left without a country, roaming like wandering Jews over the face of the earth? Will you allow the star spangled banner to intrude once more, to be hoisted again over the palace of your ancestors, there to wave forever? Will you let your lovely land, the sun of the New World, be transformed into a single solitary pallid planet to light a small corner of an invading banner, the flag of your conquerors?

No, my countrymen! arouse yourselves from this sad sleep of lethargy in which you have dozed for nearly half a century, and meditate a moment on your sad situation and your hopeful future, and I am sure you will stop your eternal party contests and join in defense of your beloved country. Arm yourselves, and with the banner of Iquala for your standard, march to the chastisement of traitors, and fortify your independence by the organization of a strong and durable, enlightened, and paternal government.

The contemptible beings, the spurious Mexicans that have scattered gore and mourning and ruin over the country, and now rule over you, are the same souls that now seek to keep the supreme power in their hands, by asking protection of our bitter enemies of the north, and offering in exchange for it, our richest departments on the north frontier, so that we may have the honor of becoming their slaves.

There is no mistake about this terrible reality, my friends; read the northern papers and you will find it out; then call Juarez and Romero to an account, and heed these words of warning addressed to you by a fellow-countryman, who has spent many drops of his blood for the good of his country, and whose sole ambition now is to die in defense of its independence.

To arms, then, Mexicans! The auspicious moment has arrived! The country calls you to defend it against a common enemy. Leave your homes, quit your firesides, forget all ancient animosities, and join in concert for the restoration of your liberties, so that you may deserve the right of reconstruction according to the suggestions of your free will.

Let us, then, shout for Mexican independence, for union and harmony, for peace, and real progress!

A TRUE MEXICAN.

NOTE.—The flourish appended to the above proclamation appears to be that of Taboada.

MEXICO, September 21, 1868.

Instructions from Santa Anna to General Bosque.

1. As soon as General Bosque occupies one or more towns in Mexico, he will promulgate the following plan without alteration, in a solemn manner, and will furnish the partisans of public order with means to make demonstrations of patriotism, such as acts favoring the plan, &c.

2. He will endeavor to make the revolution popular and acceptable to the people, and in harmony with their legitimate interests.

3. He will always bear in mind that the chief object of this revolution is to restore order, thus differing from the depredating revolutions, called liberal, that looked to party and personal gain, and disturbed order, morals, and justice.

4. He will also endeavor to make the revolution general, so as to insure its definite success.

5. When the cities are occupied, he will appoint competent civil, military, and political authorities to conduct their administration.

6. He will see that such authorities are subject to the imperial laws now in force, in political and civil cases; and in others, he will act according to his good judgment.

7. General Antonio Taboada will be recognized as my representative, in all cases, for the good of the nation.

8. He will give a report of his orders, and of the progress of the revolution, addressed to me at my temporary residence here, or wherever I may be.

ANTONIO LOPEZ DE SANTA ANNA.

HAVANA, September, 1868.

The Plan, or Constitution.

Whereas the constitution of 1857, now observed by the nation, is impracticable, because it takes away all power from the chief executive, when energy and unity of action are necessary to suppress revolutions that have disturbed the country for forty-seven years;

And said constitution deprives individuals and corporations of political rights, while it proclaims the most advanced principles of equality, liberty, and religious toleration;

And it caused the revolution of 1858, and the empire of 1863, and the usurpation of Juarez in 1867;

And whereas Benito Juarez had no right to extend his administration after the 30th of November, 1865, thus violating the constitution he had sworn to support ;

And the present political and social situation of the nation is intolerable, as it operates against the religion of our fathers, and puts Mexico in enmity to all civilized nations, reducing the country to isolation and barbarism ;

Whereas the nation ought to have a chief of merit and known antecedents, who can lead it back into the paths of rectitude and justice ;

And whereas that person ought to be Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna, the well-deserving hero of his country, who achieved its independence :

Therefore, we, the undersigned, have determined to proclaim the following political plan, and to call on the nation to adopt it :

ARTICLE 1. We hereby disavow the constitution of 1857 as the fundamental law of the Mexican nation, and order that it cease to be accepted wherever the present plan is adopted.

ART. 2. All public power for the preservation of order and the administration of justice shall be exercised by the general-in-chief of the army of restoration, wherever this plan prevails.

ART. 3. Chiefs who approve of this plan and are willing to support it, shall act as delegates of the general-in-chief, in their respective localities, for the purpose of enforcing this plan.

ART. 4. The well-deserving General Antonio Lopez de Santa Anna is proclaimed general-in-chief, and a copy of this instrument shall be sent to him, wherever he may be, hoping he will accept the place offered.

ART. 5. When the capital of the nation is occupied by the army of restoration, and the general-in-chief has established his headquarters there, all local commanders shall be subject to his orders, and shall acknowledge him as supreme chief and common center.

ART. 6. So soon as the general-in-chief thinks proper, he will renew the intercourse with foreign nations, but not allow them to disturb the independence and integrity of the nation.

ART. 7. Five years after the restoration of peace, or sooner, if the general-in-chief thinks proper, a convention of the people shall be called for the purpose of forming a constitution.

ART. 8. When that constitution is promulgated, the discretionary powers conferred upon General Santa Anna shall cease.

The preceding documents were intercepted at Matamoras, sent to Monterey, and thence transmitted to the city of Mexico, on the 14th September, 1868, by General Geronimo Treviño.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, September 30, 1868.

SIR : I give you herewith a copy of a note which has been received by me from the Secretary of the Treasury, in relation to existence on the Mexican bank of the Rio Grande of a belt of country which is free from import duties on commerce. This condition of things the Secretary of the Treasury thinks cannot be beneficial to Mexico while it is injurious to the revenue system of the United States. This subject will be far better understood at Mexico than it can be here. It is not our right to require Mexico to modify her tariff laws for our convenience ; nevertheless it is the custom among friendly nations to give respectful attention to suggestions mutually made of that character. You may confer with the minister of foreign affairs on that subject.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

EDWARD L. PLUMB, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. McCulloch to Mr. Seward.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, September 26, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a communication dated the 21st instant, from Mr. Samuel A. Beldon, of Brownsville, Texas, in reference to the existence on the Mexican side of the river Rio Grande of a belt of country which is free to commerce.

It is alleged by Mr. Beldon, and it has also been represented to the department through other sources, that by reason of the existence of such free belt of country, the loss to the revenue by means of smuggling is immense and continually increasing, and that it seriously affects the growth and prosperity of that portion of the United States which borders on the Rio Grande.

In view of these representations, it is respectfully suggested whether it would not be advisable to bring to the notice of the Mexican authorities the exemption of that section of country lying in the immediate proximity to the United States, from customs, duties, and exactions which, so far as I am advised, are enforced throughout the residue of the republic, thus inviting importation of merchandise with a view to its introduction into the United States without the payment of duty, and imposing a heavy expense on the United States government for the protection of the revenue on that frontier, without any corresponding benefit to Mexico, that I can perceive, which would justify a measure so injurious to a neighboring and friendly power.

I am, very respectfully,

H. McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

Mr. Beldon to Mr. McCulloch.

WASHINGTON CITY, D. C., September 21, 1868.

SIR: Some time in the year 1857 or 1858 the governor of the State of Tamaulipas, Mexico, issued a decree authorizing the merchants and citizens, inhabiting the strip of territory embraced in the portion of the State extending from the mouth of the Rio Grande to its furthest boundary, and from the river inland for two leagues, to introduce, free of duty, merchandise of all classes.

This is known as the zona libre, (free belt,) and the decree of the governor was in operation for three years before it was ratified by the general government, and is in full force at this time, notwithstanding the protests of the cities of Tampico and Vera Cruz against it as partial and unjust. The government was not in a condition to refuse any demand of the frontier, because of the heroic defenses which the inhabitants had made against Carvajal and other raiders. The merchandise introduced under this decree is required to pay duties only when exported from the zona libre to the interior of Mexico, or to the United States side of the Rio Grande, and its effect has been most disastrous to the commerce of the city of Brownsville, and other towns on our side of the Rio Grande, as well as to the revenue of the United States. No argument is required to prove this, nor can there be any doubt that it is the cause of the immense amount of contraband trade upon the frontier, the inducements to which are irresistible to such as are willing to engage in it, particularly in liquors and foreign merchandise, which can be purchased at Matamoras at a very small advance over the foreign cost, and their introduction into the United States at some point in an extended frontier of upwards of nine hundred miles cannot be prevented.

Prior to the existence of this decree the amount of merchandise in the United States bonded warehouses at Brazos de Santiago and Brownsville ranged from one to three millions of dollars, but since that period the trade has dwindled to such a point that the custom-house there, instead of being a means of revenue, is an expense to the United States.

For the removal of this incubus upon the trade of the citizens of our frontier, they are without power, but think that the relations which have existed between the governments of Mexico and the United States, since the passage of the decree, will justify prompt action on the part of the United States to terminate so flagrant an injustice.

Very respectfully,

SAM'L A. BELDON,
Of Brownsville, Texas.

HON. HUGH McCULLOCH,
Secretary of the Treasury.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, October 2, 1868.

SIR: In dispatch No. 75, of the 8th February last, I advised the department of the appointment by this government, of a commission for the formation of a new tariff.

This commission, it seemed then to be expected, would report in time for the new tariff bill to be submitted to Congress by the executive, at the April session of the present year; but up to the present moment their labors do not appear to have been completed.

The pendency of such a measure has naturally tended to delay importations, and the government has now published a notice, that while the contemplated change in the tariff relates mainly to its simplification and the placing of the different duties in one sole rate, and it is not designed to raise or to lower the duties now collected, that under any circumstances it is not probable the new tariff can be completed so as to go into operation under a year from the present time.

I beg to inclose herewith a translation of this notice.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

OFFICIAL STATEMENT REGARDING THE PROPOSED NEW TARIFF.

[From the Diario Oficial, city of Mexico, September 30, 1868.—Translation.]

CHANGE OF TARIFF.

It has come to the knowledge of the supreme government that one of the causes that has contributed to the present bad condition which is observed, of commerce, occasioned by the paralyzation of mercantile transactions, is the expectation that a new tariff will soon be issued, changing the duties upon various articles, which would determine any combinations now made by the importing houses.

It is also asserted that in some ports, as in Vera Cruz, information is even had as to the rates fixed in the new tariff upon articles of principal consumption.

The government desiring to calm the fears that may exist on this account, we hasten to state, with the proper authorization, that the principal object proposed by the executive in contemplating a reform in the tariff, was that of simplifying that now in force, reducing to a single quota the duties which in conformity with it are collected, simplifying so far as possible the operations of commerce and of the custom-houses, and at once adopting the decimal system of weights and measures which in conformity with our legislation has to be observed in the republic. It was not contemplated to raise or to lower the duties that are now collected upon foreign merchandise.

The commission appointed by the executive to prepare the project of the new tariff has not informed the department of treasury that it has concluded its labors. When the result of its labors shall be submitted, the government will consider the same, with the interest and the deliberation that so important an affair requires.

It will hear the opinion of the principal custom-houses of the republic, of the press, and of the national and foreign commerce, before conceding to the project its sanction, and in every case it will take care to avoid that there shall result from it prejudices to the merchants who have made their orders in conformity with the tariff now in force.

It is, therefore, almost certain that supposing there should be some alterations in the duties now collected, which is not probable, the new tariff could not commence to be in force under a year, and that for this reason legitimate commerce has nothing to fear in now making orders based upon the present tariff.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, October 2, 1868.

SIR: While not desiring to give too much importance to such indications, yet under the necessity which exists in this country for the introduction of foreign capital, experience, and skill, in industrial enterprises, no thoughtful observer of what is passing in Mexico can fail to notice, and no well-wisher of this country can fail to regret, the policy evinced in the first law passed by the Mexican congress at the present session, in the restriction contained therein that engineers to be employed upon a certain public work must be Mexican.

This provision was adopted by a very large vote, although the special attention of the chamber was called by a deputy to the impolicy of such restriction.

I beg to inclose herewith translation of the bill referred to and of the remarks made in congress upon this point.

DECREE OPENING A WAGON ROAD FROM THE CITY OF DURANGO TO THAT OF MAZATLAN.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, September 30, 1868.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF FOMENTO, COLONIZATION, INDUSTRY, AND COMMERCE,—SECTION 3.

The citizen President of the republic has been pleased to address to me the following decree:

Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to all the inhabitants of the same, be it known, that the Congress of the Union has thought proper to decree the following:

The Congress of the Union decrees:

ARTICLE 1. A wagon road shall be opened from the city of Durango to that of Mazatlan, passing by the Sierra Madre.

ART. 2. The expenses of the work shall be covered by the federal treasury, fifty thousand dollars per annum being assigned for that purpose, which shall be taken from the sum specified for roads in the appropriations for the department of fomento.

ART. 3. The executive will proceed immediately to appoint a commission of Mexican engineers, who, after a survey of the line, will form the plan of the work, and upon the approval of the same by the department of fomento, the work shall be commenced.

Hall of sessions of the Congress of the Union, Mexico, September 22, 1868.

JUSTINO FERNANDEZ, President.

JOAQUIM BARANDA, Secretary.
JUAN SANCHEZ AZCONA, Secretary.

Wherefore, I order that it be printed, published, and circulated, giving to it the due compliance.

PALACE OF THE GENERAL GOVERNMENT, Mexico, September 25, 1868.

BENITO JUAREZ.

The Citizen BLAS BALCARCEL,
Minister of Fomento, &c.

And I communicate the same to you for your knowledge and the consequent ends. Independence and liberty! Mexico, September 25, 1868.

BALCARCEL.

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT—SESSION OF THE 22d OF SEPTEMBER, 1868.

[From the Siglo XIX, Mexico, September 23, 1868.—Translation.—Extract.]

The Secretary, Mr. SANCHEZ AZCONA. The debate will continue upon the project of a road between Durango and Mazatlan.

Article second is under discussion. The article was approved by one hundred and eight votes against one.

Mr. SANCHEZ AZCONA, secretary. Article 3. "The executive will proceed immediately to appoint a commission of Mexican engineers, who, after a survey of the line, will form the plan of the work, and upon the approval of the same, the work shall be commenced." It is open to discussion.

Mr. BARRAGAN. The article which is under consideration, contains an exclusivism in the requirement that the engineers shall be Mexican. I do not believe that we are prejudiced against foreigners; but if we are, we should not say so. Nor should we appear as if we desired to exclude them from our society, when, on the contrary, we desire to attract them.

I beg that the committee will reform the article in the sense that I have indicated.

Mr. SANCHEZ AZCONA, secretary. Are there any who desire to speak? Shall the vote be taken?

Yes.

The vote is upon the approval of the article.

It resulted—affirmative, one hundred; negative, fourteen.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Sevard.

No. 203.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, October 8, 1868.

SIR: The annual report of the Mexican minister of treasury was presented to congress under date of the 28th ultimo, and is published in the Diario Oficial of the 3d and 4th instant. I transmit a copy to the department by this mail.

From this report it appears that the total receipts of the Mexican government for the first six months of the present year, viz: from the 1st January to the 30th June, being the second half of the last fiscal year, were $9,907,336.

This amount is stated to have been derived from the following sources:

General treasury, direct payments	$26, 868
Proceeds of nationalized property	276, 747
Stamped paper	1, 030, 468
Direct contributions in the federal district	352, 509
Custom-house of this capital	1, 026, 315
Post offices	384, 682
Department of fomento, direct payments	13, 421
Fund of public instruction	133, 627
Chancellaria	1, 558
Maritime and frontier custom-houses	5, 715, 881
Treasury collection offices	518, 847
Mints, assay, and duties on silver	426, 413
Total	9, 907, 336

For the first half of the year the data is incomplete. The city of Mexico was occupied by the liberal forces under General Porfirio Diaz on the 21st of June, 1867, but the constitutional government did not return to the capital until the 15th of July, and it was only at the end of July and in August that many of the federal collection offices were re-established, and some of the maritime custom-houses did not come into the possession of the government until after the reoccupation of the capital.

It is estimated, however, that the receipts for the first half of the fiscal year did not fall short more than one million and a half of those of the second half, thus making an estimated total of receipts for the year ending 30th June last, of $18,300,000.

It is estimated that of the total receipts, even for the last half of the year, fifteen to twenty per cent. failed to reach the control of the government, having been used by state or other authorities.

From the receipts for the past year, in estimating for the future, it is stated there will have to be deducted several items of revenue which have only a temporary character, such as the proceeds of fines and confiscations, proceeds of nationalized property, delayed contributions, &c. The reduction also, made by the suppression in the appropriation bill passed by congress at the close of the last session, of certain imposts previously existing, is estimated at some $800,000.

With the revenue that has thus far been realized, it is stated (I translate from the report) that "for the first time in many years it has been seen, actually repeated in a series of months that includes the bad season in the ports, that the general treasury has paid in full, at the end of every fortnight, their salaries to the civil list, and every fortnight in advance to the military. The employés, and the part of the army that from not residing in the capital do not receive their pay from said office, have yet been attended to with no less regularity." The expenditures, it is stated, however, absorb all the receipts, and this without making any provision for the payment of the interest on the public debt.

Under this head the minister of treasury states:

The government also believes it to be its duty frankly to manifest to congress that it does not consider that with the imposts now collected in the nation, it is possible to resume the payment of the interest of the debt. To obtain this result it will be necessary, in the judgment of the executive, to impose new contributions, or to wait until the consolidation of order and peace in the republic shall render it possible to reduce the army and the expenses it occasions; unless some sudden development of the great resources of the country shall be attained, in which case the revenue from the present imposts would give sufficient to meet that requirement.

In this situation it appears that the system entered upon under the decree of the 30th November of last year, establishing auctions for the buying in of the bonds of the public debt, is considered as highly desirable. It does not appear, however, that there have been held since that date more than four of these auctions for the foreign debt, and five for the interior debt. Of the English and Spanish bonds, it is stated $1,093,414 have been bought in at a cost of $204,995, and of the bonds of the interior debt, $1,026,827, at a cost of $85,842.

These are considered in the report as highly satisfactory financial results.

It is stated by the minister of treasury in this report with regard to their bonds issued in the United States, of which it is stated there are outstanding $2,425,450, that "the government would have made a supreme effort to pay the interest on these bonds in consideration of their privileged character, if it had not been, as I have already stated, that it has appeared to it unjust to prefer some to the prejudice of others, and because its circumstances have not permitted it to pay the interest of all."

With reference to reduction of imposts, or changes in the revenue system of the country, the report states:

The government recognizes that there is much to improve in the system of imposts now in force in the republic; it does not yield to any one in its desire to take part in the great work of reforming this legislation; but it believes that all else should be sacrificed to the peace of the nation, and until this is found solidly guaranteed it is not time to think of radical reforms, which have the great peril of destroying what exists without establishing anything real in its place.

The notice of delay with reference to the proposed reform of the tariff, of which I advised the department in my dispatch, No. 197, of the 2d instant, is repeated in the present report. It is stated therein that "in no case is it probable that the new tariff can commence to have effect under a year."

As in the notice published it was stated that it was not the design to raise or to lower the amount of the duties established under the existing tariff, but to simplify them and to establish a single import duty in place of the various additional duties now in force, so much delay in a matter of mere reform appears singular.

Reference is made in the report to the necessity of establishing light-houses in the Gulf and on the Pacific coast.

The report also states as follows:

The government of the State of Sonora has solicited the opening to foreign commerce of the port of Libertad, in the Gulf of California. The opening of this port may produce essential advantages to that State and to the nation in general, as it would probably be the route of communication with the Territory of Arizona, where the mining interest is taking great proportions. The government is occupied in carefully examining the antecedents of this affair, in order to proceed in the orbit of its faculties in the manner that it may believe most advantageous to the national interests.

Among the faculties conferred upon the President of the republic by the Mexican constitution, is the following, article 58, clause 14:

To open all classes of ports, establish maritime and frontier custom-houses, and designate their location.

It is therefore entirely within the discretion of the executive to open the port of Libertad at any time.

The recommendation of the governor of the State of Sonora, in favor of the opening of this port, as I am informed, has been before the government for now upwards of a year; there should be some hope, therefore, of action in the matter at no very distant day.

Since my arrival here, at this time last year, I have not failed, as often as propriety would permit, to commend to the consideration of this government the policy, as well as the advantage to Mexico, of the opening to the commerce of the United States of the transit across Sonora into the Territory of Arizona.

When applying, under your instructions of the 15th September, 1867, for the transit, by way of Guaymas or Libertad, of United States army supplies destined for Arizona, which was granted by way of Guaymas, I at the same time, in my conversations with Mr. Lerdo de Tejada, urged the propriety, as a measure of good policy on the part of this government, which would be appreciated by the commercial interests of the United States, of the free opening of both lines of transit, not merely for military supplies, the property of the government of the United States, but for all commerce.

Such measures, however, have thus far been acted upon very slowly here.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

SIR: In conformity with the request made in the note addressed to me by the department of foreign relations of the Mexican government, on the 10th of July last, relating to the reported renewal in the United States, by the enemies of the public order of Mexico, of their efforts to effect the organization of expeditions hostile to the peace of the Mexican republic, and expressing the expectation that the government of the United States would prevent the development of such projects, I immediately transmitted to the Secretary of State of the United States a copy of that note and of the documents which accompanied it.

I have received, by the mail which has just arrived, the reply of the Secretary of State.

In this reply I am advised that long prior to the receipt of my dispatch the attention of the government of the United States had been drawn to the organizations referred to.

Prompt, and it is believed, effectual measures, were taken for their suppression and the maintenance of the laws of the United States for the preservation of neutrality.

I am instructed to inform the government of Mexico of this fact, of which it has probably been apprised by the reports of its agents in the United States.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, your most obedient servant,

SIR: You were pleased to communicate to me in your note of the 30th of September last, that you had opportunely transmitted to the honorable Secretary of State of the United States of America, copy of the note of this department of the 10th of July last, and of the documents annexed to it, referring to the reported renewal within the territory of the United States by certain of the enemies of the public order and tranquillity of Mexico, of their efforts to organize expeditions hostile to the peace of this republic; and that you had now received the reply of the honorable Secretary of State, stating that long before the receipt of your dispatch the attention of the government of the United States had been directed to the said machinations, dictating prompt and efficacious measures to suppress them and to maintain the observance of the laws of neutrality of the United States.

I have given an account of your note to the President of the republic, and by his direction I have the honor to ask you to be pleased to express to the honorable Secretary of State the high appreciation with which the government of Mexico has seen the promptitude and efficacy of the measures of the government of the United States in the case referred to, esteeming the same as a new proof of its friendly sentiments towards Mexico, and as a new manifestation of the cordial relations which happily exist between the two republics.

SIR: In the report made to the Mexican congress on the 28th ultimo, by the minister of treasury, of which I gave a synopsis in my dispatch No. 203, reference was made to the subject of the opening to foreign commerce of the port of Libertad, in the Gulf of California, and it was stated that the government was occupied in carefully examining the subject, in order to proceed in the orbit of its faculties in the manner it might believe most advantageous to the national interests.

From a communication addressed to congress by the minister of treasury, on the 6th instant, published in the Diario Oficial of yesterday, it appears that the executive has resolved to open this port only to the coasting trade instead of to foreign commerce as had been expected, and as the government of the State of Sonora, according to the statement of the minister of treasury in his report, had solicited.

I beg to inclose translation of the communication referred to herewith.

TO THE COASTING TRADE.

[From the Diario Oficial, October 9, 1868.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 1.

The citizen President having resolved, in use of the faculty conceded to him by article 85, clause 14 of the constitution, to open to the coasting trade the bay of Lobos, (Port Libertad,) in the Gulf of California, on account of the great advantages which from such measure should result to the State of Sonora and to the nation, as is set forth in the reports which appear in the papers with reference thereto, which, for the information of the chamber, I have the honor to annex to this communication, it has appeared proper to initiate to congress an assignment of employes and their salaries in the new port equal to the assignment now made to the port of Goatzacoalcos; and that the executive be authorized to make expenditures not exceeding $25,000 in the works that may be necessary.

I renew to you the assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

SIR: On the 22d ultimo, I received from Mr. Ulrich, consul at Monterey, a letter under date of 12th ultimo, of which I beg to inclose copy herewith, in which he informs me that, on the 11th of September, the judge at Monterey gave his final decision in the case of the American citizens who were maltreated at that place.

I had expected that before this a copy of that decision would have been communicated to me by this government, but no communication whatever has been made to me on the subject of that outrage since Mr. Azpiroz's note of the 11th of August last, in which he stated that he had asked from the governor of Nuevo Leon the official documents in this affair, directing that the same be punctually remitted by return of mail. A copy of that note was transmitted to the department with my dispatch No. 171, of the 12th of August.

By the report of congressional proceedings, published in the Siglo XIX of yesterday, I see that Mr. Narciso Davila, late secretary of the governor of Nuevo Leon, who, according to the depositions of the parties aggrieved at Monterey, gave the orders for their arrest and ill treatment, has arrived at this capital, and, his credentials having been approved, was sworn in and took his seat as a member of the national congress on the 12th instant.

Mr. Ulrich to Mr. Plumb.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Monterey, September 12, 1868.

SIR: On yesterday the judge gave the final decision in the case of the six American citizens who were maltreated here.

The result is about what we all looked for, and while the decision punishes some of the parties concerned in the outrage, it still allows the principal instigator to go free.

The judge imposes a penalty of fifteen months' incapacitation to hold office on Juan Vara, who was warden of the jail. The parties who did the whipping, &c., in the jail, being already prisoners under long sentences, are not much incommoded by the penalty of being compelled to work on the streets for some months after their terms have expired, as a punishment for this offense.

Mr. Davila, ex-secretary of Governor Trevino, is not reached by this decision. The judge declares, in his statement, that there is no tribunal here before which he can be brought. If this be the case, we are then placed at the mercy of every petty official who may wish to annoy us. As Mr. Davila is the guilty party beyond a doubt, the others having been merely tools in his hands, there should be some tribunal competent to give him his deserts.

No notice whatever has been taken of the worst feature of the case, Davila's allowing the young Mexicans of the party, who were equally culpable with the others, to go to their homes, while the Americans alone were sent to jail. And, besides, there is no doubt but that it was through his orders that they were treated so severely.

As you, no doubt, will be furnished by the authorities with a copy of this decision, I think, on seeing it, you will agree with me in the opinion that the penalties affixed, and the character and position of the parties punished, is but a poor satisfaction to the persons aggrieved.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

SIR: Your dispatch of the 25th September, No. 193, has been received. It treats of alarms which have been raised in Mexico, by proceedings of General Santa Anna in Havana for organizing military expeditions in the Island of Cuba to invade Mexico, through the territory of the United States. You are authorized to communicate to the Mexican government the copy hereunto appended of two dispatches which have been received at this department from the United States vice-consul general at Havana. One of these is a dispatch which came by telegraph and bears date the 7th of October, and the other is a dispatch in writing, which carries the date of the 6th of the same month. There is no reason to apprehend any danger of such a proceeding originating in the United States.

SIR: At the request of Mr. Romero I transmit you the * Diario Oficial of Mexico, of the 24th ultimo. It contains the documents showing the latest attempted coup d'état of Santa Anna for upsetting the government of President Juarez.

As the steamer leaves in a few minutes, I have not the time to have it translated.

The attempt has completely failed, as will also any other on the part of Santa Anna.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

City of Mexico, October 22, 1868.

SIR: In the passage of a law published in the Diario Oficial of yesterday, providing for the navigation of the lakes in this valley by steam-boats, being the fourth act passed at this session of the Mexican congress, some remarks were made in the debate, and a feature was introduced in the bill as first reported by the committee, that merit notice in their relation to the feeling in this country as regards foreigners, to which I alluded in dispatch No. 198, of the 2d instant.

To judge intelligently of the situation here it is necessary that this feeling should be known. Whether there may not be sufficient cause for its existence, or what consequences may result therefrom, and whether it may not gradually disappear, as is to be hoped, it is perhaps not my province to discuss.

I beg to inclose translation of the remarks referred to herewith.

In a project of a general railroad law reported by the committee on industry in congress on the 2d instant, there are provisions containing the same ideas, of which I also inclose translation herewith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[From the Siglo XIX, city of Mexico, October 13, 1868.—Extract.—Translation.]

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT.—SESSION OF THE 12TH OCTOBER, 1868.

The project of law for the navigation of the lakes in the valley of Mexico by steam being under consideration, Mr. Sanchez Ascona, secretary, read article thirteen, which is as follows:

This company is purely Mexican, and on no account shall cease to have that character; by the sole act of passing to foreigners the concession shall be forfeited, and it shall be obligatory to return the sums that may have been received, as also to pay the duties and imposts that may have been caused, for which purpose the steamers and all that forms the capital of the enterprise shall be held hypothecated.

Mr. MATA. When I see what the committee here reports to us it appears to me that we have returned to the times of Philip II. I agree that the enterprise shall be Mexican, but why from the fact of there entering into it a foreigner should there be imposed the return of the small sum with which it is subventioned? All who take part in or form a company in the country are subject to its laws. This article will establish an odious restriction, and I therefore ask the committee to be pleased to withdraw it, or if not, that it be divided, as directed by the rules, in order that the chamber can thus vote the first part, and refuse the second, as I beg it will do.

Mr. BAZ. The committee has done nothing more than for some time past has been done in all affairs of this kind that have been approved by congress.

Mr. MATA states that all who take part in or form a company in the country, have to submit themselves to its laws. So it should be, but in practice it has proved to be otherwise. Experience has proved to us that the slightest incident in which foreigners suppose their interests to be attacked, is made the occasion of reclamations, and we now know to what those lead. This evil is what the committee has sought to avoid. Mr. MATA has been minister, and I wish that he would state to us what remedy he has found to impede, or at least to neutralize the effect of the reclamations of foreigners.

Here many observations can be made, but on coming to the result in practice difficulties are met with which it is necessary to prepare for beforehand.

Mr. PRIETO. Less severe than Mr. MATA, I understand all the embarrassments of reclamations, and the necessity of averting them; but the committee should bear in mind that our diplomatic relations with foreign governments are almost entirely discontinued; that we are now all under a common law, and therefore there is no occasion for the restriction treated of.

Mr. BAZ. If we did not remember how exacting foreigners have been; if the recollections were not so fresh of the pressure they have exercised upon the country, the observations of Messrs. MATA and PRIETO would have force. But experience warns us to be cautious, and the committee has reported this article to prevent the repetition of the disagreeable scenes to which such reclamations have given rise.

Mr. MATA. I have to state again that I asked the division of the article, as is provided in the rules. For the rest I would mention that I am not myself under discussion. As I have never been minister of foreign affairs, I have never had to study the manner of impeding reclamations.

The constitution marks clearly what are the obligations of the foreigner in the republic. When it shall be necessary to subject them to the restrictions now proposed, it will be better to state to them that they shall not reside among us, and to close to them our ports. There is scarcely an enterprise in which foreigners have not a part, and to condemn them in this manner on account of a miserable subvention of $4,000, is even worse, as I have already said, than to close to them our ports. We have proclaimed the principle of universal fraternity, and we should be faithful to it.

Mr. BAZ. The committee does not believe that it should reform the article. It is a clause which has its utility, for although Mr. Prieto states that there cannot be reclamations, because we have no diplomatic relations, the truth is that there are. They are of North Americans, but they exist. I know several.

On the other hand, the committee does not state that foreigners shall not take part in enterprises, but that enterprises shall not be made foreign.

Mr. PRIETO. I beg the committee will be pleased to divide the article, for article 100 of the rules so directs. The article we are discussing is composed of two parts, and if it is not divided in approving it there will be approved what the chamber does not desire, and in rejecting it there will also be rejected a part that congress wishes to approve.

Mr. SANCHEZ ASCONA. The committee reform the article in this manner:

"The company is purely Mexican, and in no case can it lose this character. It will be subject to the laws and tribunals of the country. With respect to the responsibilities that it contracts with the government, there will remain hypothecated the steamers and all that forms the capital of the enterprise."

The vote having been taken, the article was adopted by sixty-nine votes against forty-nine.

PROJECT OF A GENERAL RAILROAD LAW REPORTED BY COMMITTEE IN THE MEXICAN CONGRESS.

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT.—SESSION OF THE 2D OCTOBER, 1868.

The first reading was given to the following project of law reported by the committee on industry, which was ordered to be printed:

ARTICLE 8. The concessions shall be forfeited:

1. If they are hypothecated, transferred, or ceded, in whole or in part, to any foreign government.
2. If they are hypothecated, transferred, or ceded to any individual or corporation without the previous permission of the authorities that have made them.

ARTICLE 17. The companies, shareholders, creditors, directors, employers, laborers, and in general, all persons who have any part in railroad enterprises in the republic, shall be considered as Mexicans in all that relates to the same; they cannot allege rights as foreigners with respect to interests connected with the enterprise, nor can they have, even when alleging denial of justice, other rights or other means of enforcing them than those that the laws of the republic concede to Mexicans.

PROJECT OF RAILROAD CONCESSION TO VERA CRUZ.

CONGRESSIONAL REPORT.—SESSION OF THE 22D SEPTEMBER, 1868.

Mr. Peña y Ramirez presented the following project of law, signed by a majority of the representatives in congress from the state of Coahuila:

Project of law with reference to the railroad to Vera Cruz. Concessions.

ARTICLE 24. This permission shall be forfeited:

1. By the transfer, cession, or hypothecation of the rights under it, in whole or in part, to a foreign government, or the reclamation by the company under whatever pretext, of foreign protection.
2. For the transfer, cession, or hypothecation of the same to any individual or corporation, without the previous consent of the government.

ARTICLE 26. The penalty of forfeiture for the causes to which paragraph 1 of article 24 refers will produce, in addition to the penalties established in the preceding article, criminal action against the infractors, as traitors to the country; suffering in consequence a fine equal to the half of the capital they represent in the road, without prejudice to the other penalties to which they may be liable in conformity with the general laws of the country.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: In an interview with Mr. Lerdo de Tejada at the department of foreign affairs on the 20th instant, I read to him your dispatch No. 99, of the 17th ultimo, according to the instruction therein contained, and at his request left with him a copy of the same.

Mr. Lerdo, in that interview, confined himself to remarking that with reference to the case of the murder of Mr. Braniff, referred to, he would at once himself make an investigation to see that all was being done that could be done to bring the guilty parties to justice.

An expression, however, was added of his sense that the course of the government of the United States towards Mexico certainly had been marked by great consideration.

A note from Mr. Lerdo de Tejada upon the subject of that dispatch reached me this morning, of which copy and translation are inclosed herewith.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

MEXICO, October 28, 1868.

SIR: In our interview of the 20th of this month, you were pleased to leave with me a copy of the note addressed to you by the Hon. Secretary of State of the United States of America, on the 17th of September last, with reference to the death of Mr. John Braniff, a citizen of the United States, in consequence of wounds inflicted by malefactors who assaulted the house where he was, belonging to Mr. Pablo Guarneros, in the village of Santa Cruz, of the State of Tlaxcala, about 9 o'clock of the night of the 6th of April of this year.

As I said to you in our interview, the object of the note of this department of the 18th of August was to express all the zeal of the government for the better administration of justice. Esteeming highly, therefore, what in the note of the 17th of September the Hon. Secretary of State has been pleased to state with reference to the constant efforts of the government after the prolonged civil and foreign war that Mexico has sustained, to re-establish order and peace in all the republic, after our interview I addressed the same day, the 20th, a communication to the governor of Tlaxcala, asking from him a new report as to whether any information had been obtained of the malefactors and their apprehension had been effected.

The governor has answered me under date of the 24th, referring to the reports of the judge who has had charge of the affair, in which it is explained that as the assault took place at night, and the malefactors were immediately repulsed without being recognized by those who were in the house, and without its being known that they were seen by other persons outside of it, in the small village of Santa Cruz, all the efforts made to ascertain who the criminals were have thus far unfortunately proved inefficacious.

The judge adds that he continues endeavoring with especial care to obtain some indication with reference to said criminals, and that he is observant of every occasion or circumstance that may serve for their discovery.

The government regrets that this has not yet been attained, and desiring that no means shall be omitted to secure, if possible, the punishment of the guilty parties, it now repeats to the governor of Tlaxcala the special charge that for this purpose has been made to him.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
S. LERDO DE TEJADA.

SIR: In addition to the data relating to the amount and classification of the Mexican customs receipts, transmitted to the department with my dispatch No. 209, of the 20th ultimo, I beg now to transmit herewith a very elaborate and complete statement which appeared in the Diario Oficial of yesterday, showing the amounts collected for the first six months of the present year, at each of the maritime and frontier custom-houses of the republic, under each of the different duties now imposed. The different duties upon merchandise and vessels, it appears, according to the classification made, are thirty in number.

It will also be observed that the total amount of the duties collected at all the frontier custom-houses, including Matamoras, is a little less than four hundred thousand dollars for the first six months of the present year, or at the rate of eight hundred thousand dollars per annum.

Assuming that the average rate of duties now charged by Mexico amounts only to fifty per cent. upon the value of effects imported, the above sum of eight hundred thousand dollars would therefore show a commercial movement of legitimate commerce, of only one million six hundred thousand dollars per annum, for the entire frontier of Mexico, including the port of Matamoras.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 2d of October, No. 198, in which paper you call my attention to a provision contained in a recent act of the congress of Mexico, which excludes foreign engineers from employment on a highway which it is proposed to build from the city of Durango to the city of Mazatlan. The exclusion, like all laws which are in the nature of monopolies, is probably as unwise for the interest of Mexico as it is inhospitable. Nevertheless, it may be regarded as the expression of a sentiment which is popular at the present moment in Mexico. I am sure that, after the experience of foreign intervention which that country has had, no one can think the sentiment unnatural, when it is regarded in that light. It is much to be desired that foreigners sojourning in Mexico, and seeking employment there, should contribute to the welfare and prosperity of their adopted country, and so lay claim to its gratitude, instead of increasing its domestic embarrassments.

No. 222.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, November 14, 1868.

SIR: In dispatch No. 115, of the 21st of April last, I referred to an important vote of the Mexican congress, involving the assertion of the principle that the acts of the executive, in the exercise of the extraordinary powers conferred to meet the intervention, were subject to revision by congress.

The position so taken, which arose with reference to the Vera Cruz railroad concession, made by the executive on the 27th of November last, has since then been the subject of a severe struggle between the opposition and the ministerial party in congress, and in the public press, varied in a measure, however, by the special questions involved in that concession.

On the opening of the present session, this was one of the questions of chief importance awaiting a solution.

If the position taken by congress at the previous session should be fully sustained, and the decree in question should be revised independent of the action of the executive, it was felt that all of the acts of the government, during the exercise of its late extraordinary powers, might at any time hereafter, by a congress embracing a larger element of opposition, be summarily taken up and declared subject to revision, and thus a degree of uncertainty would be thrown over the entire legislative action of the executive that would be most unfortunate for the country.

On the other hand, if the question should now be favorably determined, in a case affording in itself to the opposition so many points of attack, it was believed that this issue, involving a permanent vote of confidence in the executive, would be effectually terminated.

Certain features of the concession made by the government to the railroad company have, however, been considered as so objectionable, both by the members of congress in general and by the public at large, that some modifications were admitted by both parties to be necessary.

As a final result, the issue has been met by the voluntary proposal by the government, with the consent of the company interested, of certain modifications in the concession as made last November, which congress has accepted, and with which it has declared the decree of the 27th of November, made by the executive, to be in force, thus waiving the principle of the right of revision, while gaining some of the modifications desired in the special decree under consideration.

The result is considered generally, I believe, as a triumph on the part of the government in the question of the right of revision, as asserted by the vote of congress at the previous session, and has possibly set that question permanently at rest, in a sense the reverse of the position then assumed. The action I have indicated reached a conclusion by the final vote of congress on the 10th instant, and the new decree was published in the Diario Oficial of the 12th instant.

By the terms of this concession as originally made, and as now confirmed by the foregoing action of congress, a subvention is given to the company of $560,000 per annum for twenty-five years.

It is also provided, article 21, that the government shall emit a special paper under the name of "Bonds of the Vera Cruz and Mexico railroad" to the amount of the above $560,000 for each of the four years during which the construction of the road is to continue, which paper is to be admitted in payment of twelve per cent., or to the extent of the sum mentioned, of the duties of importation accruing at the ports of Vera Cruz, Tampico, Matamoras, Manzanillo, and Mazatlan.

If the twelve per cent. of the duties of importation at the five ports mentioned is not sufficient to cover the $560,000 per annum, then the government is to pay the deficiency in money at the city of Mexico.

By article 22, it is provided that from the date of the present law it shall be obligatory upon all importers to pay twelve per cent. of the duty accruing upon effects imported, in this paper, and not in money, under the penalty of having to make a second payment of double the amount. In article 23, it is provided that the minister of fomento shall annually deliver to the railroad company, during the four years of the construction of the road, $560,000 in the paper before mentioned, and that the company has the obligation to maintain in the city of Mexico, and in each of the five ports mentioned, a deposit of the bonds, in order that the importers can purchase the same in due time for their requirement, in the payment of the stipulated twelve per cent. of duties on all importations.

It is also provided that the company shall not sell this paper at a higher price than the value it represents.

After the conclusion of the road, the government is to make the payment of the $560,000 per annum in money, at the city of Mexico, in quarterly payments, and engages to continue these payments without default, and without suspension, variation, or conversion in any form whatever.

Under article 40 of the original decree, it was also provided, as I have before had occasion to advise the department in dispatch No. 44, of the 12th of December last, that until the 31st of December, 1871, or earlier if before that date the road shall be finished, the import duty called sinking fund of the public debt of twenty-five per cent., formerly required to be paid in bonds of the public debt, should be reduced to fifteen per cent., and should be paid at all of the maritime custom-houses of the republic, in shares of stock of the Vera Cruz railroad, which importers must buy for this purpose. The bonds of the public debt, interior, could be purchased at from seven to ten cents on the dollar, but shares of stock in the railroad company will have to be purchased at full rates, thus largely increasing this duty.

By the present law, this arrangement is confirmed and continued, and is extended for another year, viz: to the 31st of December, 1872, unless the road shall be entirely finished, including tunnels and bridges, before that time.

According to the custom-house returns officially published by this government, transmitted to the department with my dispatch No. 213, of the 6th instant, it appears that the amount of the above duty of fifteen per cent. at the maritime custom-houses, for the first six months of the present year, was $455,000, thus making the amount to be given to the railroad company under this head, upwards of $900,000 per annum.

The shares so received are to be held by the government without power to dispose of them until the road is finished.

Of the total distance between this city and Vera Cruz, of 261 miles, 133 miles have been for some time in operation, leaving 128 miles of railroad yet to be completed. On this 128 miles, before the granting of the recent concession, according to official reports of the company, upwards of fifty per cent. of the grading and masonry had been finished. The assistance, therefore, now given to the English company may be characterized as liberal, especially when it is considered that it takes from the revenue of the country, upwards of $1,500,000 per annum at a time when, according to the report made to Congress by the minister of the treasury, on the 28th of September last, it appears that the revenue is insufficient to enable the government to pay the interest on the foreign debt.

This consideration, and the continuance in the concession of the system of additional duties, which there is a growing desire on the part of members of congress to put an end to, explains in part the motives, aside from the question of the right of revision, which have led to the opposition that has been so strongly manifested against this particular measure.

I beg to inclose to the department herewith, copies of the decrees referred to, and have alluded to the subject, both because of the interest of the question involved in the point first mentioned, and because the concession as made is one of some public import, from the fact of its absorbing at the present time upwards of one-twelfth of the public revenues of Mexico, and its direct bearing upon foreign commerce in the stipulations as to the manner of the payment of a portion of the duties on imports, and the forced continuance of the objectionable system of additional duties.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

LAW PROVIDING FOR A CENSUS.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, November 15, 1868.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF GOVERNMENT.—SECTION 1.

The citizen President of the republic has been pleased to address to me the following decree:

Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to all the inhabitants of the same, be it known, that the congress of the Union has thought proper to decree the following:

ARTICLE 1. The governor of the States, of the federal district, and of the territory of Lower California, shall proceed to form a census of the inhabitants within their respective commands, immediately upon the promulgation of the present law. The census shall be concluded by the 28th day of February, 1869.

ART. 2. The general result of the census of each State of the federal district and of the territory of Lower California shall be sent by the governors to the department of government by the 13th of March next, in order that it may be published in time to serve as the basis of the general elections of deputies to the congress of the Union which are to take place in June and July, 1869.

ART. 3. The governors who do not comply with what is ordered in the present law shall suffer the penalty of suspension from their office for the term of six months to one year, according to the circumstances of their official neglect.

No. 224.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, November 20, 1868.

SIR: The commission appointed by this government to revise the tariff, of which I advised the department in dispatch No. 75, of the 8th of February last, has concluded its labors, and on the 11th instant submitted a report, accompanied by the project of a new tariff, to the department of treasury. Yesterday the minister of treasury informed congress that the government is now engaged in examining the project, and will submit the same to congress at an early day.

The report addressed to the minister by the commission, which accompanied the project of tariff explanatory of the general features of the reforms proposed, has been published, and I transmit a translation of the same herewith.

From this it appears that in the new project a general reduction of duty of ten per cent. on dry goods, groceries, and common hardware is proposed, and an increase of the same amount in the duty on fine hardware.

The system of specific duties has been adopted by the commission. The free list, it is stated, has been augmented, and the quotas on articles of first necessity diminished. The commission recommends the abolition of prohibitions and the free exportation of all products, including ores, but retaining, for a time, an export duty on silver and gold, coined and in bars. To facilitate the exportation of the latter, assay offices at four of the principal ports are recommended.

The commission recommend the equal application of the tariff over all the republic, and therefore the termination of any special privileges that may have been given to certain localities.

Under the exceptional character of the case, however, in the so-called free zone of Tamaulipas, the commission state that "the establishment there of a port of deposit might be recommended, although the measure would have in its realization very grave inconveniences."

The majority of the commission, it is stated, are not in favor of the establishment of ports of deposit.

A period of sixty days for the payment of duties is recommended. It is also proposed that three-fourths of the amount of duties be paid in drafts to the order of the minister of treasury.

The commission states that it has believed it desirable to unify the duties, and recommends that interior custom-houses be suppressed. It also states, that, with reference to the form of the tariff, the metrical-decimal system has been adopted in all the calculations, the number of specifications of merchandise considerably reduced, a more regular and compendious nomenclature adopted, and that the administrative proceedings have been simplified.

The use of stamps in place of sealed paper is also recommended.

As this latter measure has already been proposed in congress for general adoption, it is probable this reform will be accomplished.

The first great object necessary to be attained in the reform of the Mexican tariff is its simplification and the removal of restrictions. The desirable adjustment of the rate of duties will then be less difficult.

From what I learn from the government, it appears probable that after some examination of the project of the new tariff by congress, a general authorization will be given to the executive for its conclusion.

The present session of congress, it is believed, will be extended for a period of thirty days from the date fixed for its ordinary adjournment, which is the 16th proximo; but this is as long an extension as is permitted by the constitution.

Should such authorization be given, the tariff may be completed in time to go into force, perhaps, at the commencement of their coming fiscal year, viz., on the 1st of July next, which is earlier than was indicated in the notice I communicated to the department with dispatch No. 197, of the 2d of October.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

TARIFF.

[From the Siglo XIX, Mexico, November 17, 1868.—Translation.]

TARIFF COMMISSION.

To the Citizen Minister of the Treasury and Public Credit, present :

The undersigned commissioners have the honor to inclose to your department the project of tariff, the formation of which the citizen President of the republic was pleased to intrust to them, expressing at the same time their regret that it has not been possible to remit this work before, on account of the difficulties with which they have had to contend in completing it.

The commission does not believe that it has entirely met the desires of the President, because for this it would be necessary to accord to it a perfect knowledge of all the different branches of industry, from which and from a knowledge of our fiscal legislation and of our international commerce to adjust the reform of a law as delicate as important; but, however difficult and laborious may have been the discharge of a trust to those who judge themselves insufficient for it, the zeal which is brought to the task may make amends.

A detailed report of the reforms contained in the project we present may be considered unnecessary, as neither your department nor the public would attempt to estimate the greater or less difference in the quotas assigned to the thousand articles embraced in our foreign commerce; but we believe it our duty to indicate generally the principal points to which these reforms relate, taking as their basis the development of our new institutions, as also the progress of our commerce in the twelve years that have elapsed since the publication of the ordinance now in force.

We have first to indicate that the commission does not accept entirely the idea that a reduction of the rates of duties is indispensable for the progress of a country, nor that this can be done to any great extent in those of the republic, when throughout the whole epoch of our political existence, foreign commerce has formed sixty-six per cent. of all the sources of revenue of the federal treasury.

In some countries the maritime revenues do not occupy an important place, but this difference, so remarkable, rests in a truth which cannot be placed in doubt, which is, that territorial wealth, in combination with the love of labor, begets an industry which being sufficient for domestic necessities overpasses the frontier to seek in its turn the tribute of foreign capital. Then, when production is superior, or at least equal to consumption, the exchange is perfect, and the people and governments can lend to each other mutual aid without its being burdensome on the one hand, or on the other difficult to exact.

Unfortunately this advantage is very far from being realized in Mexico, not because there are lacking elements of life, but on account of causes independent of the gifts with which nature has been so prodigal to this soil, which have rendered it impossible for it to place itself at the altitude which belongs to it. Notwithstanding this, neither has the commission been prejudiced in favor of the idea that duties have a purely fiscal object, because it only admits the principle with reference to burdens upon foreign effects, that these shall be laid solely so far as may be strictly necessary; but even if it had had the intention that we should conform ourselves to the practice of other nations, no fixed principle could be adopted, for none exists, as is seen immediately from an examination of contemporary statistics, that labyrinth of principles and of numbers that points out only the imperative duty of attending to the public necessities without pre-occupying ourselves with doctrines whose practice is not observed even by those who have undertaken to proclaim them. A single example will be sufficient to prove this. Between the wealth of England and that of Spain, a comparison is not possible, and notwithstanding the first receives from its maritime revenues thirty-three per cent of the total estimates of the crown, while the second only receives ten per cent. With these observations the commission will proceed to give an idea of the general result of their labors. As a principal point they proposed to equalize the custom-house duties in the various branches of which foreign traffic is composed. For that purpose with reference to articles commonly known under the denomination of dry goods, groceries, and ordinary hardware, it has made an average deduction up to ten per cent. upon the existing tariff, and an increase of the same amount upon fine hardware.

At first view it might be believed that the total receipts would be reduced thereby, as the importation of the former is greater than of the latter; but having abolished the system of collection upon the value of the invoice, which in medicinal drugs, chemical products and other articles gives rise to a punishable abuse, doing the same with the system of appraisement, and placing upon all these articles fixed quotas, comprehending in these textile fabrics containing different materials, and those composed of different materials in other articles, it is evident that the federal treasury will receive all its duties in avoiding the possibility that now exists of the price of an article being placed at ninety per cent. below its cost, or of eluding the just payment because a texture of wool has a thousandth part of cotton. From this it results that while private interests will not be burdened, the maritime revenues should have an increase of at least ten per cent. And this increase, which, without burdening legitimate commerce, is not doubtful for the federal treasury, will be certain for the municipalities in whose favor the commission recommends the payment of twenty cents for every one hundred kilograms of gross weight upon imported merchandise, that now collected under the ordinance in force being only twelve and a half cents for every two hundred Spanish pounds, which is with little difference the same proportion; and for rendering effective this benefit to the municipalities, which is repugnant to no one, they propose in the mode of payment an efficacious means by which each treasury will receive what belongs to it, because from the contrary we might see with regret the federal treasury absorb in periods of great distress even those funds which are dedicated by their institution to objects of benevolence, public instruction, and the material necessities of the various populations.

In so far as possible we have taken a step forward in conformity with the ideas of liberty which dominate throughout the republic, augmenting the free list by a number of articles and diminishing very sensibly the quotas on those of prime necessity, and upon instruments and ingredients which are necessary for the national industry.

For the first we have had the design of facilitating by this means the increase of our internal traffic, furnishing at lower prices all that it may be necessary to acquire from foreign commerce, and for the second that of rendering to the agricultural and mining interests an immense benefit, by placing the poorer classes in a position to labor with less inconvenience.

The commission has believed it equitable, necessary, and economical to abolish the pernicious system of prohibitions; for which reason, and in deference to a constitutional precept, it recommends that there should be none upon importations, combining with this idea that of the free exportation of all of our products, giving in this manner the last blow to the remains of the colonial system, which has been so untoward for the public wealth through the monopolizing of our natural products; and if in this part the desires of the undersigned and those especially manifested by other nations are not fully met, it will serve as an excuse for the small exception that is made of silver and gold, coined and in bars—the consideration that the treasury would be suddenly deprived of a resource which for the present there is no means of compensating, at the same time that the debt would be augmented, all of the mints not being under the immediate control of the government.

Later this measure may be recommended in accordance with the interests of our industrial classes, there being sufficient for the present: the indubitable benefit which will be afforded to them by the free exportation of ores, the value of which is now in a great part nominal, either from natural difficulties in the situation of the veins, or because our system of reduction is too expensive, or not adapted to the chemical character of many ores. But in order that the article to which we have referred at the beginning of this paragraph may have its due effect, the commission believes that the establishment of assay offices, as departments of the maritime custom-houses of the four ports therein mentioned, is desirable. The increase in the annual appropriations will be compensated by the expenses of assay which the introducers will have to pay.

From the removal of prohibitions there follows, as a necessary consequence, the abolition of certain privileges accorded by the ordinance of 1856 and by subsequent laws in favor of various ports. These privileges cannot subsist, because they are pernicious and unjust, inadmissible and condemned in the fiscal legislation of all the world, as also expressly and absolutely condemned in our fundamental charter. The first, because in making concessions to one locality for a given motive there is no reason for refusing the same to another, if alleging the same or other grounds; and in such case, by privilege on privilege, the federal revenues would be very seriously diminished.

The second, because in the benefits of a law there should be included all the inhabitants of the republic, whatever may be the place of their residence, and the industry or labor to which they are ordinarily dedicated.

The third, because the basis upon which a maritime tariff should rest is uniformity, favoring by this means, justly and equitably, the diverse and complicated operations of foreign commerce, and avoiding also the inequality in prices which would occur from the authorized monopoly, in the interior of the country, of the importers who had obtained such advantages.

And finally, under article 28 of our constitution no one can sustain that, from geographical considerations, or from the configuration of certain localities, the sacrifice of a principle should be obligatory to the denial of other rights and other interests.

Above all, by fixing the view for an instant upon the map of the republic, it will be seen immediately how marked is the difference which should equitably be made between the merchants of the two coasts; those of the Gulf having their markets in direct communication, while those of the Pacific have to make the round of all the continent.

Even in this manner the idea is not exact, for the climate, the configuration of each bay, the direction of the currents, the customs of each people, their local governments, and a thousand other causes, influence directly in the progress or depression of their commerce.

This admitted, it places your department under the impossibility of conceding exemptions and privileges to specified ports. Notwithstanding, under the exceptional character of the case in the so-called free zone of Tamaulipas, the establishment there of a port of deposit might be recommended, although the measure would have in its realization very grave inconveniences.

Another idea the commission believes it should recommend, because it is required for the popular administration of justice. Until now there has passed unperceived all of the grave, inconvenient, and immoral that there is in the authorization that the fiscal agents should be participators in the pecuniary penalties imposed upon contrabandists; and if this principle is universally rejected by modern legislation, in so far as relates to trials, whose conduct pertains to independent tribunals, with how much more reason should it be repugnant when these trials are commenced, and sentence is rendered by the individuals to whom the law assigns a part of the fine. The commission does not reflect upon the integrity nor the very respectable number of persons who fill these posts, by supposing that the inducement thus presented is the only stimulant for compliance with their duty; but the fact is, citizen minister, that the judge should not have before himself even the shadow of what might affect the rectitude of his acts. If, notwithstanding what has been stated, your department has a different opinion, the undersigned believe that the articles relative thereto should remain in the project without any alteration, with the reservation of recommending an increase of salary to the employers, to whom, by the adoption of this principle, prejudice would result.

Having thus set forth the principal points of our work, we will descend to other particulars. The commission has believed it desirable to unify the duties, as well because it is in conflict with our system to have special funds, as because this measure is the most facile for the relief of the material labor in the maritime custom-houses.

For the same reason, there being now no object whatever for the subsistence in the interior of the republic of collecting offices for federal revenues, as all of the duties are to be paid in the maritime custom-houses, it being a fact that, in compliance with a constitutional precept, the interior custom-houses have already been suppressed in various States, the commission recommends that all documents whose issuance was required under the old system be reduced to a single one, which shall consist of a certificate that such merchandise has been legally imported, the circulation of nationalized effects in the interior being as a consequence free.

Notwithstanding this and of the conviction of the undersigned, that without very grave inconveniences for commerce, and without a new and considerable burden for the treasury, no system of vigilance can be established which will fully protect the public interests, the commission judges that the most practicable means, the most liberal and the most efficacious, that can be put in practice, is no other than that of guarding our coasts, which object can be very well attained by establishing a maritime guard in small steam-vessels.

In the commission, by one of its members, the establishment of ports of deposit was proposed, but the idea was not accepted by the majority, it being adopted in place thereof that the payment of duties should be made at an extension of time relatively small, compared with their ordinary and total amount. The commission does not believe that this can be prejudicial to the government, because as a final result for it this term will be but for once, as the first period of sixty days having been passed, the importations will then follow in continuous payments, and the treasury will receive its funds without any interruption; and precisely on account of the idea that the commission has had of protecting these receipts from the abuses which have been committed by various military authorities in consort with the collectors of the custom-houses, it proposes that three-fourths part of the duties shall be paid in drafts to the order of your department, in order that that provision shall serve as a legal excuse for all who take part in this act.

It is possible that the committee has neglected to refer to some other points of importance in the project, but it reserves itself to do so in a more detailed manner, when your department shall believe it necessary to call for the same.

With reference to the form and mode of the tariff, the metrical decimal system has been adopted in all the calculations; the number of specifications of merchandise has been considerably reduced; a more regular and compendious nomenclature has been given to the body of the tariff; the administrative proceedings have been simplified, and the interests of the treasury have been assured in the best possible manner, without losing sight on this account of the principle of equity to which those who contribute to the public funds are entitled.

The national marine preserves in the new project the place that belongs to it, without this preference conflicting with the principle of liberty which has been its basis.

Finally, in order to facilitate the dispatch of foreign merchandise the undersigned propose that in place of the sealed paper that is now in circulation, the use of stamps be introduced for maritime transactions, the value of which to be as specified in the articles relating thereto.

By this means, which is the most economical for the federal treasury, a step will be taken far in advance towards the attainment at a later moment of their entire adoption in all that relates to official acts.

In fine, citizen minister, the project that we have the honor to present to you embraces all the reforms that are now recognized as desirable in the best revenue systems; in so far as our inability has permitted, we have overlooked nothing; and if our work is not perfect, it will be at least preparatory to another which may be carried into effect by persons who may have the advantage over us in information, but not in desire to serve the interests of the republic. Notwithstanding this, we have the conviction that the project will have its detractors, because it is difficult, if not impossible, to satisfy all the diverse interests created, either by custom or by the law, although in the one case they may be pernicious, and in the other undesirable.

It would be unjust not to make mention of the names of Messrs. Theodore Rapp, Luis de Vivanco, Alfred Wisel, Augustin Holting, and Carlos Nieth, who with their knowledge have contributed efficaciously and spontaneously to the discharge of our trust. We believe, therefore, that we should express in this note the testimony of our gratitude and recognition, anticipating that which should be given by your department.

We protest to you with this occasion the assurances of our respect and esteem.

DECREE RELATING TO DIFFERENTIAL DUTIES, AND ESTABLISHING A PREMIUM ON THE CONSTRUCTION OF NATIONAL VESSELS.

[From the Diario Oficial, Mexico, December 2, 1868.—Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF TREASURY AND OF PUBLIC CREDIT.—SECTION 1.

The citizen President of the republic has been pleased to address to me the following decree:

Benito Juarez, constitutional President of the United Mexican States, to all the inhabitants of the same, be it known:

That the congress of the union has thought proper to decree the following:

The congress of the union decrees:

ARTICLE 1. If effects imported or exported in Mexican vessels are subjected in the ports of another nation to the payment of differential duties, the effects imported or exported in vessels of that nation, proceeding from said ports, and which arrive in those of the republic, shall be subjected to the payment of the same duties.

ART. 2. Two nautical schools shall be established; one in the port of Campeche, and the other in that of Mazatlan, for the instruction of youth destined for service in the national marine.

ART. 3. With reference to said schools the decree of the 30th of May, 1857, is declared in force, with the sole modification that there be added to the estimate of the monthly expenditures of the said nautical schools the sum of seventy dollars for the salary of a professor of the French language.

ART. 4. There is conceded to the constructors in the republic of national vessels, which measure from one hundred tons and upwards, a subvention of fifteen dollars per ton, which subvention shall be paid by order of the minister of fomento immediately that the vessel constructed shall be launched.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Mexico, December 1, 1868.

SIR: In your note of the 7th of August last you referred to the case of certain citizens of the United States of America who complain of bad treatment received in the city of Monterey, on the night of the 21st of April last.

In a reply, dated 11th August, this department stated, that if the complaint of those citizens of the United States was well founded, the government of the republic would have the subject investigated and the guilty punished; and information on the subject has already been asked for.

The government of the State of New Leon transmitted to this department, on the 25th of August, a report of the examination of the accused, and stated that justice would soon be rendered in the case. This report was not communicated to you because the case had not been decided. As judgment has not yet been rendered, further information has been asked by this department.

In the mean time I think proper to send you the information that has come to hand.

No. 1 is the communication addressed to the governor of New Leon, on the 9th of May, as soon as I heard of the outrage on American citizens, through the newspapers, inquiring about the facts, and ordering an investigation and subsequent report of the trial.

No. 2 is the report made by the governor of New Leon, on the 22d May, stating that the investigation had not been made, and that no officials had taken part in the offensive acts.

No. 3 is the communication from this department to the governor of New Leon, dated 11th August, asking for a minute account of the affair, and ordering a judicial investigation.

No. 4 is the communication of the 23d of August, from said governor, acknowledging the receipt of the note of the 11th from this department; and No. 5 is the report of the 25th August, by said governor, as before stated.

This report comprehends the chief points in the judicial process, showing that complainant's conduct had given good cause for their arrest; that plaintiffs had made no accusation, but asked for an ordinary judicial investigation; that the jailor who had confined them for one night had been removed, and that he and his associates would be tried for their offenses.

I also sent you a copy of the communication addressed to said governor yesterday, instructing him to report proceedings, as soon as the case was decided.

The government will see that satisfaction is made in the case, and the guilty punished.

Most respectfully, your very obedient servant,

S. LERDO DE TEJADA

Mr. EDWARD LEE PLUMB,
Chargé d'Affaires of the United States in Mexico.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, OFFICE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS—AMERICAN SECTION.

The Monterey newspaper entitled El Atalaya, states that six American citizens were arrested by the governor's order, and suffered ill treatment in the prison of that city; it says, however, that they were soon set at liberty, and that the mayor was having the case investigated.

In view of this the President of the republic orders you to report the facts, and if true, to have the guilty tried and punished by the proper judicial tribunal.

GOVERNMENT OF THE STATE OF NEW LEON.—NO. 10.

In obedience to orders from the President of the republic, in a note from your department, dated May 9, I state: That the foreigners referred to by the Atalaya of this city were arrested by the police and taken to jail for drunkenness and rioting, as shown by documents on file; that they complained to the judge of the State of ill treatment in jail; and that they were tried the day after their arrest.

This is all I can say positively; but all impartial judges think the facts greatly exaggerated in the newspaper, and the proprietors have been justly reprimanded for the publication of the article. No public officials took part in the outrages referred to.

I have transmitted the dispatch from your department to the proper judge, ordering a prompt investigation and subsequent report to supreme authorities.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, OFFICE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS—AMERICAN SECTION.

A dispatch was sent to you from this department, on the 9th of May last, ordering an investigation of the occurrences in your city on the night of the 21st April, relating to the treatment of certain American citizens, who were put in jail for riotous conduct. On the 22d of the same month you replied that the Atalaya of your city had published an exaggerated account of the affair; that no public official had taken part in the outrage; and that a trial had been ordered, and a report would be made of the proceedings.

We have been waiting for the result of the investigations, and, though three months have passed, no further report of the case has been made to this department.

For these reasons the President of the republic orders that you make a full report of the case, by the next mail, to this department, so that a proper understanding may be had by the supreme authorities, inasmuch as the government of the United States has made inquiry, and no answer can be given until your report is furnished.

GOVERNMENT OF NEW LEON.—NO. 26.

I have the honor to reply to the dispatch from your department of the 11th instant, asking information of the events of the 21st of April last, in this city, in reference to the alleged maltreatment of American citizens on that night. The account you ask for will be forwarded by next mail. Your communication has been transmitted to the chief justice of the State court.

GOVERNMENT OF NEW LEON.—NO. 27.

The chief justice of the supreme court of this State reports this day as follows:

"In order to expedite the business of procuring the information desired by the department of foreign relations, as expressed in the communication which you sent to me yesterday, I gave a verbal notice to the judge to order the case before him, on petition of the foreigners referred to in the communication, and have a legal investigation instituted as soon as possible, although all the witnesses might not be ready to give their testimony.

"The judge has obeyed the order, and the result was sent to the chief justice on the 30th day of April, for his confirmation."

The report of the case is as follows:

"In conformity to the order which I received yesterday from the citizen president of the supreme tribunal of justice of this State, to investigate the present condition of the cause instituted against the ex-Alcalde Juan N. Vara, and his accomplices, for maltreatment of certain strangers on the night of the 21st of April last, and on the morning of the next day; and in view of the communication of the 11th instant from the department of foreign relations, which was addressed to the governor of the State, and sent by him to this supreme tribunal, I proceed to give due fulfillment to that superior order.

"On the 22d of April of the present year the foreigners, Ernest F. Luckhardt and F. F. Potter, presented a petition to the judge of the first court of record in the first judicial district of this State, asking that prosecution be commenced against the prisoners, Adrian Alguin, Pedro Marroquin, and Lorenzo Chapa, and the Alcalde Juan N. Vara, for outrages received by the three former when they were taken to jail, and for the participation of the alcalde in the violence offered by those mentioned as having taken the complainants to jail on the night of the 21st of the month already specified, adding these words in the report: 'As to the person whom we consider as the primordial cause of all this, we reserve our rights to promote what is most convenient.'

"Soon afterwards the court opened the investigation of the case with corresponding zeal, receiving, with the greatest activity, all the depositions which he thought to be pertinent to the case, among them the depositions of the accusers and of the accused, and of other persons cognizant of the events. According to the evidence collected, it seems that on the night of the 21st of April the accusers and four other strangers, with a few Mexicans, who came in about eleven o'clock, entered the drinking-house called the Gran Sociedad, situated in Doctor Meir street, and having imbibed freely of intoxicating drinks, became drunk, and made much noise, when citizen Davila, (Narciso,) acting secretary to the governor, who lives in the state-house, sent for the chief of police to stop the disturbance. Thereupon a corporal and two police assistants came to the place, and finding the rioters had left the drinking-house and gone into the street fronting the place looking towards the east, called out halt! as is customary, and quien vive! who goes there! and the reply was, Mejico, as the police and other witnesses testify; and then the strangers uttered curses, when they were arrested and taken to jail by the police, after consulting with citizen Narciso Davila, who was in his room. The persons arrested were, however, first taken before the alcalde, who ordered them to jail, where they were taken by a proper mandamus.

"During that night, and on the morning of the following day, Alguin, Marroquin, and Chapa, who were appointed to preserve order in the jail, maltreated the prisoners by word and deed, and even struck two of the foreigners, giving as a reason for it that they had disobeyed orders and violated the regulations of the place, and because they refused to work at cleaning the premises, such as sweeping up the filth and carrying out the barrel in which it was put.

"For these acts it was declared that the alcalde and his accomplices, three in number, were liable to prosecution for these outrages to the foreigners, and the alcalde was removed from office, and the other men were put in jail; but the alcalde had to give security for his appearance, and the others were to be tried for taking the strangers to jail for disturbing the peace.

"The accused appealed from this judgment to the supreme court of the State; which judgment having been considered, was confirmed by said court.

"Having heard the confessions of the accused, time was given to the prosecutors to prepare their case. This was made on the 25th of June last, in the following terms:

"We have determined to take no part in this criminal prosecution, but hope the authorities will punish the guilty for their mistreatment of us, and this we are sure will be done by the just and impartial authorities to whom we trust the case."

"After making this declaration, the accusers reserve the right of taking testimony hereafter, if necessary, in case of further claims or complaints; for they say this suit only concerns the alcalde and his agents, who committed the outrages on the night of the 21st and the morning of the 22d of April last.

"After the 25th of June the trial came on, and progressed rapidly considering the number of witnesses to be examined, and the penalties to be inflicted upon the guilty; and the record in the case already amounts to 122 pages of writing.

"Some of the accused furnished counsel, and it was granted to the others by the court, each one having a separate lawyer, as the cases were different in criminality. All have made their defenses, and one of them occupied four days in producing his evidence. The accused are still in jail, and will not be released until their sentence is passed.

"Such is a summary of the conditions of the suits; but nothing positive can be said until the trials are concluded.

"In furnishing you the above information, I have the honor to be yours, &c.,
"MANUEL Z. GOMEZ."

And I have the honor to transmit it to you, in compliance with my promise to you on answering your dispatch of the 11th of the present month.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE.—OFFICE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS—AMERICAN SECTION.

In the report you made to this department, on the 25th of August last, of the case of certain American citizens who suffered maltreatment on the 21st of April last, you said the case would soon be decided and the guilty duly punished. As I have not yet heard of its termination, I again address you, by order of the President of the republic, to know what has been done in the case since the 25th of August last, requesting you to send a copy of the judgment as soon as pronounced. If the trial is not yet over, you will do all you can to expedite the process, and have it brought to a conclusion as soon as possible.

The GOVERNOR of the State of New Leon, at Monterey.

Mr. Plumb to Mr. Seward.

No. 232.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
City of Mexico, December 3, 1868.

- SIR: I had the honor on the 3d ultimo to receive your dispatch No. 105, of the 30th of September last, relating to the existence on the Mexican bank of the Rio Grande of a belt of country which is free from import duties on commerce, and inclosing a copy of a note addressed to you by the Secretary of the Treasury on that subject.

In compliance with the authorization contained in your dispatch to confer with the Mexican minister for foreign affairs upon this subject, I had interviews with Mr. Lerdo de Tejada on the 6th and 25th ultimo, at which the existing arrangement on the Rio Grande frontier was fully discussed; and at an interview on the 2d instant it was again referred to.

By the same mail which brought me your dispatch I received from the department a copy of the published diplomatic correspondence for 1867, in which (vol. ii, p. 412) is inserted the letter I addressed to you from New Orleans, on the 7th of June, 1867, upon the subject of this objectionable arrangement on the Mexican frontier, and especially as relates to the facility thus given to the port of Matamoras to become simply a port of free deposit for effects from Europe for the purpose of their illicit introduction across the narrow Rio Grande into the United States.

This communication, presenting fully the views I could now only reiterate verbally, I brought to the attention of Mr. Lerdo in our first interview, and I left with him the volume that he might, as he proposed, have the letter translated and laid before President Juarez.

I also communicated to him at that interview the substance of your dispatch, and of the note of the Secretary of the Treasury, with the communication thereto annexed.

Subsequently I thought it desirable to communicate to Mr. Lerdo, unofficially, a copy of your dispatch and its accompaniments, and did so on the 27th ultimo, with a note, of which a copy is inclosed herewith.

I also communicated to him, unofficially, in a note under date of the 28th ultimo, a printed slip containing the resolution relating to this free zone adopted by the House of Representatives of the United States on the 9th of June last.

A copy of my note and inclosure is herewith transmitted. I also transmit a copy and translation of Mr. Lerdo de Tejada's two notes in reply.

Since my arrival here in October of last year, I have, on frequent occasions, as the opportunity has offered, made reference, in my conversations with members of the government and with their public men generally, to the desirability and justice to commerce of having their national tariff, whatever it might be, made equally applicable over all parts of the republic, that the importer of foreign effects at one point or port might be placed on a just and fair equality with those at all others; and I have urged, so far as I properly could, the propriety, both in the interest of Mexico and from comity to the United States, of the termination of the arrangement now existing on the Rio Grande frontier.

I have, also, since the appointment on the 24th of January last of a commission to revise the tariff, sought such opportunities as I properly could to present these views to the members of that commission.

The ground, therefore, had been well prepared for a direct conference upon the subject with this government, and your instruction was most timely. In my interview with Mr. Lerdo on the 6th ultimo, I referred to the statement, published in the Diario Oficial of the day before, of the receipts at each of their different custom-houses, both maritime and frontier, by which it appears that the total receipts at all of the frontier custom-houses of the republic and at the port of Matamoras, for the first six months of the present year, amount only to less than $400,000, or at the rate of say $800,000 per annum.

Assuming the average rate of duties under the existing tariff to be fifty per cent., the above sum of duties would therefore represent a legitimate commerce of only about $1,600,000 per annum, while it is notorious that the commercial movement on that frontier and from Matamoras into the interior of the republic must be of vastly greater amount. A large contraband trade from the free zone into the interior of Mexico, to the detriment of the national revenues of the republic, appears, therefore, to be evident.

I also referred to the fact that the authorities of the State of Nuevo Leon, which is just without the free zone, have petitioned the general government for its abolition, representing its evil effects upon their commerce and the public revenue, as have also the ports of Tampico and Vera Cruz, whose importations are necessarily placed at great disadvantage by the evidently fraudulent introduction into the interior, by way of Matamoras and of the free zone, of merchandise there held free of duty.

Mr. Lerdo replied that he was aware of these representations that had been made, and was sensible of the disadvantages to their revenue, to which I had alluded; that the subject of this free zone was now under consideration by the government in connection with the reform of their tariff; and that while he had borne in mind the observations that on several previous occasions I had unofficially made to him upon this subject, full consideration would be given to what I had now, under the authorization of my government, brought to his attention.

That one difficulty that had weighed against terminating this system on the Rio Grande was the entire destruction that, it was urged, it would bring upon Matamoras, but that perhaps that effect might be avoided by the establishment of a system of bonded warehouses, such as maintained in the United States, and allowing merchandise to remain in the same for a certain time before the payment of duty.

I replied for the first point that I could hardly believe it probable that the result he apprehended with reference to Matamoras would be realized; that legitimate commerce must in the end be a benefit, rather than an injury, to any place, and there seemed to be a positive necessity, in justice to commerce at the other ports of the republic, to have a common tariff maintained equally applicable everywhere.

Mr. Lerdo made some reference to the feeling that might be raised on the immediate frontier against the government by the abolition of privileges that had been so long conceded.

On the 17th ultimo the report just made of the commission to revise the tariff, a translation of which I transmitted to the department with my dispatch No. 224 of the 20th ultimo, was published. In it the commission recommend the abolition of the free zone.

In my interview with Mr. Lerdo on the 25th I referred to this report, and I inquired whether the position thus taken by the commission would be sustained by the government.

Mr. Lerdo replied that the report had not yet been fully considered by the cabinet, and he could not say what the decision would be, but he thought the feeling in congress, and the tendency of public opinion generally, was inclining towards the suppression of the free zone.

So far as the subject had been discussed in the cabinet and between himself and the President, the inclination was such as to lead to the probability of final action in the matter, so far as it might depend upon the executive being in accord with the recommendation made by the commission. That if the tariff should be taken up exclusively by congress, he could not say what its action might be upon this point. Nor if the new tariff should be left, under some general authorization, to the executive to conclude, could he yet positively say that it would be determined to abolish the free zone entirely, or what means of meeting the conflicting interests involved would be finally adopted. There was a very strong opposition from Matamoras against any change, and the evening before a representative from there had had a conversation with him of over two hours, in which some arguments, which were new to him and which appeared to have weight, were urged in support of the existing system. They were more of a local character, however, and of detail, and could not fully weigh against the general principles and the international bearings of the question which I had laid before him.

I then went over the ground again of the various arguments in favor of the equal application of the tariff of the country to all parts of the republic alike; to the fallacy of the representations made by interested parties that contraband trade could be more easily prevented under the present arrangement than if the free zone was abolished, and to the grave inconveniences arising to the United States from the liberty now extended to the merchants in this free zone to land and hold merchandise there from Europe without the payment of any duty, and the facility thereby afforded of fraudulently introducing the same into the United States across the slight barrier of the Rio Grande.

I also urged, that as the conviction had been created in the United States, on the part of our public men generally, that this arrangement maintained by Mexico, while it was of no advantage to the republic at large, was one of serious detriment to the United States, it became a question of mutual concern on the part of the governments of the two countries to endeavor, if possible, to remove this cause of undesirable prejudice.

Mr. Lerdo, at the conclusion of our conversation upon this point, stated that the government would earnestly seek to find such solution of this matter as, while not altogether occasioning the evils apprehended by some from the entire suppression of the free zone, would yet meet the views I had expressed, and also satisfy the principle of uniformity in their new tariff. He was inclined now to think that this might be obtained by establishing, in Matamoras and at the other points of entry on the frontier, a system of bonded warehouses such as prevailed in the United States, and that thus the systems on the two sides of the frontier might be made identical. If authorization should be given, as he thought probable, to the executive to conclude the adjustment of the new tariff after the project shall have been submitted to congress, it would then be in the power of the executive to treat this subject in the final framing of the tariff regulations, and the desires of the executive would be as he had indicated.

In my interview with Mr. Lerdo on the 2d instant I inquired if any decision upon the subject had yet been arrived at by the cabinet which I could communicate to my government as final. He replied that there had not.

My impression is that, with the influence that has now been brought to bear, the suppression of the free zone of the Rio Grande, and the application there of the national tariff the same as in all other parts of the republic, may be effected, unless some political obstacle shall intervene, either in the adoption of the new tariff or at the session of congress, which takes place in April and May of the coming year.

The continuance much longer of the existing arrangement does not now appear to be probable.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
E. L. PLUMB.

MEXICO, November 27, 1868.

DEAR MR. LERDO: Although, as you will observe, I am not especially instructed to do so, there may be no impropriety, but, on the contrary, it may be of convenience to the Mexican government that I should give you a copy of the note addressed to me by the Secretary of State of the United States, and of the note inclosed therewith from the Secretary of the Treasury, upon the subject of the free zone on the Rio Grande frontier, regarding which I have had the pleasure to confer with you in our interviews of the 6th and 25th instant.

I have, therefore, the honor unofficially to inclose to you a copy of the said notes herewith.

I am, with the highest respect, your most obedient servant,

E. L. PLUMB.

MEXICO, November 27, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: I have received the copies which you have been pleased to send to me unofficially with your letter of to-day of the note addressed to you by the Hon. Secretary of State of the United States, and of the note annexed of the Hon. Secretary of the Treasury, upon the subject of the free zone on the Rio Grande frontier, with reference to which we conferred in our interviews of the 6th and 25th instant.

As I had the pleasure to state to you in those interviews, the government has been occupied, and will continue to give its attention to this matter with the serious consideration that it merits.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

S. LERDO DE TEJADA.

No. 33.—OFFICIAL GAZETTE OF THE STATE GOVERNMENT OF NEW LEON, MONTEREY,
NOVEMBER 18, 1868.

Sentence pronounced by the first chamber of the supreme court of justice of the State in the trial instituted on the petition of the American citizens, Ernest F. Luckhardt and F. F. Potter, for abuses committed in the prison of this city.

MONTEREY, November 11, 1868.

This cause being looked into, on the application of Ernest F. Luckhardt and F. F. Potter, the first married, aged twenty-five, merchant, residing in this city, and citizen of the neighboring northern republic; and the second, also citizen of this republic, with residence in New York, bachelor, merchant, twenty-four years of age, in consequence of their having been taken on the night of the 21st April last, in company with four other friends and countrymen, to the public prison, where they were all grossly insulted in language, especially the two complainants, who suffered in addition some blows, struck by various prisoners with a cowhide. In view of the declarations made by them and their companions in prison, Santiago P. Montgomery, Samuel B. Halhirens, Lewis P. Zappe, and Enrique Reis; those of the corporal and policemen who took them to the prison; that of the secretary of the government, Narcisso Davila; those of J. O. Margain, Augustin Valadez, Cayetano Arenal, and Alberto Fahremberg, who also were in company with these apprehended until the moment when they were led to prison; that of the Alcalde Juan N. Vara, and of the arrested Adrian Olguin, Pedro Marroquin, and Lorenzo Chapa, together with the other declarations made by the witnesses examined in this brief, and afterwards in detail, at the request of the defendant, Alcalde Vara, and the prisoner, Lorenzo Chapa; having examined the finding of well-taken pronounced on the other hand against the alcalde, against Adrian Olguin, Marroquin, and Chapa, the confessions and allegations taken against them in writing, the desistance which complainants afterwards made, beginning at page 89, in what relates to these offenders, reserving their right to seek testimony relating to the matter, and to direct their action against the secretary of the government, who ordered the police to conduct them to prison, hoping, however, that justice would be done in applying to the first such punishment as may be in accordance with law; having considered the papers presented by the defenders of the accused, the sentence pronounced in first instance, the appeal interposed, the supplementary petition of the fiscal, and what has been since alleged in writing of the utterance of irritating language and expressions in the public streets; and finally, in view of the whole matter which has been passed upon; and considering—

1. That the matter brought before the alcalde only included Juan Vara and the parties arrested, Olguin, Marroquin, and Chapa, to whom alone in consequence the sentence in first instance ought to apply and could apply.

2. That the charge is well proven which is made against the alcalde as to his authorization of the use of the cowhide delivered by him to those prisoners, whom he distinguished with the names of president and aids, that they might use it inside the prison for the purpose of keeping order and making themselves respected, without it serving as an excuse for him that he found this practice in use when it was received from the alcaide, because as explicit as is the 21st article of our constitution which prohibits it, he ought, if the use of the cowhide was not abstained from, to have at least consulted with the chief alcaide, and have given notice of the usage to the ministers who weekly make and have made visits to the prison, which it does not appear that he has done, thereby incurring voluntarily the responsibility for its continuance, and even anticipating and authorizing that reprehended usage.

3. That it is also proven and admitted that on the night of the 21st April last the visits provided for in article 11 of the regulations were not made, nor on the morning of the following day early report attended to, as it should have been according to article 92, which duty if it had been attended to might probably have averted the maltreatment which Potter and Leinhardt subsequently received, because it is probable that complaint would have been made by themselves of what had previously happened to them.

4. That from the declaration of the captives, it appeared without contradiction that it was the general custom to set the prisoners brought in during the night to the cleansing of the prison, which they constantly did, and, as appears, always had done, it following from this that indirectly those were destined to these labors, although merely under detention, which should not be so, as it is well known that there is set aside for these parties a locality distinct from that allotted to captives, under punishment and sentenced, and although from want of room these persons were placed within the gratings in the hall of the prison, according to the regulation, the alcaide should never have permitted that they should have been compelled to discharge police duties and the cleansing of dungeons and privies.

5. But supposing the general practice of putting to this cleaning work those who should be brought in during the night, and that the direction which the alcaide had made to Nelquin for those detained on the night of the 21st, neither to him or his companions, Marroquin and Chapa, can be laid the charge of having destined Leinhardt and Potter to take out from a dungeon to the pit the barrels of filth, and to Marroquin having closed the pit against them, as well as Kahlrens and Zappa, because they were not under obligation to observe spontaneous considerations which in truth could not be looked for or expected from persons of their condition.

6. That in the same manner, also, the president Olquin did well in rebuking Leinhardt because in the night he passed his urine into the vessel which contained the water made use of in the prison, even though it might be supposed that he was ignorant of that circumstance and supposed the vessel was intended for a very different purpose and proper for the use which he made of it.

7. That assuming the delivery of the cowhide to the president and assistant named by the alcaide to prevent disorders, it is neither just nor lawful to make these prisoners liable for the use they may have made of it, because they were merely executives, and in their sphere were not in situation to remark upon or oppose the mandate of their superior, and the more when this mandate was only in respect of chastisement which although odious and repugnant perhaps was considered as very convenient and useful to preserve order without endangering the life of any person soever.

8. That notwithstanding this, it is observed in this case, and it is proved by what is said by the detained, and even may be inferred from the declarations of the offenders, that there was excess in the use of the cowhide, and chiefly on the part of Marroquin and Chapa, with the tolerance of President Alguin, who, however, has not established the disobedience of Leinhardt when he gave him a cowhide, it being notable that he would occupy himself steadily molesting Potter and Leinhardt in preference to other detained parties, and even other prisoners, and subjects for correction, which also leads us to understand the prejudice which he entertained against them, and the injurious language he uttered against them.

9. That for such excess they should be chastised with proportionate penalties, regulated by the opinion of the writers noting the laws, especially that of July 21, 1833, which speaks of light offenses and authorizes the practice, according to which offenses of this nature have never been punished in the manner which was determined on in the sentence of the 1st instance, and less if the class of persons was considered on whom were inflicted the injuries and blows, the motives and other very different circumstances; in fact, all and of distinct character which intervened in injuries of speech and of action which take place between individuals.

10. In regard to what relates to the shortcomings of the alcaide, the penalty should be applied which is established by law 10th, and the end of the 6th title, 38 book 12th, of the new compilation, because in effect that functionary is responsible, although indirectly, for the maltreatment which the detained Leinhardt and Potter received, taking in estimation his assured authorization of the use of the cowhide, for failure in visiting the prison on that night, and for not having provided against the assignment of those detained, to any service.

11. That the contestants having withdrawn any application as to what relates to the alcaide and prisoners, judicial costs cannot and ought not to be taken into account as against them which have not been demanded from them by the magistrate of the first hall. Passing judgment definitively, I say that the sentence passed ought to be reviewed and corrected, declaring, as it is declared—

1. That for a year and a half, reckoned from the 21st of May of this year, when in this cause the order for imprisonment was made, the alcalde, Juan Vara, in rebuke for the errors and omissions he has fallen into, is prohibited from acting in this service in any of the prisons of the State.

2. That the captives Adrian Olguin, Pedro Marroquin, and Lorenzo Chapa, must suffer for the maltreatment they gave to the arrested, Leinhardt and Potter, a penalty of forty days at the public works, reckoned from the next to the conclusion of the sentence which passed upon them for the offenses in respect to which they are now on trial.

3. That whenever the testimony in this cause, or of part of the attending circumstances, is sought for by the complainants, or by other parties interested, it shall be furnished in the manner, and on the terms, and for the uses permitted by law.

4. That it be made known to the alcalde of the prison, that he must, in all cases, provide for placing parties under arrest in a place apart without employing them in another place, and if that cannot be completely done in all cases, they must not be employed in the police duty of cleansing the prison and its courtyard. Let this be noted, and of those who neglect the matter let account be made.

This I determine, order, and sign, and bear witness of as citizen magistrate.

MANUEL Z. GÓMEZ.

LUCIAN ESPINOSA, Secretary.

SENTENCE.

To-day we publish, in the appropriate part, the sentence pronounced in the first chamber of the supreme court of justice of the State, in the cause drawn up against the parties who committed, in the prison of this city, various abuses of which some foreigners were victims; abuses which the Atalaya denounced, although with noticeable exaggeration, and about which the supreme government of the republic sought information.

MEXICAN LEGATION.

Señor Romero to Mr. Hunter.

[Translation.]

WASHINGTON, June 16, 1868.

Mr. Romero presents his respects to Mr. William Hunter, and has the honor to remit to him copy of a telegram sent yesterday by the consul of the Mexican republic at New Orleans to the Mexican consul at New York, respecting an expedition which is said to be in preparation at that port to land in Mexico.

Mr. Romero begs that Mr. Hunter will please do what is needful, in case such expedition is really contemplated, to prevent it from taking place.

NEW ORLEANS, June 15, 1868.

To T. N. NAVARRO, Mexican Consul:

An expedition against Mexico is fitted out here. Ship Island is the place of reunion. Matamoras the place to land at. I have informed General Buchanan.

RAMON S. DIAZ,

Mexican Consul.

Mr. Hunter to Señor Romero.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 16, 1868.

Mr. Hunter presents his respects to Mr. Romero, and acknowledges the receipt of his note of this date, relative to a supposed hostile expedition against Mexico in preparation at New Orleans. In reply Mr. Hunter has the honor to inform Mr. Romero that the subject shall at once be brought to the notice of the proper authorities.

Señor Romero to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF MEXICO IN THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, June 27, 1868.

MR. SECRETARY: In calling your attention to a note which I addressed to Mr. Hunter on the 16th instant, I have the honor to transmit to you the copy of a communication from the consul of Mexico in New York, dated the 15th instant, in which he sends me the copy of a dispatch from the consul of Mexico in New Orleans, with an annex, dated the 16th, relating to the projected expedition organizing in that city for the purpose of invading Matamoras, by common report.

I take the occasion to repeat the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

M. ROMERO.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

CONSULATE OF THE MEXICAN REPUBLIC IN NEW ORLEANS,
New Orleans, June 16, 1868.

I sent you a telegram yesterday informing you that a filibuster expedition is forming here to invade Mexico, by way of Matamoras. I inclose a copy of the note I sent to General Buchanan on the subject.

Recruiting is going on publicly, and I can now designate three places where the names of the enlisted are enrolled, viz: the Spanish tavern called the Las Buñaladas, on St. Philippe street, between Old Levee and Chartres, the coffee-house on the corner of Bienville; and Dauphin in front of a boarding-house, No. 126 Toulouse street, where a person who calls himself colonel is lodging, and who was among the late invaders of the republic, and is now recruiting. This individual was wounded in the left hand at half-past three to-day, by one of the adventurers of the expedition, in a row that occurred between them. The imperialist, Perez Gomez, was residing in the house in Toulouse street till very lately, and it is now occupied by a Mexican named Aguilar, who also figured in the famous empire.

The expedition is forming here, and in small boats, traversing creeks and lagoons; they go to Ship Island in squads, whence, I am assured, the expedition will sail for Matamoras.

Santa Anna's emissaries arrived here last night from Havana, in the American steamer Star of the Union, and they furnish means for the expedition. * * *

I will keep you informed of daily occurrences. Accept the protests of my appreciation. Independence, liberty, and reform!

CONSULADO DE LA REPUBLICA MEJICANA EN NUEVO ORLEANS,
New Orleans, June 15, 1868.

GENERAL: I have this morning learned that a military expedition is being fitted out in this city for the purpose of invading the republic of Mexico. The landing is to be made at Matamoras.

According to my information the men composing said expedition are to embark at an island called Navio, (Ship Island,) near Lake Pontchartrain, where there are already about three hundred men and two schooners. The expedition is to be composed of twelve hundred men.

I hope, general, that you will be pleased to adopt the proper measures in order that the neutrality laws may not be violated.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to the outrages perpetrated recently on the persons of respectable American merchants in the city of Monterey, and to request your influence for the speedy adjustment of this unfortunate affair, which at present is attracting so much attention in this country.

I avail myself of this occasion to offer to you a renewed assurance of my high consideration.

MEXICAN LEGATION IN THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, June 29, 1868.

Mr. SECRETARY: I have the honor to acknowledge the reception of the note which you were pleased to address to me to-day, calling my attention to the outrages said to have been committed recently upon the persons of respectable American merchants residing in Monterey, and requesting me to endeavor to effect a prompt settlement of the unpleasant affair.

In reply, I have the honor to inform you that a statement of the affair was published in a newspaper while I was in Mexico.

Disapprobation of the event was officially expressed by the government of the republic as soon as the occurrence became publicly known, and a proper investigation was ordered to ascertain the truth, and in view of it to take the steps it might be deemed just and opportune.

It is true that shortly before I left the city of Mexico the government of the republic received the information necessary to enable it to form a judgment of the painful incident, with full cognizance of the cause; and when all the particulars have come to hand, it will proceed to fix the responsibility, in accordance with the laws of the republic, upon the persons found guilty, and to satisfy those who may have been injured in consequence of those events in the manner it may believe to be most equitable.

I cannot let this occasion pass without informing you that the government of Mexico, which justly appreciates the friendship and good intelligence of the United States, not only never will authorize any act that may be considered unfriendly towards the government of this country, or to its citizens, but whenever an unlucky occurrence, to its regret, damages citizens of the United States, it will hasten, as it has done in the present case, to investigate the facts, in order to do full justice to those who may be wrongfully injured.

I am pleased to have this occasion to renew to you, Mr. Secretary, the assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

[Memorandum.—Translation.]

The iron steamer Mosquito was built in London to serve as a tug for sailing vessels entering the port of Tampico. Soon after reaching that port it was used as a war vessel by partisans of French intervention in Mexico. This over, it was taken to Havana and delivered to the Spanish authorities of the Island of Cuba.

It is said that those authorities are disposed to give it up to the government of Mexico, if they are paid the costs of keeping it. The government of Mexico would like to be certain of the disposition of the authorities of Cuba in this particular, and would like to know what sum they expect before the vessel will be given up.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, July 1, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to send herewith a copy of a telegram of June 29, received yesterday from General Buchanan, commanding the 5th military district, relative to the arrest of certain suspicious characters who were on the reservation at Fort Livingston, Louisiana.

TELEGRAPH OFFICE, WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, D. C., June 29, 1868.

[By telegraph from New Orleans, June 29, 1868.]

I sent a company to Fort Livingston on Thursday, 25th, to arrest a number of men reported by the ordnance sergeant at that post as being on the reservation under suspicious circumstances, and who refused to leave when ordered by him. The company returned this morning bringing seventy-four prisoners, and a sloop with ten days' rations on board. The party, with the exception of two who appear to be the leaders, are all foreigners. The principal man is Hilliary Ceuds, an ex-confederate, and formerly of our navy. I have sent all hands to the military prison, and have the sloop astern of our quartermaster's steamer. The civil authorities of the United States would not commit the parties until they could get further instructions. Have you any instructions for me? I answered your communication by mail on Saturday.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, July 2, 1868.

SIR. In connection with my letter of yesterday's date, inclosing copy of a telegram received from Brevet Major General Buchanan, commanding the 5th military district, reporting the arrest of a party of suspicious persons at Fort Livingston, I have the honor to send herewith a copy of a communication received from the same officer, marked "confidential," and dated June 27, 1868, relative to an alleged Mexican expedition.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. M. SCHOFIELD,
Secretary of War.

Hon. SECRETARY OF STATE.

General Buchanan to General Schofield.

[Confidential.]

HEADQUARTERS FIFTH MILITARY DISTRICT,
New Orleans, Louisiana, June 27, 1868.

GENERAL: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 22d instant, marked "confidential," relating to Mexican expedition.

In reply I beg leave to state, that the matter referred to had already been brought to my notice in a communication dated June 15, 1868, received from the Mexican consul, Señor Ramon S. Diaz, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, marked A.

Immediately upon the receipt of this communication I dispatched a staff officer to Ship Island to communicate on the subject with the commanding officer of that post, Brevet Major General Mower, and to give him instructions to prevent the departure of any illegal expedition from that point. No information could be obtained of the intention of any such expedition to start from Ship Island,

From the information received, I am satisfied that Cat Island, not Ship Island, was the intended point of departure, as two suspicious looking schooners were lying abreast of it. It was suspected that they were intended for transportation.

On his return my staff officer reported to me that the revenue cutter Wilderness was cruising off Cat Island, and that he had an interview with the officer commanding that vessel, who promised to do all he could to prevent any expedition from starting, and would cruise there for a week.

A copy of the communication from the Mexican consul was sent to the senior naval officer at this station, upon the day of its receipt, with the request that he would co-operate to the extent of his power in the prevention of the expedition, to which he replied that "there was no available force at his command capable of giving assistance in the suppression of this expedition."

Two days after this the Mexican consul again reported to me that another expedition was about leaving from the city of New Orleans. I then suggested to him the propriety of laying the whole matter before the United States district attorney, Mr. Torrey, which he did. The result of this was the arrest of some forty or fifty men by the civil authorities, who were discharged next morning for want of evidence to justify their detention.

On the 24th instant, I received a letter from the ordnance sergeant at Fort Livingston, informing me that there were some sixty or seventy persons there whom he had ordered to leave, but who entirely disregarded his orders, and refused to obey them.

I immediately dispatched a company of the first infantry on a steamer to that point, with orders to arrest the whole party and bring them to this city, at the same time informing the United States district attorney of my action, and requesting him to send a civil officer with the expedition, which he did.

The party has not yet returned, but as soon as it comes a report of the expedition will be transmitted.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ROBERT C. BUCHANAN,
Brevet Major General, United States Army, Commanding.

Major General JOHN M. SCHOFIELD,
Secretary of War, Washington City, D. C.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 7, 1868.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your communication of the 5th instant, respecting alleged hostile expeditions supposed to be fitting out within the jurisdiction of the United States, with the object of violating the territory of a friendly power, and herewith inclose a copy of the instructions which I have issued to the district attorney and marshal at New Orleans, in the premises. The papers which accompanied your letter are herewith returned, as requested.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

O. H. BROWNING,
Attorney General ad interim.

Mr. Browning to Mr. Torrey.

ATTORNEY GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, July 7, 1868.

SIR: From reports officially made by the military authorities within your judicial district, to the Secretary of War, which have been communicated to me through the Department of State, it appears that well-grounded suspicions exist of hostile expeditions being prepared in disregard of the neutrality laws of the United States, with the object of violating the territory of the republic of Mexico.

I have to direct you to be vigilant and prompt in causing the apprehension and due prosecution of all persons against whom there is reasonable evidence in the premises.

A duplicate of this communication is addressed to the marshal under this date.

Very respectfully yours,

O. H. BROWNING
Attorney General ad interim.

MEXICAN LEGATION IN THE UNITED STATES,
Washington, July 10, 1868.

MR. SECRETARY: I have this day had the honor to receive your communication of yesterday, containing copies of the correspondence between your department, the Attorney General of the United States, and the Secretary of War, relative to the violation of the United States neutrality laws, which was contemplated by persons in the vicinity of New Orleans against the Mexican republic.

In reply I have the honor to inform you that I send the note and annexed documents to-day to the government of Mexico. I avail myself of the occasion to renew to you, Mr. Secretary, the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

M. ROMERO.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Señor Diaz to Mr. Seward.

MEXICAN CONSULATE,
New Orleans, July 23, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge due receipt of your communication of the 3d instant, which would have been sooner answered but for the fact that I was awaiting a fuller development of the schemes and combinations now on foot to foment anew a fratricidal strife in Mexico.

You have no doubt been already informed that through the zealous and active co-operation of the civil and military authorities of this city, two detachments of the expeditionary forces have been captured in this State, to wit: one on the 22d of June ultimo, in this city, and the other at Grande Terre, near Fort Livingston, on the 26th of the same month. The leaders of these illegal organizations were arrested and examined before Governor Weller, United States commissioner, and held to answer before the United States district court in November next. The testimony adduced at this examination, together with the voluntary declarations of several of the prisoners, left no doubt either of the object or illegality of the expedition.

The agents of General Santa Anna in this city, notwithstanding these arrests, continue their enlistments of adventurers, with the view of overthrowing the existing government, and of proclaiming young Iturbide Imperial Prince, and Santa Anna Regent of the empire during the minority of Iturbide.

These enlistments are now taking place on Common street, No. 104, in this city, where there is an agency for the contract of laborers on a railroad in Houston, Texas. The men are forwarded to Galveston, whence they are to embark for the coast of Florida, and land at a point in proximity to Key West, which is the general rendezvous, and at which place they are to receive their ammunition, arms, uniforms, transports, &c., from Havana.

In pursuance of this plan, a body of men, estimated at over two hundred, left the city this morning, via Opelousas railroad, for Texas. Many of the men have been identified as forming part of the expeditions above referred to, which were captured and broken up in this city in June last.

In view of the friendly offices and interest ever manifested by the government of the United States towards her sister republic, and for the purpose of more effectually and speedily crushing out and discountenancing the machinations of wicked and scheming adventurers in our midst, who, by means of specious pretexts and promises, are seducing and entrapping many ignorant and unsuspecting dupes into their illegal combinations, I respectfully commend to the President's attention the fact whether the time has not now arrived when a proclamation issued by his excellency upon that subject would not tend in a great measure to put a stop to all filibustering expeditions against Mexico.

In conclusion, permit me to tender you, on behalf of the Mexican government, its warmest and sincere thanks for your interposition in defending the integrity of the Mexican territory, and maintaining intact the neutrality laws. The instructions which, with characteristic promptness, were issued from your department to the United States authorities in this city, I am happy to acknowledge, were carried out with alacrity and cordiality, and all necessary assistance required by myself has been at all times and on all occasions by them zealously furnished. I am indebted for many obligations to General R. C. Buchanan, the United States marshal, the collector of the customs, and particularly to Samuel H. Torrey, esq., the United States district attorney, who contributed very actively with me in making all needful arrests.

With many assurances of my profound consideration, I have the honor, sir, to be your obedient servant,

RAMON S. DIAZ,
Consul of Mexico at New Orleans, La.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

NICARAGUA.

Mr. Dickinson to Mr. Seward.

No. 143.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Leon, Nicaragua, December 4, 1867.

SIR: On the 14th of November last a new volcano broke out in Nicaragua, about eight leagues to the east of the city of Leon, on a crowded line of volcanoes running through the State, parallel with the Pacific coast.

It commenced about 1 o'clock in the morning with a succession of explosions, which were very distinctly felt and heard at Leon. These explosions opened a fissure through the earth's crust about half a mile in length, running from the old fissure in a southwest direction, about midway between the extinct volcanoes of Las Pilas and Orota, which are two of the numerous cones studding the ancient fissure.

Before daylight on the morning of the 14th fire was seen issuing from the new volcano in various places. The explosions continued irregularly during the whole time that the volcano was in a state of eruption. Sometimes in rapid succession, and other times at intervals of half an hour. Low, rumbling sounds were heard almost incessantly. In the course of a few days two craters were opened on the new fissure, about a thousand feet apart, the one at the southwestern extremity discharging perpendicularly, and the other shooting out towards the northeast at an angle of forty-five degrees. The flames from these two craters steadily increased in size and height, while jets of flame and slighter discharges were emitted from two or three other side fissures.

On the morning of November 22d I went out to the new volcano for the purpose of observing it more closely, though I had seen and heard it very plainly each day and night from Leon. The best view which I obtained of it on that occasion was before daylight, from a mountain summit, about one mile to the northwest of the fissure, and at right angles with it. The main crater at the right was actively at work, throwing out flames and half melted cinders, through a circular orifice about sixty feet in diameter, which was constantly filled to its utmost capacity with the ascending masses. A regular cone, built up entirely by the falling cinders, to the height of about two hundred feet, had already formed around the crater. The rim of the cone was white with heat, and the outside was red hot for half way down, while the remainder of its black ground-work was glittering with innumerable glowing sparks. It was puffing quite regularly about once a second, with a strong constant blast, which kept up a column of flames filled with flying cinders, to the height of about five hundred feet above the mouth of the orifice. Irregular explosions occurred at intervals varying from ten to thirty minutes, increasing the force and volume of the discharges, and sending them far up into the rolling clouds above. The cinders went up in half-fused, blazing masses, from one to three feet in diameter, and came down upon the cone, hardened, striking with a clinking, metallic sound. After daylight the red appearance of the cone changed to a bluish black. The left-hand crater was shooting out oblique discharges of flame and cinders of a similar character, at an angle of forty-five degrees from the other, and evidently communicated with it about a thousand feet below the surface, the two craters being that distance apart, and both discharging simultaneously. This half horizontal crater was about twenty feet in diameter.

The afternoon of the 27th, after a series of explosions which seemed to shake the earth to its center, the volcano commenced discharging vast quantities of black sand and heavier rocks. The column of flame at night was considerably increased in height, and bright, meteor-like spots were seen ascending in the flames, to the height of not less than three thousand feet. These were large, spherical stones, four and five feet in diameter. The next morning the streets and house-tops of Leon were covered with fine black sand from the volcano, and a vast luminous cloud of raining sand overspread the whole surrounding country. This rain of sand continued until the morning of the 30th, when the volcano died away, apparently smothered by its accumulated eruptions. The sand now covers the whole surrounding country, from the volcano to the Pacific, a distance of more than fifty miles from it. At Leon it is from an eighth to a quarter of an inch in depth. As we approach the volcano, it gradually grows deeper and coarser. For a mile around the crater, it lies in particles from three-eighths to half an inch in diameter, and about a foot in depth. Still nearer to the cone, the sand increases to several feet in depth, and the particles gradually increase in size until they become small, broken rocks. Around the base of the cone, round, heavy rocks lie thickly scattered, from four to five feet in diameter; but much the larger portion of them have broken into fragments. The cone itself is two hundred feet high, with a crater in the top two hundred feet in diameter, and about the same in depth. The inside of the crater, the same as the outside, is covered with hard, broken rocks, generally less than a foot in diameter. A long ridge of black scoria leads out from the branch crater, in a northeasterly direction. The slaggy, lava-like scoria which first issued from the main crater, is now principally covered up by the hard plutonic rocks, which came out from profounder depths with the last discharges. The forest for leagues around is scarred and maimed by the sharp cutting storms of sand, and near the volcano the trees lie cut into numerous fragments, half buried under the sand and rocks.

The volcano was an active and interesting sight for sixteen days, and now, in its repose, affords an ample and instructive field for the geologist. Indeed, no country in the world presents a more interesting study than the plain of Leon. Twenty volcanic cones are seen rising from it at a single view. Its soil is inexhaustible in fertility, as finely pulverized and as evenly distributed as that of the valley of the Nile or the Mississippi; not, however, by water, but by fire! It has literally rained down from the volcanoes, richly freighted with fertilizing material.

Humboldt regretted before his death that men of science had not more fully investigated this remarkable region of country, and it is sincerely to be hoped that it may not much longer remain neglected by them.

The recent fall of sand has been followed by a shower of rain; and though but a few days have since elapsed, corn, cotton, and grass have grown more rapidly under its fertilizing influence, than I have ever seen plants grow before. Some weeds and plants it kills, others it starts forth with renewed life and vigor.

I send, herewith, a specimen of the sand gathered at Leon, before the rain, hoping that it may be analyzed.

It may be proper in this connection to call attention to the recent destructive storms, earthquakes, and eruptions, which occurred on and around the Island of St. Thomas during the same period of time which I have been describing, and which undoubtedly sprung from the same general cause, as those earthquakes were distinctly felt at Leon.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. B. DICKINSON.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

SIR: * * * * *

I transmit herewith a copy of my note to the minister for foreign affairs of this government, announcing the action taken by the United States government in regard to the questions in debate between Nicaragua and Great Britain relative to the Mosquito territory, as set forth in your despatch, No. 98, and a translation of the answer thereto.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Leon, December 17, 1867.

SIR: I have the pleasure to transmit to you herewith a copy of a dispatch which I have received from the Secretary for foreign affairs of the United States, stating the position assumed and the action taken by the government of the United States in reference to the questions pending between the governments of Nicaragua and Great Britain relative to the Mosquito territory.

Trusting that the prompt and friendly measures taken by my government in this important matter may effectually aid in maintaining the sovereignty of Nicaragua unimpaired in the territory of the Mosquito Reserve, I have the honor to be, with high consideration, your excellency's obedient servant,

A. B. DICKINSON.

His Excellency Señor DON TOMAS AYON,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, &c., &c., Managua.

Señor Ayon to Mr. Dickinson.

MANAGUA, December 21, 1867.

SIR: With your official note, dated 17th instant, I have had the pleasure of receiving the copy of that of the 23d of November anterior, from his excellency the Secretary of State of the United States, referring to the question pending between the governments of Nicaragua and Great Britain in regard to the territory of the Mosquito coast.

It is very gratifying for this government to obtain from the illustrious government of the United States the just qualification of the right with which Nicaragua maintains that question, and anticipates its probable termination through the good and pacific offices of the cabinet of Washington and the rectitude of that of Great Britain. Be so good as to express to the minister of state the gratitude of my government.

In relation to the new bases proposed by the transit company, I should say to your excellency that even without the mediation of the offices of the government of the Union in the question of the Mosquito territory, the government of Nicaragua is disposed to agree to those concessions which are compatible with the well-known interests of Nicaragua, as I have had the honor of repeatedly manifesting to your excellency, and also to the agents of the company.

I reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my high consideration.

TOMAS AYON.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your very interesting dispatch, No. 143, of 4th December, 1867, relative to a volcano which broke out in November last near the city of Leon. I have caused a copy thereof and the specimen of sand to be transmitted with a letter to Professor Joseph Henry, Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution.

In acknowledging their receipt, he says, "that he has addressed a letter to you making further inquiries in regard to certain points, and shall publish the whole with such comments as may occur to ourselves in the next report of the Institution. The sand we shall have examined immediately. The direction in which it fell is an interesting fact in regard to the path of the upper current of air in the intertropical regions."

Copies of your dispatch have also been furnished to the press.

SIR: Your dispatch, No. 144, of December 23, 1867, inclosing a copy of your note to the minister of foreign affairs of Nicaragua, and a translation of his reply, in regard to the questions in dispute between that country and Great Britain, growing out of the Mosquito territory, has been received.

I have caused copies of the aforementioned correspondence to be transmitted to Charles Francis Adams, esq., United States minister at London.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Leon, Nicaragua, July 7, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatches, Nos. 108 to 110, have been received.

The three copies of the book entitled "Tributes of the Nations to Abraham Lincoln," have also been received.

That which was directed to the government of Nicaragua I presented to the President in person, explaining the character of the book and the object of its presentation. The President, who was personally known to Abraham Lincoln, was visibly affected by the reminiscences which the interview called forth, and expressed in feeling terms his grateful appreciation of so valuable a book, containing as it did the affectionate sentiments of the whole civilized world in regard to the greatest and best of men. He desired also that his kindest sentiments and congratulations might be conveyed to the honored Secretary of State and the Assistant Secretary, who so miraculously survived the attempted assassination.

Of the other two copies, I have presented one to Señor Basilis Salivas, who held the position of minister of foreign affairs at the time of the death of President Lincoln, and the other I have retained for myself.

I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,

A. B. DICKINSON.

nately keep up the misunderstanding between them and that nation, and the disinterested wishes always indicated by your excellency's government to witness the termination of a state of things as prejudicial to neutrals as to the belligerents themselves, who are bound together by equal ties and antecedents, cause the minister plenipotentiary of Nicaragua and Honduras to believe that neither your excellency nor your government will regard it as officiously inopportune that the undersigned has the honor of making known to you that in virtue of orders from the governments which he represents in Washington, he addressed himself on the 4th instant to the representatives of Peru, Spain, and Chili, offering the good offices of the states belonging to Central America to co-operate, either in the acceptance by the belligerents of the mediation offered in the year last past by the United States to put an end to the contest, or for bringing about by some other measures an agreement to open negotiations for peace, or to settle on some basis, or agree on somewhat which may ulteriorly serve to treat upon.

As was to be hoped from indications confidentially interchanged with the ministers of Spain and Peru, with whom, before coming to this country, the undersigned had the honor of personal acquaintance, the offer of the good offices of Honduras and Nicaragua was welcomed by them and by the worthy representative of Chili with expressive demonstrations of appreciation and satisfaction, and was transmitted to Madrid, to Lima, and to Santiago.

In having the satisfaction of making known to you what is here stated, the writer has the honor to offer to you the sentiments of consideration with which he remains,

Your most obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 20, 1868.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of the 16th, stating that on the 4th instant you had addressed a note to the representatives of Peru, Spain, and Chili, offering the good offices of the Central American states towards co-operating either in the acceptance by the belligerents of the mediation which has been offered by the United States for the purpose of putting an end to the contest, or for bringing about by some other means an agreement to open negotiations for peace.

Your well-intentioned proceeding in this matter is approved by the President, who hopes it may contribute to the result which is earnestly desired by the government.

I avail myself of this occasion to offer to you a renewed assurance of my high consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, October 14, 1867.

SIR: Your dispatches, from No. 64 to No. 71, inclusive, were all received by me yesterday. They were brought by a French gunboat which has come up to Curupaity from Buenos Ayres for the purpose of bringing up the new consul and taking away Mr. Laurent Cochelet, who for the last four years has been the French consul here, and who some eight months ago was named as consul to Richmond, Virginia, but has been unable to leave until now, as the person named as his successor seems to have been disinclined to enter Paraguay, lest he should get into a trap from which it would not be easy to extricate himself. This delay has caused the tardy successor to be retired by his government and another man has been sent to relieve M. Cochelet, whose situation here for the last two years has been as disagreeable as it is easy to conceive. He will leave here to-morrow, and I will take the opportunity to send through my dispatches by him.

The situation in a military point of view is, so far as I can learn, about the same as at the date of my last dispatch. There has been some fighting since then, but no decided advantage seems to have been gained by either party. It is very hard to get any accurate information here as to the true state of the Paraguay army, as every skirmish is represented as a great victory. The Paraguayan army seems to be nearly surrounded, but yet not entirely so, for the telegraph from this place to Humaita is most of the time in working order, and the steamers continue to run to near Humaita. There is a space of some five miles from the advanced lines of the allies to the river that is still open, though it is said that the Paraguayans find it very difficult to pass any cattle through that way.

The allies have once occupied Pilar, a town some seven leagues above Humaita, and there have been reports that skirmishing parties have been seen at a considerable distance this side of there. As any town or district seems to be threatened the inhabitants are required to move away to the north. As no people are left but women and children it is a great hardship, but in this war hardships to the people are not counted. It is believed here that the inhabitants have been compelled to leave the country for a long distance above Pilar, and it has been reported that Villa Franca, which is about half-way between this place and Humaita, has also been evacuated. If this be so, then it is pretty certain that the allied troops are moving up by land at some distance from the river, and there is great fear among the people here that they will be compelled to evacuate this place. In fact it is evident that the government is preparing for such an emergency. The nearest relations of the President have already left for the interior and taken away their most valuable movable property, and other families which it is supposed are highest in favor are constantly moving out of town. Others are in great dread that an order will be issued for everybody else to leave the town; so that the enemy, if they come here, will find neither people nor food. Some even fear that the town may be razed, but that is preposterous, as the best part of it is owned by the Lopez family, who have been building some and buying largely within the last year. It is also whispered here (reports are not permitted) that the government archives and the government property in the custom-house have all been sent into the interior. The departure of so many families cannot escape notice, and the reason given for it is that they have left from the fear of the cholera. But as nobody seems to have any fear of the cholera, it is believed that the favored families are advised to do in time, and at their convenience, what the multitude will be ordered to do in a hurry. Naturally there is great alarm and anxiety here among both natives and foreigners, and I am often asked what I shall do in case the threatened evils come upon them. I tell them all that I shall stay at my post until I am ordered to leave it by my government. If the enemy come and bombard the town they can bombard my house, but I shall keep my flag flying and shall not leave it; and if they or anybody else shall blow up the town they can blow me up with it, for I shall not leave my post except I am carried away a prisoner and by force. This determination seems to have given great confidence to people who think many evils may be averted by my remaining here. A good many, mostly foreigners, have brought their money and other valuables to my house for safe-keeping, as I tell all that whatever protection my house and flag can give to my own property will be given to theirs, but that I take no responsibility and give no receipts; so that if the town is sacked, and my house with others, neither I nor my government will be in any way liable for the damage done or the property taken.

Should the evacuation of the town be ordered—and I believe it will be if the war lasts much longer—it is uncertain whether the foreigners will or will not be permitted to remain. If they are not, I apprehend many will ask admission to my premises and request protection, which it would be hard to refuse and might be embarrassing to grant. As against the enemy, however, I have not hesitated to say that this legation will give whatever protection it can to whomsoever, save notorious criminals, may resort to it in time of danger. I am unable to see that any advantage can result to the cause of President Lopez by the evacuation of the capital, for if once the enemy should get possession of it his cause would be irretrievably lost. And yet the conviction is universal here that if the war is not soon over the evacuation will be enforced. Such an act must cause great misery, and probably it would not be carried out towards foreigners if the English, French, and Italian ministers in Buenos Ayres would make strong protests against it, and send up each a gunboat to await results. I could not expect an American gunboat to come up, as there are very few Americans here, and I do not suppose those few would be molested.

In your dispatch of May 20, No. 66, in reply to mine of March 11 and March 12, Nos. 81 and 82, in which I expressed a wish to be recalled, you remark that the President would be pleased if I would remain at my post, but that if I shall make my resignation absolute, it will be accepted.

In my dispatch No. 82 I made no conditions in regard to my resignation; but I did express a wish that my successor might arrive before I left, as if I, the only foreign minister here, were to leave, and no one were to come to take my place, the people here would think they were abandoned by the civilized world and left to be exterminated. I also said that it would be hardly possible for me to leave the country with my family unless some means were provided by the government for my departure; but as no successor has been appointed, it is clearly my duty to remain until the war is over, or until the dangers that now threaten are past. I fear gloomy times, but I am satisfied I can be of much service to many; even if the worst shall happen, and am well aware that should an opportunity arise for initiating terms of peace, my efforts in the matter would be more acceptable to this government than those of any other person whatsoever.

Very respectfully, I am, sir, your obedient servant,
CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, December 13, 1867.

SIR: Since the date of my last dispatch, No. 93, I have been as completely shut out from all communication with the outer world as though I had been in the mines of Siberia. I also know very little of what is going on in the Paraguayan army. I will, however, relate to the best of my knowledge what has transpired since my last dispatches were forwarded, now about two months.

The allies have been for a long time extending their lines around the Paraguayan camp, and by the first of November appear to have completely inclosed it on every side but that of the river. Numerous sallies were made by the Paraguayans against different points, but they always found the enemy in five times their number to oppose them, and were always repulsed, though the official paper here represents them all to have been tremendous victories, in which the Paraguayans, having slain each man his score or more, retired in good order. But on the 2d of November an event occurred that could not be passed over in that way. Three steamers of the little fleet now left to this country left Humaita, having on board some hundred of troops and several cannon. What they set out to do I do not know, but it seems probable that it was supposed a small force of the enemy were on the bank of the river, and this party was sent up to dislodge it. But when they got opposite the point where they supposed only a small body of cavalry was posted, they found a large army of cavalry, infantry, and artillery, that destroyed two of the steamers in a few moments, while the third only escaped ridled with balls and with the loss of most of her crew. The next day, however, a surprise was attempted by the Paraguayans at Tuyuti, formerly the main camp of the allies. This was claimed as a great victory, and from what I can learn I judge that the allies were heavily damaged. But we have only the Paraguay version, and according to that all battles are great victories.

When we learned that the allies were in so large force above Humaita as to cut off all communication by river, I concluded that a crisis was near at hand. Without supplies from outside, President Lopez could not long hold out. He must do one of four things: find a new road for his supplies to enter the camp; cut his own way out; attack and defeat the enemy, or capitulate. He did the first. The right or west bank of the river, which has been represented as an impassable jungle, so thick and impenetrable that it seems never to have penetrated the brilliant military heads of the allied generals that it was possible to get through. It now affords a safe and easy means of communication between the Paraguayan army and the country above where the allies are now posted. By this road thousands of cattle, after being first passed over the river at some point above the mouth of the Tebicuari, are driven down till nearly opposite Humaita, when they are passed back to the east side and are in the Paraguayan camp. Whether the allies will ever try and cut off this means of communication I cannot tell. Their system of warfare is to me utterly incomprehensible. It looks as though their policy was that the Paraguayan people should be exterminated, and that when the war ends there should not be left a shadow of a nation. There appears as yet no signs of giving way on the part of President Lopez. For a long time there has been much talk about arming the women, and the impression here is very general that this will be done if the war lasts much longer. The men must be pretty nearly exhausted already. I have been hoping that some foreign mediation or intervention might put a stop to a war conducted, as this seems to me, with a view to extermination, and a few days since it was reported that an English and an Italian gunboat had passed through the squadron and were just below Curupaiti. But the report in regard to the English gunboat is not confirmed, and the other one, it is said, has come up only to bring an Italian consul. So the prospect of peace appears no better than it did a year ago. And yet it may come very soon. I shall send this dispatch below in the hope it may be forwarded by the Italian war vessel.

The enormous squadron that the Brazillians have brought into the river has made no sign since passing Curupaiti some four or five months ago. All that it has yet done of injury to the Paraguayans could have been done as well by two wooden steamers. By passing Curupaiti and placing itself above the batteries there and below those of Humaita it put itself in a position where it is almost impossible for it to obtain supplies and is impotent for harm against the Paraguayans. Had it passed on immediately after passing Curupaiti it would have been in one hour above Humaita, as that point had been left nearly unprotected in order to strengthen Curupaiti and other points.

But now as the allies seem to be too weak to take the offensive either by land or water, we are exposed to the weary tedium of a siege that may last for months or years.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Asuncion, January 13, 1868.

SIR: On the 14th of October last, in my dispatch No. 92, I had the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatches Nos. 68, 69, 70, 71, and to advise you of the condition of affairs in this country. Since then I have received nothing from the United States, as we are still cut off from all intercourse with the outer world. At the date of my last dispatch, No. 94, I did not suppose this war could last till this time, and then expressed a willingness to remain to the end, as I believed I might be of some service should the time for making peace ever arrive. But the aspect of affairs is so changed since then that I have considered that resolution. I see little reason why the war should not last another year. At least, the end has never appeared so remote to me as it does now. From what I can learn of affairs below everything is going badly with the allies. Several provinces of the Argentine Republic are said to be in revolution, and President Mitre has been obliged to resign his presidency and his post as commander-in-chief of the army on account of ill health, and has gone to Europe. Such at least are the reports here. Meanwhile I cannot learn that they are doing anything with their army or squadron calculated to bring affairs to a crisis. It seems as though it was their policy to starve out Paraguay; but they will find that a long process, and one to which I have no wish to be a victim. They appear afraid to make a general attack on the Paraguayan lines, and the Paraguayans have no idea of coming out of their entrenchments so long as they can keep the way open for obtaining supplies. I have no reason to suppose they will not be able to do that for a long time, and therefore, with the policy now pursued on both sides, I see no light, no hope of peace for a long time. Even should the "triple alliance" be broken up, and Brazil be left alone to carry on the war, with her credit ruined and her home resources exhausted, I nevertheless believe that a large part of the squadron would remain in the river, and that Paraguay would still be effectually blockaded, perhaps as long as Montevideo once was, viz, nine years. I think that under such circumstances it would hardly be expected that I should remain here till the end of the war. I see no probability of my receiving anything from beyond the allied lines until some United States gunboat may come to fetch it. The English, French, and Italian governments have each recently sent a war vessel through the squadron to Curupaity to communicate with this government, and I have no reason to suppose either of them will return for several months. The last that came (the Italian) left Buenos Ayres about the 10th of November, but it brought nothing for me, though there must have been an accumulation of two or three months' mail matter for me in Buenos Ayres. I learned, however, with the most profound regret, that our minister there, Mr. Asboth, was so exceedingly ill that he could scarcely speak, much less attend to any business, and that his friends had small hopes of his recovery. He had previously been my entire dependence for receiving my dispatches or other correspondence, or any needed supplies, and I am well aware that in his state of health his efforts to alleviate the unpleasant position of myself and family have caused him great trouble and annoyance. It took him nearly four months to get through to me a small supply of stores that were indispensably necessary, and without which I could not have remained. I cannot expect him to be at as much trouble again, though I have advised him that the stock then sent would be exhausted before this time, as it actually is; but as the allies complained that it was preposterous that I should require so much, and detained everything for more than three months, I conclude that any other efforts to relieve me that he might make would be attended by similar discourtesies and embarrassments. The prices of almost everything here are such as are only known in times of siege. All these things could be endured were there any certainty, or even a probability, that they would come to an end within a few months. But as it is, the prospect of peace is so remote that I must again ask for my recall.

In your dispatch No. 66 you remark that the President desires that I should remain here, but say that if my resignation should be made absolute it would be accepted. From the preceding statement, of the circumstances in which I am situated I think I shall appear justified in making my resignation thus absolute; but though it be absolute and unconditional, I trust with my recall may come a successor. I know that my presence as United States minister, and the only minister of a neutral power here, gives a great sense of security to many people, and especially to all foreigners. My departure before the arrival of a successor would also, I am persuaded, be regarded with great regret by this government. At the same time I think that at this crisis, when important political changes seem impending in this part of the world, this legation should be continued; but I do not want this to be taken as a condition of my resignation. On the contrary, I now ask my recall unconditionally, and with this make my resignation absolute.

I will add that whoever may be my successor, he will find it impossible to get here with the baggage and provisions necessary for a six months' residence, unless a war vessel is sent purposely to bring him; but if no successor should come to take my place my letter of recall would probably not reach me for months unless special measures were taken to send it to me, and if it were received I could not, as circumstances now are, and very likely will be six months hence, leave the country with my family unless a national vessel were sent up the river and above the blockading squadron to take me away.

I have the honor to be, sir, most respectfully, your obedient servant,
CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 92, of October 14, was received on the 24th ultimo.

The account you give of the state of political affairs in the country of your residence is far from encouraging.

Your determination to remain at your post of duty as long as you can be of any service to our countrymen is highly commended.

Your intention to afford an asylum in the legation to those who may resort to it, save notorious criminals, as far as it can be done without compromising your neutral character or that of your country, is approved.

The Secretary of the Navy has been informed that it is necessary to have a vessel ready to relieve you from your embarrassing situation. His reply I enclose for your information.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, January 17, 1868.

SIR: Since closing my last dispatch of the 13th instant, I have been advised by the minister of foreign affairs, Señor Berges, of the death of General Bartolomé Mitre, president of the Argentine Republic and commander-in-chief of the allied armies. Of this event you will probably have been advised for some weeks before the receipt of this dispatch. It had been reported here, previously, that President Mitre had left the army by reason of his infirm state of health and gone to Europe. It appears now, however, that he died in the camp. On the day of his funeral, I am informed by Señor Berges that President Lopez gave orders that not a shot should be fired from the Paraguayan camp. This act of courtesy and magnanimity, I have learned indirectly, was but illly responded to by the Brazilians, who through the whole day kept up an incessant cannonading on Humaita.

I am utterly unable to conjecture what may be the effect of this important event on this long protracted war. The opinion of Señor Berges, and I think of this government, is that it will be favorable to Paraguay; that his death will be followed by serious disturbances and revolutions in the Argentine Republic, which may compel the withdrawal of all the Argentine troops from the army and break up the "triple alliance." This result may follow from President Mitre's death, but I have great doubts in the matter. But whether it does or not, I do not see how it will have any effect towards bringing the war to a close. Brazil will still have her immense squadron in the river, that can be maintained at little more expense where it is than it would cost in the harbor of Rio de Janeiro. Besides that, one-half of the squadron is now so placed between the batteries of Curupaity and Humaita that I doubt if it could get away without the permission of the Paraguayans, and as the river is now falling it is not likely their condition will be improved. They must stay there and defend themselves, or else make a more ignominious retreat than ever was known, abandoning iron-clads and other vessels that have cost many, many millions of dollars—more than all Paraguay would sell for in quarter sections. This I do not believe they will do, and therefore the war must last till there is neither Paraguay nation, nor people, nor government left. The longer the war lasts, the more I am convinced that this people will never be conquered. They may be exterminated, but, as I have frequently had occasion to say before, it will be only when there are neither men nor women left that the terms of the "triple alliance" will be enforced. Whether other nations may interfere to put a stop to a war carried on not for purposes of conquest only, but with the deliberate view of exterminating a nation whose existence mars the symmetry of a neighboring empire, is a question on which it is not for me to pronounce. But, this I do say, that so complete is the organization of this country, and so entirely are all its elements absolutely at the command of President Lopez, to be devoted to repelling the allies and to maintaining the established government, that to all appearance the war may be prolonged for many months, and if from sheer exhaustion this country must fall, its conquerors will find little but a desert.

To avert so sad a climax is it not possible that neutral powers may intervene, may declare to both parties that this miserable war must stop and impose their terms of peace, saying to whichever party may refuse to accept them that it must thenceforward reckon all the governments whose good offices have been rejected as enemies that will afterwards enforce harder terms than those rejected?

I know not if anything of this kind is feasible. But I know this miserable war ought to end, and I see no other way for it.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Washburn to Mr. Seward.

No. 97.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Asuncion, April 7, 1868.

SIR: It is now nearly three months since the date of my last dispatch, and in all that time I have not received a letter or line, and scarcely have heard a rumor from beyond the limits of Paraguay. I have, therefore, no dispatches to answer, and will proceed to relate what has transpired here during the time.

After the passage of the Brazilian squadron above Curupaiti, in August last, it was supposed here that some decisive action would soon take place that would bring this wasting war to an end. But month after month went by, and nothing seemed to be done by either party, so far as we could learn here, to change the relative positions of the belligerents. The Semanario nearly every week published accounts of astonishing victories, in which the Paraguayans in small force had attacked the positions of the enemy and slaughtered thousands of them, and then retired in good order, with a loss of only two or three. Such victories, we knew too well, were simply repulses, probably expensive to the allies, and certainly so to the Paraguayans. But the weary, dreary monotony of our isolation was at length broken by the announcement that the squadron had again made a move. On the evening of the 21st of February it was first made known here that several iron-clads had passed Humaita, and that at least three of them were on their way up the river, and were already half way to this place. How long the government had known this I cannot say, but have reason to believe that the passage was effected nearly a week before, and that it was known here soon after. But with the public announcement came an order for the complete and immediate evacuation of this city. The order was indiscriminate and was directed to all, foreigners and natives alike, and all were commanded to go away at least one league from the capital. Before the news was generally known, the minister, Señor Berges, sent to request me to call at his office. I immediately complied, when he told me the iron-clads were on the way up the river and might be here the next day, and that, further than that, nothing was known of what had transpired below. Nevertheless he said the town was to be evacuated as soon as possible; that the city was to be made a military post, and everybody, natives and foreigners alike, must leave it. I told him that in my opinion the government had no right to compel foreigners, by the mere proclamation that this was a military point, to abandon their property, business, and interests, and to expose themselves to the losses, hardships, and privations that would inevitably be incident to a general evacuation. But the minister said that the right of the government to do so was indisputable, and that he had sent for me to advise me early not only of the intended evacuation, but that the government would also be removed from this place to Luque, a little village about ten miles inland, and that he had thus early advised me of these measures that I might the more easily obtain a convenient place of residence beyond the city limits. I told him that this provision and interest on my account were entirely unnecessary, as under no circumstances should I abandon my legation. Señor Berges urged that very likely the enemy would bombard the town, and that it would be dangerous to remain. But I told him that I should depend on my flag to protect my premises, and had no fear but it would be respected by the enemy, as once before, much against their will, when I came through their squadron, they had been forced to respect it. He then said that after the next day there would be nothing to be got in the markets, and it would be difficult to obtain a supply of food. But I told him I would take all those risks, but would never abandon my legation till so ordered by my government.

On returning to my house I found many people there, all anxious to know what I would do, and on being told that I was resolved to stay, many asked for shelter under my roof, and many more asked permission to leave their money and valuables with me. I told them that as regards the latter, all the protection that my house or flag could give would be freely granted, but that as for the former, it would be impossible for my premises to accommodate them all, and advised such as could get away to do so at once and not render themselves liable to incur the displeasure of the government by remaining. That night and the next day a great many people came to my house with such things as they considered most valuable. But I took no risk nor responsibility, and told all that in case of sacking, bombardment, or robbery, neither the legation nor myself would be liable.

I am the only foreign minister here, and there is but one fully accredited consul, the Italian, and he has been here only three months. The late French consul here was relieved in October last by a person named Cuberville, who was sent by the French minister in Buenos Ayres to take charge of the consulate until the arrival of a duly appointed consul. The Portuguese have an acting consul here, holding no commission from his government, and the three constitute the consular body. Late in the evening, after the incidents above mentioned, the three came to see me. They had heard that I was determined to remain, and the Frenchman and Italian were greatly concerned lest I should expose myself and family to the horrors of a bombardment and sacking of the town. They had resolved to leave the town and go with the government, while the Portuguese said he would take his chances with me and remain. The Frenchman, however, hastened to advise the government that his Portuguese colleague was not disposed to leave the city, and the next morning at seven o'clock he had a peremptory order from the government to depart within a few hours. The entire foreign population are intensely disgusted at the conduct of the French and Italian consuls. They believe if they had refused to leave the city, except as prisoners, and had advised all their countrymen to do the same, the government would not have ventured to force them to do so, and that if it had felt itself under the necessity of allowing the foreigners to remain, the miseries of the evacuation would have been spared to the natives. The evacuation, however, was enforced, and not a family remained in town except such as were under my roof. Several English families, the heads of which had been long in the government employ, asked me the privilege of occupying some vacant rooms pertaining to the legation. I advised them to first obtain the government's permission to remain in town. This being granted I gave them leave to come, and they yet remain here. I also received all the Americans here within my premises, so that besides the English I have about thirty persons on my hands. Among these is the former minister of government, war and marine, of Montevideo, Señor Don Antonio de las Carreras, who, from his strenuous efforts to repel the invasion of General Flores into the republic of Uruguay, made himself very obnoxious to the allies. Such was the condition of affairs here when the Brazilian gunboats approached the town on the 24th of February. The Paraguayans had still a small fort on the bluff of the river, just below or rather opposite the town. In this fort they had but one large cannon and three or four small field-pieces. At about 10 o'clock in the morning the iron-clads approached, when the firing between them and the fort commenced. The only Paraguay cannon large enough to be of any service against iron-clads had just been finished and put in place, and it was found that it could not be depressed enough to send her shot anywhere near the enemy. Nevertheless it was discharged a few times, and the Brazilians, after discharging sundry shot and shell, so far as I know without touching the fort and without having a shot come within a hundred yards of themselves, turned tail and went down the river, probably to give an account of their splendid victory.

For a long time we expected a return of the iron-clads with re-enforcements, but days and weeks passed, and we could only learn that they had gone down to seek shelter under the guns of Tayi, a point some two or three leagues above Humaita, where the allies have a large force. At length, on the 22d of March, we are told that the Paraguayans have achieved another great victory; that Paso-Pucu had been attacked in force at several points, and that the enemy had been repulsed at all points, with great slaughter, the Paraguayans, as usual, suffering little or no loss. This glorious news, however, was even followed by another announcement not quite consistent with it. It was that Marshal Lopez had abandoned Paso-Pucu with a large part of his army, had crossed the Paraguay, and come up through the Gran Chaco, on the right side of the river, about fifty miles, and then crossed back above the river Tebicuari, where he was again fortifying. A strong force, however, was left to defend Humaita. Such is the military situation so far as we can learn anything about it. We know nothing of what is transpiring below, except what the government chooses to disclose. Therefore we cannot judge anything as to the probable duration of the war. Our situation is about as cheerless as it is possible to imagine; deprived of many of the necessities of life in an abundant city, and cut off from all communication with the outer world, the monotony of existence is scarcely bearable. By my refusal to leave the capital, and become a camp-follower of the government, I have reason to believe I gave great offense, and that my relations with it will not be again so cordial as they have been. Indeed, some things have occurred already, greatly to my annoyance, that show anything but a friendly disposition. The case of the American citizen, James Manlove, will be made the subject of a separate dispatch.

But it is feared by all, and believed by many, that the worst is not yet upon us. Should the enemy advance on the present positions of President Lopez, in such force that he will be obliged to retire, it is believed that he will fall back into the mountains with his army, driving before him all the population, including women and children, the old, the sick, and all foreigners. Such an extreme measure would probably have the effect, so soon as known in Buenos Ayres, to cause the most energetic measures to be taken, on the part of the foreign diplomatic representatives and naval commanders, to rescue their countrymen from the miseries to which they will inevitably be exposed. But I have no doubt that this step will be taken, should President Lopez be driven from his present position. Indeed, I know that the people, now living one or two leagues inland from the river, have received orders to be ready at a moment's notice to retreat to the woods and mountains. In that case the government would doubtless be removed from Luque to some place far in the interior, and the consuls will follow in its wake. As for me, however, I shall remain where I am, unless I am carried away as a prisoner.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

No. 98.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Asuncion, April 7, 1868.

SIR: On the evacuation of this city by order of the government on the 23d of February last, several Americans here resident asked permission to remain with me in this legation. Two of them I took into my employ to assist me in any way that might be required. Their names, with the names of several others whom I had engaged as servants, I sent to the minister of foreign relations, that the subordinate officials might be advised that they were entitled to legation immunities. Among these names were those of James Manlove and Porter C. Bliss. The minister acknowledged the receipt of my note, and said as these two were not servants it would be expected of them that they would confine themselves to the premises of the legation, as they would be liable to arrest like other persons if they went about the streets. They both went into the streets, however, in the immediate neighborhood of my house, as did also the English who had taken refuge under my flag. Mr. Manlove, however, when going out to attend to some animals in his care, was stopped in the streets by the police, when he turned and went to the police office to ask permission from the chief to attend to his animals. The chief, however, did not grant it, and he returned home.

At the time of the evacuation, a Frenchman named Laserre, whose house is very near, and nearly opposite to mine on the same street, gave his keys to Mr. Manlove, requesting him to shut up his premises after he was gone, and giving him full liberty to enter his house and take out and use anything that he might need during his absence. Some days after that Mr. Manlove took the keys of Mr. Laserre's house and went over, intending to enter; but before he had done so he was encountered by some policemen, who demanded of him by what right he was entering those premises. He replied, by authority of the owner. The police then said he should first go to the police office and report that he was thus authorized before entering the house. He asked if he was to be considered as under arrest. They said no. Accordingly he went to the police office, since when I have not seen him. Immediately after his arrest I went to Luque to confer with Señor Benitez, who at present, in the absence of Señor Berges, is acting minister for foreign relations, and I afterwards wrote him an official note, which he answered at great length. At first it was pretended that his arrest was for having entered without authority the house of a foreigner, but when it was found that the owner had given him full liberty not only to enter, but to take away anything he might need, they changed their ground and said it was for going into the street without permission; but as all the English under similar circumstances had, until then, been in the habit of doing the same thing daily, and without molestation, it is clear that it is for unavowed reasons he is kept a prisoner. Perhaps it is from apprehension that being a man of much military experience, he is a dangerous man to have at large at this time, and perhaps it is to show spite against me for not having removed from this city to follow the government to Luque, and to whatever other points may be selected as a temporary capital. To me it appears a great affront to this legation, if not a direct violation of its rights.

I send copies of all the correspondence, and ask instructions.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your most obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Asuncion, February 22, 1868.

I send you a copy of the proclamation issued this day by the Vice-President of the republic, declaring this city a military post, with the decrees necessary, which you will find in the text of the proclamation, which I also transmit for your consideration and observance.

With these observations, I have the honor to be, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, February 22, 1868.

SIR: The present critical condition of affairs in and near this capital has rendered it necessary for me to take into my service several persons in addition to those hitherto connected with this legation.

The following is a list of those employed by me:

Carlos Meincke, German, private secretary; Porter C. Bliss, American; James Manlove, American; George Hamilton, English; Catherin Leahy, English; Anabella Casal, Paraguayan; Basilio Jarra, Paraguayan; Melchora Jarra, Paraguayan.

I avail myself of this occasion to tender to your excellency assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Excellency Hon. JOSÉ BERGES,
Minister for Foreign Relations.

Señor Berges to Mr. Washburn.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Asuncion, February 23, 1868.

I have received yours of the 22d instant, where the names of Mr. Porter C. Bliss and James Manlove, American citizens, and Anabella Casal, a Paraguayan, appear on the list as servants of your legation.

You will find from the proclamation I sent you the same day that this city was declared to be a military post from that date, and consequently subject to the orders of its commander, who is responsible for the security of the post under his command.

In order to avoid unpleasant incidents, the Americans, Bliss and Manlove, may remain in your dwelling, but not as servants, and not be allowed to go out, lest they be arrested by the guards, who have orders not to let any persons but public officials go about; and the Paraguayan woman, Anabella Casal, may remain with you under the same circumstances.

I must repeat what I communicated to you orally, namely, that the seat of government is transferred to Luque for the present.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

JOSÉ BERGES.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, February 24, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of yesterday, and take this occasion to thank you very sincerely for your prompt attention to mine of the day before at a time when your excellency must have been occupied with so many more important matters. At such a time as this I would not trespass on your attention again on the same subject had I not by an oversight omitted the name of Mr. G. F. Masterman as one of the persons attached to this legation. I will add, however, that the evacuation of the capital has rendered it necessary to receive into the legation such other persons as are required by the circumstance that nothing is to be obtained in the markets of the town, and that every service or labor required by my family must be performed within my own premises.

The correct list of persons connected with this legation as secretaries, attachés, companions and assistants to Mrs. Washburn, or as servants, is as follows:

Charles Meincke, German; Porter C. Bliss and James Manlove, Americans; George F. Masterman and George Hamilton, Englishmen; Concepcion Casal, Anabella Casal, Dolores Cavallero, Melchora Jarra, Basilio Jarra, and two washerwomen, Paraguayans.

In the same note of yesterday your excellency informed me that the government is removed temporarily to Luque. I presume, however, there will be frequent daily communication between that place and Asuncion, and shall avail myself of the various means existing for correspondence with your excellency, either by telegraph, railroad, or by courier, whenever the exigencies of the case may require it.

I take this occasion to offer assurances of high esteem and distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Excellency JOSÉ BERGES,
Minister for Foreign Relations.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Asuncion, February 28, 1868.

The undersigned, sergeant-major at the department of war and marine, in the absence of the minister of foreign relations, has the honor to send you an authentic copy of the supreme decree issued by the President on the 25th instant, declaring the whole republic in a state of siege.

Said decree confirms that of the Vice-President, making the city of Asuncion a military post, ordering its evacuation, and transferring the seat of government to Luque, which I now advise you of; and, while I regret your persistency in the resolution not to follow the government to its new site, I hope that all persons in your house will obey the orders that have been issued, or may be issued, by the competent authorities.

I remain yours, &c.,

FRANCISCO FERNANDEZ.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Asuncion, March 4, 1868.

The undersigned, sergeant-major at the department of war and marine, in the absence of the minister of foreign relations, communicates to you the order of the Vice-President of the republic.

You received an official communication from the police department of Asuncion giving an account of the unpleasant incident of yesterday in that quarter, namely, the arrest of James Manlove, an American citizen living at the American legation, and his rescue by you in person, by violence and without explanation with the arresting officers.

The Vice-President has heard of this in wonder, inasmuch as you had been notified of the proclamation necessary in this mortal war against our unprovoked aggressors, and were expected to lend your valuable influence in the preservation of public order and obedience to law by everybody, without distinction of class or persons.

The government of the republic, ever desirous to retain the friendship of foreign nations, and to avoid all occasions of dispute, made known its decrees to the agents of friendly nations residing here. This was the spirit of the note of the 23d ultimo which was addressed to you, in answer to yours of the 22d. The government, to please you, did not specify the individuals sheltered by your legation, but requested that Mr. Porter C. Bliss and James Manlove, and Anabella Casal, might be kept within the walls of the legation, to save them from arrest by the police.

The government was therefore justly surprised, after these orders, at the incidents of yesterday, and regrets to be compelled to ask an explanation of acts so insulting to the officers and offensive to the dignity of the republic.

In communicating this order of the Vice-President of the republic, the undersigned has the honor to be, yours, &c.,

FRANCISCO FERNANDEZ.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Fernandez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion March 5, 1868.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your note of yesterday, and hasten to reply to it at the earliest possible moment. The unpleasant incident of the previous day to which you call my attention has been, I venture to say, much more disagreeable and unpleasant to me than to any other person in Paraguay. After a residence of more than six years in this country, in which I have always experienced the greatest kindness and courtesy from both government and people, it is a cause of deep regret to me that anything of this kind should take place, and especially at a time like this, when it is the duty of all, natives and strangers alike, to do nothing that can in any way embarrass the officers of government in the heroic defense that they and the whole people are making for the national existence.

Your honor remarks in reference to the unpleasant circumstances in question, that James Manlove, an American citizen attached to this legation, was arrested by the police of this city, and that when he was at the police office he was violently and without respect or consideration, or without consultation with any of the constituted authorities, taken away by me.

The facts of the case as I have been informed, and as I believe, were the following: Last evening a little before sunset Mr. Manlove and Mr. Watts, an Englishman, went out on horseback to attend to some cows that they had been in the habit of attending to for several days before, and to which no remonstrance had been made. As the town had been evacuated, and nobody was to be seen in the streets, they galloped their horses, until, turning a corner, they met some policemen, who stopped them, and told them they were violating the law by galloping their horses. One of them replied that it could do no harm, as there were no people in the streets to be injured, and said they were only going a few squares to take care of their cows. The police officer in command then told them to go on, but said they must report themselves the next day at the police office. Mr. Watts, who understands Spanish, did not go on, however, but returned home, and Mr. Manlove, whose knowledge of Spanish is very limited, had understood the police to say that they could not go to take care of the cows, and he then said he would go and see the chief of police and ask permission to attend to them. To obtain this permission he went to the police office, and he did so of his own accord. He was not arrested, and, like Mr. Watts, was at full liberty to go on or return to this legation. But as he did not return for some two hours, I thought it my duty to go and look for him. I went to the police office, and knowing he had not been arrested, I advised him to mount his horse and come home. I was informed at the same time that the chief of police was not in his office, and as that official is doubtless at this time much occupied, so much so that my servant who brings provisions for my family from beyond the city limits has been frequently obliged to wait several hours before he could get a passport to do so, I did not see any reason why Mr. Manlove might not return home then and ask permission to look after his cows, at such time when the chief should be in his office.

The above I believe to be a true statement of the facts of this unfortunate incident. Certain it is, neither Mr. Manlove nor myself had any idea he had been arrested; and if so, his leaving the police was not intended, and could not show any intentional disrespect to the laws or authorities of Paraguay.

In regard to what your honor says respecting the immunities and privileges enjoyed by persons attached to this legation, I have only this to say, and I trust it may be completely satisfactory: This legation is not and will not be a place of refuge or protection for persons who violate the laws of the country. For my own convenience, as well as for the convenience of some English families, I have allowed some persons to take up a temporary habitation within my premises. But it is not that they may have immunity in the violation of any of the local laws, and I beg to assure you that, on being informed that any person connected with this legation has done anything in that time against the laws or police regulations of this city, he will be at once disowned and denied all the legation privileges.

I take this occasion to offer to your honor assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor Hon. FRANCISCO FERNANDEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Relations.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Luque, March 20, 1868.

The undersigned, chief clerk of the department of foreign affairs, by order of the Vice-President, acknowledges the reception of your note of the 5th instant, in reply to one from the minister of war and marine, in relation to certain police disturbances, and returns this answer.

My government would have been pleased to find a satisfactory explanation of the incidents in question; but your account is incorrect, owing doubtless to false information. You will, therefore, allow me to give the correct version of the affair. The statement of the chief of police is as follows:

"On the 3d instant, a squad of police, under Edward Canteras, was patrolling the city, when at 5½ p. m., on the corner of Atajo and Pilcomayo streets, they saw the American, James Manlove, and the Englishman, John Watts, come galloping towards them on horseback. The police called to them to halt; Watts stopped, but Manlove rode on. The police then seized his horse, and ordered him to the guard-house. He at first refused, but finally consented to go after outrageous abuse of the police that stopped him. While the police were engaged with Manlove, Watts escaped, and went back to the legation as you state.

"When Manlove arrived at the station the chief asked him why he rode through the streets against orders. It seems he did not understand, and an interpreter was sent for. While waiting, Manlove said in Spanish that he was going for the milk woman. In a short time you came to the station, and the events occurred, of which complaint was made."

This plain statement will show you that what Manlove and Watts said was not true

I will not now remind you of the surreptitious manner in which Manlove got into the country; but I must say that his appearance in the streets was imprudent, knowing the contents of the note of the 23d from this department.

The government of the republic, in due appreciation of your apologies for the unpleasant circumstance, and regretting that it occurred at a time when the nation is struggling for its life, is astonished that you will shelter in your legation persons who have no right to seek refuge there.

In offering you an additional testimony of the friendly policy of our government towards yours, we hope you will not allow a repetition of such scenes, particularly as they are liable to occur frequently while the legation is so far from the seat of government, and in a military place, with such a large number of persons within its enclosure, admitted at the time of the evacuation of the city.

Thus having obeyed orders, I remain yours, &c.,

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, Sec., Sec., Sec.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benítez.

Asuncion, March 24, 1868.

SIR: Since the interview which I had the honor to hold with your honor yesterday, when I took occasion to call your attention to the case of James Manlove, an American citizen, now under arrest on the charge of having attempted to enter the house of Mr. Lasserre, a French subject, I have learned some additional facts in relation to the matter, which I hasten to communicate to your honor. In the before-mentioned interview, your honor informed me that before making a decision of the case the testimony of Mr. Lasserre would be taken, in order to ascertain if he had given his permission to Mr. Manlove to enter his house during his absence. Fortunately I have a witness, Mr. G. F. Masterman, now, and for the last six months, living in this legation, who can testify to the following facts, a part of which I am able to corroborate on my own personal knowledge:

On the 24th ultimo, Mr. Lasserre, previous to leaving the capital, gave the keys of his house to Mr. Masterman in the presence of Mr. Manlove, and told them both to enter the house whenever they liked, and take and use anything they found which they might need. This was at about 11 a. m., and took place in Mr. Lasserre's own house, which was then open, and when several people were in it on the azotea, of whom I was one, watching the shots from the iron-clads of the enemy, which had arrived and commenced firing that morning at the Paraguay fortress that was plainly in sight from the top of that house. Mr. Lasserre being obliged to leave town at that hour, bid me and the others good-bye, leaving his house open, not only the front door, but, as I remember well, the door of his main parlor. On giving the keys to Mr. Masterman, he requested him and Manlove to lock everything up safe after the other people should leave. Mr. Masterman returned home to this legation and gave the keys of the house to Mr. Manlove, who, at a later hour, locked up the house and also returned home.

Under this statement of facts, your honor will perceive that if there was any fault in entering the house of Mr. Lasserre, it was participated in by several others, including myself. Several persons were in it after the owner had left, among whom was Mr. Cuberville, a French citizen, having charge, at present, of the French consulate, as must have been well known to the police, since we were in full view at the top of the house from the time the firing commenced till the iron-clads run away. No objection, however, was ever made to the entrance at that time.

Your honor, I think, will also admit that if Mr. Manlove was authorized to lock up the house, he must necessarily have had authority to enter it and to unlock it. That the house was left open by Mr. Lasserre, I know of my own knowledge, and that Mr. Manlove locked it up is equally certain. It is also certain that he supposed he had a perfect right to enter that house, and had no idea that he was infringing any law of the country. I have been informed that he was told by the policemen who arrested him, that before entering the house he should have advised the police that he had been authorized by the owner to do so; but as there was no law to that effect, how could he know that such a thing was required? Mr. Lasserre, like every other foreigner, had an undoubted right to leave his house or other property in charge of any person in whom he had confidence. There is no law of France, or law of Paraguay, or law of any other civilized country that requires a man to intrust his private property, in which no third party has a claim, to any other person than such as he may himself elect. I am, therefore, unable to see how there has been any violation of law on the part of Mr. Manlove in accepting the care of Mr. Lasserre's house, locking it up, and afterwards unlocking and entering it, as he had been authorized to do.

In giving the above statement, your honor will observe that every part of it harmonizes perfectly with what I give on my own personal knowledge; in fact, I have no doubt that it is exact and correct in every part, and being fully convinced of that fact, your honor will allow me to express the hope that Mr. Manlove may be immediately set at liberty.

I take this occasion to tender to your honor assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Luque, March 29, 1868.

Your note of the 24th, dated in Asuncion, has been received. In it you state that after your interview with me on the 23d, calling my attention to the case of James Manlove, an American citizen who was arrested by the police, you had obtained further particulars, which you hastened to communicate, and that I had told you Mr. Lasserre's testimony would have to be taken before the case could be decided; and that you had Mr. G. F. Masterman, who had lived in your house for six months, who could testify to the facts, a portion of which you yourself knew to be true. And you continue to say, that on the 24th, before Mr. Lasserre left the capital, he gave the keys of his house to Mr. Masterman, in Mr. Manlove's presence, and told them to enter the house and take what they pleased. This was about 11, you say, in Mr. Lasserre's own house, while several persons were on the azotea, looking at the enemy's iron-clads firing on a fortress. Mr. Lasserre being obliged to quit the city, left all the doors of his house open, and requested Mr. Masterman and Manlove to lock them when they left. Mr. Masterman went to the legation and gave the keys of the house to Mr. Manlove, who locked up the house and came away. And you conclude, under this statement of facts, we could perceive there was no wrong in entering Mr. Lasserre's house. Several persons were in it after the owner had left, among whom was Mr. Cuberville, of the French consulate, who must have been known to the police, and that no objection was made to enter the house at that time. You will also admit, you say, that if Mr. Manlove was authorized to lock up the house, he must necessarily have had authority to enter it and unlock it. That the house was left open by Mr. Lasserre you know yourself, and that Mr. Manlove locked it. It is certain that he supposed he had a right to enter that house, and had no idea that he was infringing any law of the country. He was told by the policeman that he should have informed the authorities that he had a right to enter that house; and finally you express the hope that Mr. Manlove may be set at liberty without delay.

Before I reply to your note, you will permit me to give a summary of our interview which took place on the 23d of this month.

On the morning of that day you came to the department with your lady, and in her presence said you would like to settle the matter with me in a friendly way; that you regretted the incident; that after your return from Limpio, Mr. Bliss told you that Mr. Manlove had gone to Lasserre's house for provisions, as he was authorized to do, and some policemen attempted to arrest him, but he returned to the legation followed by the chief of police, who told Mr. Bliss that Mr. Manlove must go to the station with him. Then Mr. Bliss went with Mr. Manlove to the station, to act as interpreter for him. This is the statement you made, and begged me to settle it amicably, as it had occurred in your absence.

I replied that the affair was certainly unpleasant, as my government was friendly to yours, and it was to the interest of the people of both countries to continue those friendly relations, but that Mr. Manlove was doubly guilty for going into the street, and for opening a house of another person after the city had been evacuated, and declared a military post by the government, and that the police were right in arresting him. Your answer was, that you knew Mr. Manlove was a respectable man, but of violent temper, and you would like him to go into the country or quit the legation, and asked me what would be done in the case. I then asked you if Mr. Manlove knew of the proclamation of February 23, and you said yes. I then told you the case would have to be tried, and I would report the result to you. I must add, that in that interview you told me Mr. Bliss slept in his own house and only came to the legation to eat.

Having thus stated the facts of the case, I will give you my answer.

I must confess, Mr. Minister, that I am surprised at your note; but I am compelled to believe that it was with the best intentions that you made the statement that Mr. Lasserre had given Mr. Manlove permission to enter his house during his absence, caused by the evacuation of the city by supreme command.

There are so many subjects in your note I cannot reply to them all, but I must say that your reasoning is not logical when you say it was not wrong to enter Mr. Lasserre's house because many persons did so, yourself among the number; and Mr. Manlove's case is very different, for he went into the house after, till he was caught by the police on the 21st in the very act, and this was before the expiration of the forty-eight hours, in which the evacuation of the city was to be completed. Neither can I agree with you that if Mr. Manlove was authorized to close the house he was also authorized to open it at any time. The assertion that he thought he had the right to enter the house, without infringing any law of the country, is also false, because the note of the 23d, from this department, forbade Mr. Manlove and Mr. Bliss from going out of the house, and you made that order known to them. In alluding to the remark of the chief of police, that even if Mr. Manlove was authorized to enter Mr. Lasserre's house, he should have asked permission of the authorities to do so, you say: "But as there is no law to that effect, how could he know that such a thing was required?" Now though there may not have been a law on the subject, it is evident if a man is not allowed to enter the city, he cannot enter a house in it without permission of the authorities, for the proclamation ordered the evacuation of the city, and forbade any one to enter it, after forty-eight hours had expired, without a special permit. So Mr. Manlove is doubly guilty, as he left the legation without permission, and entered a house against an express order, and there is no extenuating circumstance in his case. To admit your principle would be to destroy all authority for order in civilized countries.

Everybody will admit that Mr. Lasserre had a right to leave his house in the care of any man he pleased, under ordinary circumstances; but when there is an express law against such an act, he has not that right. To enter a house after the proclamation of the 22d, is equivalent to sacking an unpeopled city, and it is an aggravating circumstance in Mr. Manlove's case, as he was forbidden to leave the legation.

You say there is no law of France or Paraguay, or any civilized country, that requires a man to intrust his property to any other than he may elect, and I agree with you on the general principle; but I cannot see how Mr. Manlove violated no law by opening and closing Mr. Lasserre's houses, after the expiration of the forty-eight hours, and under the circumstances mentioned.

When I received your note about Mr. Manlove and the police, after our verbal conference, I expected the thing settled, but I was sadly disappointed to find in it only assertions that no law had been violated by Mr. Manlove, and that he had acted rightly. But you must certainly admit that Mr. Manlove did violate laws by entering houses in the city of Asuncion, that was under martial law, and by leaving the legation after having been expressly forbidden to do so.

I will now remind you of my note of the 20th, when I thought the affair at an end, and advised you not to let it happen again, as it might while the legation was so far from the seat of government, and in a city which was under martial law.

I regret to have to make these details, but circumstances compel me to it.

You will allow me to mention that when military necessity demanded the evacuation of the capital, to make it a military post, the proclamation was sent to you with the note of 22d February, and on the 23d of the same month you were informed that the capital was a military post; and Mr. Berges told you that Bliss and Manlove might stay in your house, but could not leave it, and you were informed that the seat of government was temporarily transferred to Luque. An answer to this communication was naturally expected from you, but none has been received, and you did not deign to give your reasons for not moving with the government, and choosing to remain in a military station, being the only one of the foreign agents who did so; nor did you give any reason for sheltering so many people in your house, and among them two whose names you refused to give to the minister.

After the note of the 23d, my government hoped that Bliss and Manlove would obey instructions through your advice, as they were staying with you contrary to law, but subsequent events have shown that they did not obey the decree, as Mr. Manlove's row with the police demonstrates, as well as his forcible entry into Mr. Lasserre's house. Mr. Bliss also violated the decree by living in his own house, and not at the legation, where he only came to get his meals.

This occurrence of circumstances, Mr. Minister, has attracted the serious attention of my government, and was the reason for asking an explanation of you, which we hope you will make, with a promise of no more violations of the law by persons in your legation. We also hope you will consider the justice of satisfying public honor and the dignity of the government by apologizing for Mr. James Manlove's conduct. However well disposed this government may be towards the representative of the United States and its citizens, that have been always treated with consideration, it cannot comply with your request that Mr. Manlove be immediately set at liberty.

I embrace the occasion to repeat the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, April 4, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, on the 31st ultimo, of your note bearing date of the 29th, in answer to mine of the 24th, on the question of the arrest and detention of the American citizen Mr. James Manlove. This note of your honor has occasioned me both surprise and regret. In my previous note on the same matter I had given my reasons, founded in part on my own personal knowledge, for believing that Mr. Manlove had not intentionally violated any law or police regulation of Paraguay, and I cannot but be surprised at the different conclusions to which your honor has come on the same evidence. That it should cause me regret your honor can understand, as you will do me the justice to admit it has always been my wish and practice to avoid all unpleasant differences, and to arrange amicably, and without insisting on technicalities or formalities, any question that might arise; and I am equally willing to concede that the government of Paraguay has shown a like disposition, and ever evinced a willingness to waive forms and technicalities, going so far in some instances as to grant requests from courtesy that I could not claim as rights. For these reasons I deeply regret an occurrence like this of Mr. Manlove, in which I am compelled to take a view of the affair so different from that of your honor. My views of the case were expressed in my note of the 24th ultimo, and as they differ so entirely from yours, on which the government has formed its resolution to still detain Mr. Manlove as a prisoner, I do not see as any good purpose can be subserved by my reiterating my opinions, or alleging anything in addition. I have now only to report the case to my government and await its instructions; and, unless something now unforeseen should occur, the correspondence on the question, for my part, will close for the present with this letter.

In the note of your honor to which this is an answer, allusion is made to a circumstance that I am very glad to have this opportunity to explain, as I think it will appear that there was neither discourtesy nor neglect, as is intimated in your note, in my not answering at the time the letter of Señor Berges of the 23d, in which he officially advised me of the removal of the government to Luque. I wrote an answer to that note on the following day and sent my secretary three times to the different government offices to deliver it to some person who would forward it to Luque. After two unsuccessful efforts to find some person who would forward it, he went to the chief of police, who refused to receive it, and before I found an opportunity to send it I learned that Señor Berges had gone to Paso-Pucu. I therefore withheld it for his return, but as he did not return I did not send it until I was advised verbally by your honor that you had been named as acting minister of foreign relations during his absence. During this time circumstances had so changed as to seem to render it unnecessary to trespass any further on the attention of the government in regard to the personal affairs of this legation; and as in the meanwhile other events had transpired in which the removal of the government to Luque was treated as an accomplished fact, it did not occur to me after so long a delay that any formal answer on that point was expected or required by courtesy or official etiquette. The identical letter which I wrote on the 24th and endeavored to send to his excellency Señor Berges, I have the honor to inclose herewith. I can now only regret I did not send my secretary to Luque to deliver it at the time, but attaching little importance to it save as a matter of form, and not anticipating the departure of Señor Berges, I did not suppose that a delay of a few days more or less could make any difference. Another point to which your honor alludes seems to call for a reply from me; it is that I have not given formally the reasons that have led me to fix my residence far from the government and in a part purely military, making myself the only exception among the foreign agents, and admitting an increased number of persons into my premises without giving information of the fact as requested by his excellency Señor Berges.

To the first clause of this allegation, that I have not given my reasons for staying in this city, is that I had never heard it alleged that it was the duty of a foreign minister to give his reasons officially to the government to which he is accredited for preferring one place of residence to another. Foreign ministers, so far as I know, select their own places of residence, generally for their own convenience near the seat of government, and in my limited experience I have never known that a duly accredited minister was ever before called on to give formal reasons to any government, except his own, for his choice of residence, and much less to give his reasons for not changing it. Therefore, while I consider it would be improper to give reasons for acts for which I am responsible only to my own government, I will state my opinion on the duties of ministers and consuls in cases more or less analogous to the one under consideration, and shall cite such precedents as occur to me, as apropos to the occasion.

When James II of England left London and established his court in Ireland, he was not followed or accompanied by any foreign minister of neutral or independent powers; and in later times, when the capital of France has been in the possession of foreign invaders, the ministers have always remained to look after and maintain the interests of their own countries. It is true, that in those cases there was no order for the evacuation of the different capitals. Such order, however, would not have applied to foreign ministers, as they are not subject to the laws of the country to which they are accredited, and their legations are considered as extra-territorial, and being for the time out of the limits and jurisdiction of the country where they reside.

Many instances might be adduced in the history of Spain, Naples, and during the wars of Napoleon, of the capitals of several other countries when they were vacated temporarily by the government. But in no instance was the status or official character of the foreign ministers near the court affected. They never accompanied the government in its removals, but they staid at their posts in the interests of their own governments, to guard and protect the rights of their own people. They acted on the principle that ministers and consuls are appointed to reside in foreign countries in order to watch over and protect the interests of their own country and countrymen, and not expected to desert their posts at the time when their presence is most needed. Such, also, is expected of them by my government, and if the agents of other nations here have seen fit to pursue a different course, it is no guide for me.

But I have another instance to cite much more to the point and of a very late date. At the time of the invasion of Mexico by the French troops in 1862, there was a minister of the United States there, duly accredited to reside near the capital of that republic. The post was filled by one of our most illustrious and experienced statesmen. The French troops advanced, as your honor is aware, till they finally took the city of Mexico and set up the unfortunate Maximilian as emperor. Our minister, however, acting under direct orders from his government, refused to recognize him, or to treat him in any other way than as a usurper and an invader, having no right there. The government of Juarez, however, was transferred to San Potosi, and the United States minister was invited to accompany it, but he declined, and his course was approved by President Lincoln. Since that time another minister to Mexico, in place of Mr. Corwin, who at his own solicitation was permitted to retire, has been appointed, but he never entered the country till the government was re-established in its ancient capital. Under all these circumstances, and with so many precedents, if at this time I were to leave my legation and abandon the old and time-honored capital of Paraguay, I know full well that the act would be repudiated by my government and be followed by my instant recall. Your honor will see, therefore, that for me there was but one course to pursue, and having taken that course which I know will be approved by my government, I have nothing further to say in the premises. On but one other point of your note will I remark at this time. It is that where your honor says you await for explanations in regard to matters referred to in your letter, and also security that a similar act to that of Mr. Manlove will not be repeated by any of the persons now residing in this legation. The explanations have been given above. As for the security, I know not what kind of security is expected. I have duly advised all persons who have not been accepted and recognized as attached to this legation, and therefore entitled to all its privileges and immunities, that if they go beyond the precincts of the legation, it will be at their own risk and peril, and if in doing so they should be arrested by the police, I shall not interfere in their behalf.

I avail myself of this occasion to tender assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Relations.

Mr. Washburn to Mr. Seward.

No. 99.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Asuncion, April 17, 1868.

SIR: In my dispatch of January 13, No. 95, I had the honor to ask the second time for my recall. At the same time I wrote to our minister in Buenos Ayres, Mr. Asboth, and to our consul, Mr. Hollister, and also to Messrs. S. B. Hale & Co., who have always cashed my drafts and attended to any other business I might have there, informing them all of the very disagreeable circumstances in which I am placed with my family, and requesting each of them to make an effort to communicate with me, and to forward my correspondence. I authorized them to charge the whole expense of a special messenger to me. At that time it had been three months since I had received any dispatches or general correspondence, and now three months more have passed and not a word in answer has reached me from any source. From this I am led to fear that those dispatches never reached Buenos Ayres, though I was advised by Señor Berges that they were promptly sent through the lines to the allied camp under flag of truce. On this suspicion, and now for the third time, I ask for my immediate recall, and I ask that means may be provided me for leaving the country. Without the aid of a national war vessel I cannot do it, for nobody has entered or left the country for the last three years without such auxiliary. In my dispatch No. 97 I have stated how the city was evacuated, and that only the persons within this legation remain in it, and that very probably the inhabitants who have been compelled to remove for a few leagues would, if the fortune of war were unfavorable to President Lopez, be all compelled to resort to the woods and mountains. My own relations, owing to my refusal to abandon my post, are far from satisfactory, and I know not what is in store for me. If the inhabitants should be all ordered to the mountains, it will not be possible to get even the poor supplies we are now able to obtain within a league or two of the town. Still I think we could exist for some weeks; and if we cannot exist longer, I can only say I shall not go into the interior except as a prisoner. After the many representations I have made to parties below to try and do something for our relief, I consider it hopeless to expect anything till specific orders from Washington shall compel attention to their duties. Should subsequent events occur that may cause astonishment and regret at the indifference manifested in the affairs of this country and the persons here detained, it can never be alleged that I have not made full and earnest representations of the impending calamities.

I am, sir, very truly, your most obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, June 2, 1868.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatches numbered 95 and 96, of the 15th and 17th of January last.

I have read with painful interest the account which you give of the unhappy condition of affairs in Paraguay, and in view of which you have been induced to tender your resignation of the position of minister resident of the United States at Asuncion.

I am directed by the President to inform you, in reply, that your resignation is accepted, with permission to exercise your own discretion in regard to awaiting the arrival of a successor.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. McMahon.

No. 3.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 2, 1868.

SIR: When, on the 18th day of August last, you were on the eve of your departure for Asuncion, the capital of Paraguay, as minister resident of the United States to that republic, this department, by direction of the President, requested you to remain in the United States until you should receive further instructions. The occasion of that direction was that Rear-Admiral Davis, who commands the United States South Atlantic squadron, had just then reported that he had sent the United States ship of war Wasp up the Parana for the purpose of bringing away your predecessor, Mr. Charles A. Washburn, and his family, from Asuncion, thereby removing them from an embarrassing and possibly dangerous situation. Rear-Admiral Davis had further reported that the Marquis de Caxias, who commands the allied forces, had refused to permit the Wasp to pass through his blockade up to Asuncion, in consequence of which refusal the Wasp, after a long delay, had returned to Montevideo without having accomplished the object of her voyage. The admiral having brought this transaction to the knowledge of Mr. Webb, the United States minister at Rio, that minister had made it the subject of a representation to the government of Brazil, in which he demanded that the proceedings of the Marquis de Caxias might be disapproved, and that the Wasp might be allowed to proceed without delay to Asuncion, for the purpose of removing Mr. Washburn and his family from that place. Mr. Webb, at the same time, gave intimations to this department that, if the demands he had thus made upon the Brazilian government should be denied, he should, in that case, ask for a passport, and immediately withdraw from Brazil. The Brazilian government was still holding the demands of Mr. Webb under consideration at the time when your intended departure was arrested by this department.

It was then supposed that the opposition which the Brazilian commander of the allied forces made to the use of the United States ship of war for the removal of Mr. Washburn from Asuncion, if persisted in, would equally embarrass your journey to Asuncion. It was necessary, in any case, to wait for the answer of the Brazilian government to Mr. Webb's demands, before the President could properly determine what measures should be adopted, either to bring your predecessor away from Asuncion, or to secure you a safe and speedy passage to that capital. What the government did determine, at that time, on the subject was communicated to Mr. Webb. This government thought it neither improper nor premature to consider the transaction of the hinderance of the Wasp, which had been brought by Mr. Webb to its notice. The proceeding of Rear-Admiral Davis in sending the Wasp up to Asuncion for the purpose of bringing Mr. Washburn away was approved; and this government held that it has a perfect right to send a ship of war up the Parana to Asuncion for the purpose of receiving a United States minister and his family, and conveying them from scenes of siege and war to neutral territory or waters; that the refusal of the marquis to permit the Wasp to pass up the Parana violated becoming comity on the part of Brazil and the allies towards the United States, and was in contravention to the laws of nations; that Mr. Washburn and Commander Kirkland properly declined the alternatives which had been offered by the Marquis de Caxias, and the requests which Mr. Webb had made to the Brazilian government in regard to the whole transaction were approved and adopted.

On the 22d of August last a voluminous dispatch was received from Mr. Webb, which bears the date of the 22d of July last, and which was accompanied by a copy of a further correspondence which had taken place between himself and the Brazilian minister for foreign affairs. This correspondence, however, had not reached a definitive conclusion, and the demands which Mr. Webb had made still remained without a definite reply on the part of the Brazilian government, so that on the 22d of July last Mr. Webb's demands still remained under the consideration of the Brazilian government. Important events are unofficially known to have occurred on the Parana since that date. The fortress of Humaita has been evacuated by the Paraguayan forces, and the allies have advanced somewhat further up the river, in the direction of Asuncion.

It is not improbable that the military considerations which may have influenced the Marquis de Caxias to refuse permission to the Wasp to pass through the blockade may now have ceased. It is deemed not improbable that Mr. Washburn and family may have already descended the river.

To-day I received from Mr. Webb a dispatch, which bears date August 7, and which came from London by cable, in which dispatch he says that the Brazilian ministry has yielded to his request, and that the Wasp goes to Asuncion.

The information thus received is deemed sufficient to warrant your proceeding at once by the next United States steamer to the seat of your legation. You will, however, stop at Rio long enough to communicate with Mr. Webb, and also at Montevideo and Buenos Ayres to communicate with the consulate and legation at those places, and to ascertain whether the military obstructions to your voyage up the river, which were heretofore apprehended, have been removed. It is very desirable to avoid the trouble and expense of sending a ship of war up the Parana merely for the purpose of conveying you to your post. You will therefore proceed by such other conveyance as shall offer itself, if it be reasonably safe and feasible. If no such conveyance shall offer, you will then confer with Rear-Admiral Davis in regard to the most suitable way of reaching the capital of Paraguay. You will be expected to show this instruction to Mr. Webb and to Mr. Worthington, and to the rear-admiral. In so doing you will take care to say that I have altogether refrained from discussing in this paper the diplomatic question, which has been raised at Rio, concerning the hinderance of the Wasp on the previous occasion.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

MARTIN T. McMAHON, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, September 3, 1868.

SIR: Very few words will suffice for your instruction in regard to the political conduct of your mission. You will assure the President of Paraguay of the sincere and cordial friendship of the government and people of the United States for the government and people of Paraguay.

The United States recognizes every foreign nation with which it has treaty connections as sovereign, and as such having a right to make or carry on war, for such causes, or on such occasions, as it may deem just and proper.

The United States consequently avoid alliances or engagements by which they might become parties in the conflicts of other nations. They have asserted and faithfully maintained neutrality in the unhappy war which has so long existed in the valley of the La Plata. Nevertheless the United States regard wars between the several states of this continent with sincere regret, and they have, therefore, constantly tendered their good offices to the belligerents for the purpose of procuring an end of hostilities and a restoration of peace among the nations of South America.

This is the spirit of the instructions which have been given to your predecessor, and they will be found sufficient for your guidance.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

BUENOS AYRES, September 26, 1868.

SIR: At length I have escaped alive from Paraguay, and have brought the larger part of my family with me. Two members of my legation, however, Porter C. Bliss and George F. Masterman, were seized by the police of President Lopez, at the moment of their starting to accompany me to the steamer, at the time of my departure. The condition of affairs in Paraguay, at the time I left, was horrible beyond description. All, or nearly all, of the foreigners were in prison and heavily fettered, and I believe if the steamer that came to take me away had been a month later, I should have shared their fate. Lopez pretended, some three or four months ago, to have discovered some sort of a conspiracy, and after arresting almost all the foreigners, demanded of me that I should deliver up to the tribunals those who had sought asylum in my house at the time the Brazilian fleet went to Asuncion in February last. To defend these men and save them from the clutches of Lopez, I had a correspondence with the government long enough to make a volume of diplomatic dispatches. It was all in vain, however. They all had to go; though none, except Bliss and Masterman, were taken by force. Had not the Wasp come to my rescue, I have no doubt I also should have been shot, or else held a prisoner and subjected to torture. Lopez pretended to believe that I, too, was engaged in the conspiracy, and in his last letters gives what he says are the declarations of his two brothers, his ex-minister of foreign affairs, Don José Berges (the same who went as commissioner to the United States in 1859) and his chief justice, Señor Urdapilleta, in which they all say that they were engaged in a great conspiracy, and that the American minister was at the head of it, and used his official seal to cover the correspondence between the traitors and the enemy. Of course, when he included such declarations in official correspondence, I asked for my passports, but I did not receive them until the arrival of the Wasp. Even then I was not able to get away for nearly a week, and until I was on board the Wasp, I had good reasons to apprehend I should not get away at all.

Since my arrival here I have had no time to write a full or succinct account of the horrors of the last three months. Nor can I send you copies of my correspondence till the next steamer. I send, however, with this the Buenos Ayres Standard, containing my last note to Lopez, written after I was on board the Wasp, and also a letter written by me to the English minister here, after my arrival, giving him an account of the situation of his countrymen and of all foreigners in Paraguay. This will give as good an idea of the real condition there as anything I could write. I will, however, as soon as I possibly can, give you even a more full and detailed statement than this. But since my arrival here I have been completely run down by people who have come to inquire of me in regard to their friends in Paraguay. I regret that I have but one answer for them all: "Lopez has killed your friends, or holds them in prison loaded with fetters." I fear, too, that none of them will escape with their lives. I take it for granted that all of those whose declarations have been published, including the two brothers of Lopez, and his ex-minister José Berges, have been or will be executed. They will not be left to deny them, or to give an account of the tortures by which they were extorted.

I am confident there has never been any conspiracy, for I do not believe that under the system of espionage that exists throughout Paraguay, and the universal distrust that everybody has for everybody else, there are three men in the country so foolhardy as to engage in anything of the kind. Lopez, however, in his policy of extermination, and of leaving no one to testify against him, has declared that there is, and seems to imagine that confessions extorted by torture will justify him before the world in executing those who have made them; or rather, those whom he declares to have made them. It was to dispel this illusion that I sent him my note of September 12, when on board the Wasp.

My letter to the English minister was first published in the Standard, and has been translated and published in most of the native papers. It has caused a general thrill of horror. The English, French, Italian, and Portuguese ministers have all sent gunboats up the river, in hope of rescuing their unfortunate countrymen. Neither of them, however, would have been allowed to pass the blockade had not the Wasp done so previously. The French and Italian ministers are very much concerned about their consuls there, as Lopez has taken and is reported to have shot the Portuguese consul, and subjected the vice-consul to such treatment that he died under it. They all say there is no question now of national dignity, of law or right; all these considerations are to be sunk under the imperative duty of rescuing their countrymen from the grasp of a madman.

In regard to the publication of this correspondence, I wish to say that Lopez began to publish it in his Semanario and continued it till, in my note of the 11th of August, I showed, by citing facts and dates, the entire falsity of the declarations said to have been made by Berges, Carreras, and others, and that for some three weeks the Semanario did not appear again, and that when finally another number did appear, a day or two before my departure, though bearing date nearly a month before, no more of the correspondence was published nor was any allusion made to it. Copies of the Semanario having the correspondence as far as published, however, were brought below without my knowledge by the Wasp, and besides these copies of the last notes of the government to me were somehow smuggled through in the same way to be published here. On being informed of this, after my arrival, I considered that it would be better to have it published complete than to have only such parts of it given as might suit the purposes of President Lopez. I have, therefore, given to the newspapers here those notes that Lopez seemed most anxious to suppress, and believe that under the circumstances my course was judicious and will be approved.

Though I have staid the last year in Paraguay, to my great pecuniary loss, and have been compelled to live without many of the necessities of life, and have done it all in order to be of service to others, nearly all of whom were of different nationalities than my own, I find on arriving here I am greeted by the press (with the exception of the Standard) with a perfect storm of obloquy.

The newspapers publish eagerly all my correspondence, and give my testimony as evidence of the wisdom and justice of the "triple alliance" and a vindication of the conduct of the war. At the same time they cannot conceal their vexation that Lopez did not shoot me. Twice I had forced their blockade in vindication of the rights of nations and my rights as a minister of a nation friendly to all the belligerents, and because I had done that they supposed I was a great friend of Lopez, whereas I have always regarded him as the worst man, and his as the worst government in the world. In this published correspondence there also appear some expressions not at all complimentary to the allies. I believe all the world is of my opinion that throughout this war they have shown a degree of slowness never surpassed, as if it were their purpose to exterminate the Paraguayans without meeting them in battle. They have, therefore, regarded me with great disfavor ever since I returned to Paraguay, and they cannot conceal their chagrin that Lopez did not make a climax of his atrocities by killing me. This, they imagine, would have justified the "triple alliance," and established the courage and endurance of the allies, in taking as many years to conquer Paraguay as they ought to have been months.

But, had Lopez made me a prisoner, and shot me as a conspirator, they know that the contempt they have brought upon themselves by their imbecility would be diverted from them, and that the burden of the war would be transferred to a more powerful nation, and that they would be relieved from further responsibility in regard to its further prosecution. Their vexation and annoyance, therefore, that Lopez did not kill me is extreme, and the same papers that quote me as authority for their execration of Lopez quote his tortured witnesses as evidence against me.

I learn that a new minister has been appointed for Paraguay, and it is supposed he will soon be here. I shall not feel justified in leaving this place till he arrives, and I can fully advise him of the condition of affairs in Paraguay. I take it for granted that, if he comes, he will not go up the river till he has further instructions from the department. Should he go up now, or a month hence, he would probably find that Lopez had fled to the Cordilleras; but should he not come soon, I shall consider that I ought to remain here till I can consult Mr. Webb, in Rio, in regard to the case of those two members of my legation, Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman, who were taken from me by force by President Lopez. I cannot abandon them as long as there is a possibility of saving them. Truth is, I fear they have both been executed before this, though I know that nothing exists or could be proved against them were the witnesses outside of Paraguay. Lopez, however, can produce declarations of honorable men that they have committed every imaginable crime, including sorcery, treason, arson, flat burglary, and trespass on the case.

I was unable to comply with your instructions to leave the archives of the legation with some responsible American citizen in Paraguay, in whom I had confidence. Unfortunately all such were prisoners at the time I left. I therefore gave them in charge of the Italian consul there, Mr. Lorenzo Chapperson.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

No. 101.]

BUENOS AYRES, October 5, 1868.

SIR: With this I send you copies of all the correspondence I had with the government of Paraguay subsequent to my dispatch of January 17, 1868, which appears to be the latest that President Lopez allowed to pass through the military lines. Other dispatches that I sent in the month of April I now learn never reached this city, and I therefore send duplicates of them. In these dispatches, Nos. 97, 98, and 99, I gave full accounts of the events that had transpired in Paraguay subsequent to the passage of the allied squadron above Humaita, and the evacuation of Asuncion. But as I was obliged to intrust them to the hands of Lopez to be forwarded, I felt it necessary to be very guarded in my language, as I suspected they would be opened and detained by him, and if they contained anything unfavorable to him or his cause, that all to whom I had given shelter and protection would be exposed to his implacable vengeance, and my own situation rendered as disagreeable as possible. I nevertheless repeated my request to be recalled, and gave a full account of the circumstances of the evacuation, and stated my reasons why I wished to get away. Matters had been going on from bad to worse, till even at that time a reign of terror existed, such as had never been known in the worst days of France. I had thought it my duty to stay as long as I could be of any service in giving aid or protection to foreigners, or even to Paraguayans, who might seek the shelter of my flag at the last extremity. It was evident to me by that time, however, that though by remaining I might give a sense of security, the reality I could not give; and that if Lopez were forced to retire into the interior, he would leave no one in his rear, not even me nor any one belonging to the legation.

These dispatches, with private letters, undoubtedly were opened and read by Lopez, and he learned from them that I was tired, sick, and disgusted with him and his government; for soon after sending them, when I went to visit him at his headquarters on the arrival of the Wasp at Curupaity, to see if I could not make some arrangements so that she would come above the blockading squadron, I found him morose and churlish. Previously he had always evinced a disposition to keep on amicable terms, and his changed manner I ascribed partly to the fact that he was losing ground in the war, and partly to the circumstance that I had given asylum to so many persons in my legation. I was previously well aware that it was gall and wormwood to him to have it supposed that there was one house, or one person even, in Paraguay, over which he could not exercise his absolute power; and before I left him to return to Asuncion he gave me to understand that the persons whom I had admitted into my house would not be allowed to remain there.

I then saw clearly that there were "breakers ahead," and the first thing for me to consider was how I should get my wife and child out of the country without abandoning those who had sought refuge with me, or the larger number who had looked to me as their last and only hope. I knew perfectly well that if I had asked my passports at that time and requested Lopez to send a steamer to convey me under flag of truce to Curupaity, he would not have done so. He would probably have said that there were so many torpedoes and other obstacles in the river that he would not venture one of his steamers to pass them, and there was no other way by which I could get aboard the Wasp. My only hope, therefore, of getting my family away was that the Wasp would pass above the blockade, and if I could once get them out of danger, I was disposed to remain to give protection, or at least a sense and feeling of protection, to the foreigners. At such a fearful crisis I thought it would appear cowardly and selfish for me to go away leaving hundreds or thousands who believed that my presence in the country was a guarantee of their safety. But at that time I had not the most remote idea of the absurd and preposterous charges that were soon to be made, not only against those whom I had protected, but against myself.

The Wasp, however, was not allowed by the Brazilians to go above the squadron at that time, and her commander, after waiting for nearly two months and finding that he could do nothing to relieve me without going higher up the river, returned for further instructions. I then supposed he would soon return with orders to force the blockade if necessary to effect a passage. Events, however, were occurring about the time of the departure of the Wasp that led me to suppose Lopez had become distrustful of everybody. Gradually I found that the most of those foreigners who had looked to me for safety were one after the other arrested and taken in irons to headquarters. What their offense was no one in my house could imagine. Then came the succession of events as related in my letter to the English minister on my return to Buenos Ayres, a copy of which I send with this.

The several foreign ministers here are greatly exercised concerning the course they ought to pursue. They have all asked my opinion, and I have told them that Lopez was amenable to no principle or sentiment but fear; that his reiterated vaunt that he would fight to the last man and last dollar, and fall on the field of battle when all was lost, was but the whistling of the boy passing through the graveyard; that he would save his own detested person at last if possible, and carry with him all the money and jewels that he could rob from their rightful owners; that with all his apparent recklessness, such was his ultimate intention; that he would sacrifice everybody so far as possible, and yet leave a safe retreat for himself; that he was infatuated with the idea he could seize any foreigner and confiscate his property and then publish what would purport to be his confession or "declaration," confessing himself to be a conspirator or plunderer of the treasury, or both, and that this would be received as ample justification for shooting him and taking his property; that to leave no intelligent witnesses to testify against him he would take care to butcher all intelligent people, Paraguayans and foreigners alike, relying on the "declarations" he had caused to be promulgated as theirs as his own justification. In conclusion, I have added that being thus convinced of his intentions, and knowing so well his character, the only means that the foreign ministers had of giving security to their countrymen in Paraguay was to awaken the fears of the despot who held them in his power, and that, in my opinion, the most efficient way to do this was for them all to unite in a joint note to Lopez and warn him that he would be held responsible by their respective governments for the lives and good treatment of all their fellow-countrymen.

The course I have suggested, however, has not been adopted. The ministers fear to do so lest it may provoke Lopez to an indiscriminate massacre of all foreigners. They feel that they are treating with a madman, and doubt whether his personal cowardice gives such "method to his madness" as would make him consult his own safety. Instead of the course thus suggested by me, they have sent the gunboats of their respective nations to pass through the squadron, each one to forward a message to Lopez requesting him to send on board the citizens of their respective nationalities.

No good, in my opinion, can result in such half-way measures. Lopez is so absolute that in reply to the demand for the delivery of the subjects of any foreign government, he could send a letter with the veritable signature of every foreigner living in the country—for if he could not get their signatures they would live no longer—saying that they did not wish to leave Paraguay; that they were so well treated by the great Lopez, and were so grateful to him for his care and protection of them, that they never would leave him. And yet, of these very people who would, to save or rather prolong their lives, sign such a paper, there is not, to the best of my knowledge and belief, one out of a hundred that would not give everything he has got in the world, except life, to escape from Lopez's power.

So far as I can learn, there is not a person outside Paraguay who believes that there has ever been any conspiracy at all; that the pretense that there has been is only to give Lopez an excuse for killing off all foreigners and such Paraguayans as have money enough to tempt his cupidity. Previous to my arrival here, there were many in favor of breaking up the "triple alliance," and making peace with Lopez. But now, since it is known how he has treated all foreigners, not excepting even the members of the United States legation, the universal sentiment is that he must be destroyed—that he is a common enemy of mankind.

In my last dispatch, No. 100, I mentioned the fact that the newspapers here appeared to be indignant that I had got away from the grasp of Lopez. The correspondence had not then been all published, and at the time of their unfavorable comments they evidently supposed that, by remaining, I could have continued to give protection to more or less people. The last long letter to me from Lopez's last foreign minister, Luis Caminos, has completely dispelled this impression, and if they show no affection for me, they are constrained to language respectful and decent. I inclose a slip from the Standard of the 30th of September, which is a sharp rebuke of the temper they at first manifested.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

[From the Buenos Ayres Standard. September 30, 1863.]

MR. WASHBURN, THE UNITED STATES MINISTER.

To the Editors of the Standard:

GENTLEMEN: Like all others, I have been greatly horrified at hearing the accounts given by the Hon. Mr. Washburn of the state of affairs in Paraguay. But my horror at the brutality of Lopez does not equal my disgust at the treatment Mr. Washburn has received at the hands of the native papers. Mr. Washburn, it is well known, remained in Paraguay for a long time, for no other purpose than to give aid and protection to foreigners. He staid there until such charges were brought against him by Lopez that he could not with self-respect hold any more official correspondence with that government. He then demanded his passports. He did not receive them, however, until the arrival of the Wasp, and it is evident that up to that time it was the intention of Lopez to keep the American minister a prisoner in Paraguay; so he told Captain Kirkland. It is also evident that had he committed any act of violence towards Mr. Washburn he would have committed the last, and after he had tortured him to death he would have published such declarations as coming from him as suited his purpose. No wonder Mr. Washburn did not wish to partake of that banquet which Lopez had prepared for him.

Having incurred the implacable wrath of Lopez, it was useless for him to remain any longer in Paraguay. He could give protection or aid to nobody. As he justly says in his parting note to Lopez, the seizure of Bliss and Masterman in the street was as clear a violation of his rights as a minister as if they had been taken from his house by force.

No, Mr. Editor, the conduct of Mr. Washburn throughout this whole fearful time was humane, generous and self-sacrificing, and the abuse that he is now receiving is for other reasons than those alleged. In the correspondence lately published, Mr. Washburn has made very severe and sarcastic remarks in regard to the way the allies have conducted the war. But he is not alone in that; has not Lopez got the sympathy of at least half the world, not from any merit of his own, but by reason of the procrastination of the allies? These comments of Mr. Washburn your contemporaries know to be just and deserved, and they feel them strongly, and they revenge themselves by throwing dirty water at the only man who has ever told the whole truth both about Lopez and the allies.

There is another reason why the American minister is assailed. It is known he gave great offense two years ago by forcing the blockade to get into the country after the Brazilians had told him plainly he never should pass, and now he has forced it again to get out of it, notwithstanding the defiant language of the Marquis de Caxias. They feel humiliated at the arrogance of this Yankee, and are greatly chagrined that Lopez did not make him a prisoner and shoot him. That would have brought the United States into the conflict, and would have promised an end to the war. Their anger at Lopez is not so much because he puts others in prison and shoots them as that he did not do the same to Mr. Washburn. This, they imagine, would have called off the attention of the world from the slow progress of the war, and would have proved the wisdom of the "triple alliance." The burden, then, of making an end of Lopez would have fallen on the United States. But Mr. Washburn got away alive, and in their anger at him for doing so they show a sanguinary spirit worthy of the Gauecho. "Hinc illæ lacrymæ."

[From the Buenos Ayres Standard, October 11. 1868.]

A WORD FOR MR. WASHBURN.

GENTLEMEN: It surely needs but a slight examination of the correspondence which is, thanks to your efforts, now placed in the hands of the public, to see how innocent Mr. Washburn is of all the ridiculous charges brought against him, whether by the outwitted Lopez, or by the partial native press; and it will be difficult for any one to lay down that "lucky volume of letters" without freely confessing the United States representative is one, in all respects, worthy of the trust confided in him by the great republic.

His position was a most difficult one; he had to please Lopez, and, as it seems, this republic as well; nevertheless, he has succeeded in steering as straight and honorable a course as was, under the circumstances, possible. It is urged his praise of the Paraguayans (see letter of July 14) was hypocritical, and that he, in thus writing, was afraid to speak what he really thought. But is this really so? were these sentiments not his real ones? We find (see letter of August 11) that he wrote in the same strain to his government. Surely, then, he was not afraid, but spoke what he felt; and, indeed, who is there that can deny the Paraguayans have fought well, nobly, and most bravely? Thus, remembering he wrote the same to Benitez on this matter as he did to Washington, the charge of hypocrisy, of acting dishonorably, must fall to the ground; and were this fact not so, still, when so many lives depended on his actions, so to speak, surely this praise would not only have been excusable, but altogether profitable. But, is it this which ruffles the spirit of the native press, or the comments on Mitre, Elizalde, Caxias, Tamandare, and a reference to the Shamokin? (in letter of August 11.) Perhaps partiality and party bitterness combined with this is the cause why all the native papers are angry with the United States minister. One thing, however, is certain: did the native press only look at the state of things with an impartial eye, it would be forced to confess Mr. Washburn's conduct is far from all blame. His conduct has been that of a gentleman, a diplomatist, and of a man not deaf to the cry for help and protection. When we consider the insults at first freely hinted, and then thickly showered upon his shoulders by the Paraguayan government—and may it not be said indirectly upon the United States as well?—one must admire his calm, courteous, and gentlemanly answers. A comparison of Benitez's letters from July 23, abounding in insults, hints of treachery, and dishonor of the United States minister, and Mr. Washburn's replies, will show a difference none the less marked than to the latter's credit.

Mr. Washburn has done well in placing this correspondence in the hands of the public, and so long as that public gives an impartial verdict, his conduct cannot fail to be approved.

It would be well did some writers and thinkers place themselves in Mr. Washburn's position if they would consider how he was placed; any fool can keep his head above water in a calm, but it is the rough sea which proves what a man is really made of, and the difficult position in which he was placed, and out of which he has sallied victorious, does credit to him and to his government. Let all remember the United States minister was the only one who dared to stick to his post, and not blame him for not causing perhaps the massacre of all the foreigners in Paraguay by an open resistance to Lopez at first; which course would not have done, could not have done any good, but might have caused much harm. Had Mr. Washburn been supported by a fleet of United States iron-clads he might have defied Lopez, but as it was with no protection but what Lopez for the moment chose to give, the case was altered.

By a cautious, honorable, and skilful diplomacy he effected as much as a man situated as he was could do. Surely he may not be blamed for not doing more than was possible. He is blamed by some for giving up his guests, but what good could have resulted from a refusal to comply? He would have to leave Paraguay sooner or later, and then could no longer protect them under the sacred folds of the American flag. Besides which, did he give them up? Rather the reverse; he counselled more than one not to leave, and left it to the choice of all to go or stay; they chose to leave; by what right could he make them remain?

In justice to Mr. Washburn, all should either read this correspondence carefully or else keep their verdict to themselves. No man has the right to judge unless he judges after an impartial, careful, and complete hearing of the evidence for and against.

Apologizing for the length of this, which may perhaps find some unoccupied column, I am, &c.,

TRABUCO.

Mr. Washburn to Mr. Seward.

No. 102.]

BUENOS AYRES, October 13, 1868.

SIR:

* * * * *

I intend to start for Rio, and thence for the United States, by the first steamer that leaves for the former place. Mr. Webb writes me that Admiral Davis is not disposed to take any action for the rescue of those two members of the United States legation at Asuncion, Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman, who were forcibly seized by the government of Paraguay as they started to accompany me to the steamer at the time of my departure. Such being the case, I shall not delay here a day longer than I can avoid.

Since I left Paraguay, there appears to have been little done to change the situation.

There was a report several days ago that Lopez had shot his brother and sister, and his bishop. It was not generally credited, however, until to-day, when I hear that information of an authentic character has been received that he has shot his two brothers, Venancio and Benigno, and his sister, the widow of General Barrios, who died some five or six weeks ago of wounds inflicted on himself in an attempt at suicide. The bishop is also said to have been shot.

If this be true, and I fear it is, there seems to be little prospect for any of those to escape who took refuge in the United States legation. The most remarkable thing in the whole dreadful tragedy is that I got away alive. I fear there will not be another such exception.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

No. 6.]

RIO DE JANEIRO, BRAZIL,

October 26, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I arrived at this port on the 20th instant, and on the 21st, in obedience to instructions, submitted your dispatch of the 2d September last, numbered 3, to Rear-Admiral Charles H. Davis, commanding the United States squadron on this station, on board the flag-ship Guerriere; and on the day following to Hon. James Watson Webb, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States at the court of Brazil, at his residence at Boa Viagem.

Mr. Webb informed me that he personally knew that no objection would be made upon the part of the government of Brazil to my passing through the blockading lines on the tributaries of the La Plata, and at my instance promised to communicate to me on the following day official assurance to that effect.

This communication I have not yet received, and I fear it may not now reach me in time to inclose a copy with this dispatch.

The admiral informed me that in consequence of the insult offered to the government of the United States, in the forcible seizure and detention of two members of the United States legation at Asuncion by order of President Lopez, he deemed it advisable to proceed with his entire squadron to the La Plata, and ascend the river with such of the vessels as are suited to that service, for the purpose of exacting such reparation from the government of Paraguay as the honor and dignity of the government of the United States may require. He requested me also to accompany him on the flag-ship, and offered to transfer his flag in the La Plata to one of the smaller vessels, and proceed with me to the headquarters of President Lopez at Villeta, to take such action as we would mutually decide upon, in anticipation of instructions from Washington.

The seizure of the two members of the United States legation at Asuncion, one of whom, Porter C. Bliss, is an American citizen, the other, George Masterman, a British subject, has been, I am informed, fully communicated to the government by Mr. Webb, and also by my predecessor, Mr. Washburn.

It was also published by Mr. Washburn, in Buenos Ayres, in the form of a letter to the Hon. William Stuart, her Britannic Majesty's minister plenipotentiary at Buenos Ayres, containing a detailed account of the unfortunate occurrences in Paraguay that preceded Mr. Washburn's departure.

A printed copy of this letter, I am informed by Mr. Webb, will accompany his communication to me on the subject of Paraguayan affairs, and will be transmitted with this, if received in time.

The correspondence between Mr. Washburn and the government of Paraguay which preceded his departure from that country I have read with as much care as its great length and the little time allowed me would permit. All that portion of it which relates to the privilege of asylum at the house of the minister, the right of the government to establish the proper place for diplomatic residence, the attempt to implicate Mr. Washburn in a conspiracy for the overthrow of the government, I believe it is no part of my official duty, under existing circumstances, to consider.

It appears that the government of Paraguay demanded of the minister of the United States the dismissal from the legation of Messrs. Bliss and Masterman, members of the legation, reported as such to the minister of foreign affairs some time previous to the demand for their delivery. Mr. Washburn declined to comply with this demand. The minister of foreign affairs insisted, denying that the individuals named were members of the United States legation, and alleging that they had been indicted for treason and conspiracy before the judicial tribunal, and that evidence to sustain the charges was in the possession of the government. I would call attention here to the fact that at a subsequent stage of the correspondence the minister of foreign affairs alleged that similar evidence against the minister of the United States was on record in the tribunal of justice, and produced certain depositions alleged to have been made by members of the conspiracy then awaiting trial or already convicted. A peremptory demand was also made upon Mr. Washburn for the surrender of a package of papers alleged to have been intrusted to him by one of the traitors. He denied in positive and explicit terms that such a package had been delivered to him, whereupon the demand of the Paraguayan government was discourteously repeated. After a correspondence of great length, much embarrassed by the painful and ingenious attempt to connect the minister of the United States with the conspiracy for the overthrow of the government, Mr. Washburn finally receives his passport, in accordance with his repeated request, and is notified that a steamer is in readiness to convey him to Villeta, where the United States steamer Wasp awaits him. The government refuses passports for Messrs. Bliss and Masterman, and arrests them in the street, while on their way to the steamer in company with the minister and his family. Mr. Washburn, after addressing a letter to President Lopez, solemnly protesting against the arrest and detention of members of his legation and other acts done in Paraguay, proceeded to Buenos Ayres, where he still remains.

These events have naturally produced great excitement in South America, and there exists, of course, much speculation, with some diversity of opinion as to the course of action proper to be taken in anticipation of instructions from the government at Washington. Mr. Webb, our minister at the court of Brazil, has frankly and with characteristic kindness expressed to me his views as to the proper course to be followed, and has informed me that in the communication which I am now hourly expecting to receive from him he will discuss the affairs of the Paraguayan mission, and inform me at length of his opinions. I thanked him for the kind interest he manifested in a subject of some embarrassment to me, and will give to his letter of advice such careful and respectful consideration as his high character and great experience deserve for it. At the same time, I am confident the department will not expect of me that I will permit myself to be deterred by the high consideration and respect entertained for Mr. Webb from proceeding at once with the admiral to the nearest proper point of approach to the capital of Paraguay, for the purpose of promptly advising the Secretary of events as they occur. I make this remark because, in consultation with Mr. Webb, he informed me that it was his opinion that I ought not under any circumstances to proceed beyond Buenos Ayres; that the United States are now in a state of war with Paraguay; that my instructions are therefore abrogated; that, having no power to make peace, I would compromise the dignity of the government by approaching Paraguayan territory. From these views I am compelled to dissent. I believe it my duty to inform the Secretary of State of all that occurs in Paraguay, and this duty I can perform properly only by proceeding up the Parana River with the squadron.

I have officially acquainted the admiral with the state of affairs as already communicated to the department, and informed him that, in the absence of instructions from Washington, diplomatic relations with the government of Paraguay will not be resumed until the two members of the legation, now held by President Lopez, are released, and such reparation made as may seem proper in view of the serious character of the offense committed against the honor and dignity of the United States.

The admiral has announced his intention of proceeding on the information communicated to him, promptly, and with all necessary firmness. He has requested that I will accompany him to Villeta, to the end that we may consult upon ulterior action, should the demand for the rendition of Bliss and Masterman be denied by the Paraguayan government. We will accordingly sail to-morrow for Montevideo with the entire squadron, and thence with such of the vessels as are adapted to river service up the Parana.

It is proper to add that the information in regard to affairs in Paraguay to be obtained in Brazil is usually of the most unreliable kind. What is asserted to-day most positively is contradicted to-morrow unequivocally. In regard to the unfortunate circumstances now claiming attention, Captain Kirkland, of the United States steamer Wasp, an officer whose course in Paraguay displayed great discretion, writes unofficially to Admiral Davis that it is important that our government should thoroughly investigate the subject before taking decisive action; that such an investigation may reveal important facts not yet made public; that President Lopez expressed to him great anxiety to preserve friendly relations with the United States, and solicited his mediation with Mr. Washburn, for the purpose of restoring a more amicable state of feeling between the government of Paraguay and the representative of the United States. It appears also that the statements positively and repeatedly made in this city that the Portuguese consul, Mr. Leite Pereira, a former refugee at the house of the United States minister at Asuncion, had been executed by President Lopez, are incorrect. The French consul, also reported as put to death, is not only alive but has left Paraguay on a French man-of-war, and reports by the admiral of the French fleet on this station that he was at no time during his stay in Paraguay disquieted on account of his personal safety. In view of these facts, I am led to indulge the hope that Messrs. Bliss and Masterman have suffered at the hands of the Paraguayan authorities no personal discomfort other than their forced detention, and that they will soon be restored to the protection of the national flag.

I have endeavored in this dispatch to touch but briefly on those matters which have already been made known to you in full, as I am informed, and to communicate such other circumstances as may help to afford you a full understanding of the existing state of affairs.

The communication I had expected to receive from Mr. Webb, conveying the assurance that the government of Brazil will interpose no obstacle to my passage through their lines, has not yet reached me.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
M. T. McMAHON.

RIO DE JANEIRO, BRAZIL,
October 27, 1868.

SIR: Shortly after the departure of the mail yesterday containing my dispatch of the 26th instant, numbered 6, I received from Hon. James Watson Webb, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary near the court of Brazil, a communication in relation to the affairs of the Paraguayan mission, a copy of which I inclose, marked A.

I had expected that this communication would contain an assurance that the government of Brazil would oppose no military obstacles to my passage up the river an assurance which I was directed in your dispatch of September last, numbered 3, to obtain.

I find in General Webb's communication no mention of this subject. I have written to him in reply, calling his attention to the omission, and adding that if it suits his view of duty I would be pleased to receive from him the information I desire in an official note before the sailing of the Guerriere. I inclose a copy of my reply, marked B.

Upon the subjects which are discussed in General Webb's communication I have no comment to make further than to remark that he did not, it appears, correctly understand my intention and desire, so far as they were communicated to him in the interview to which he refers. I will leave this point to-morrow on the flag-ship Guerriere, in company with Admiral Davis, as stated in my dispatch of yesterday. The other vessels of the squadron sailed to-day to rendezvous at Montevideo.

The latest intelligence from Paraguay represents President Lopez as occupying a strong position, strongly fortified, at Villeta, and the position of the allied forces as somewhat critical, on account of the swampy nature of the country and the great difficulty and expense of obtaining supplies. I learn also that Señor Berges, former minister of foreign affairs, alleged to have been executed for treason some months since, is still alive, and that all prisoners held for political offenses in Paraguay are treated with no unnecessary harshness.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
M. T. McMAHON.

[Extract.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Boa Viagem, October 23, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: When you did me the honor to call at this legation yesterday and intimated your intention to go up to Asuncion accompanied by Admiral Davis and the smaller vessels of the United States squadron, with a view of presenting your credentials to President Lopez and demanding the release of the members of our legation forcibly detained by him, I at once said that nothing of the kind could be done without bringing deep disgrace upon our country and rendering us the laughing stock of the world.

To this you answered, that there were so many versions of what had taken place in Paraguay, that you would not decide what to do until you reached the La Plata. I replied, "That is an error: there is but one version of the facts of the case to which you, I, or Admiral Davis can refer, or which we can receive; and that version is contained in the official report of your predecessor, the duly accredited minister of the United States to Paraguay; and indorsed by me, from my knowledge of the man and his official conduct."

I then placed in your hands for perusal my correspondence with Admiral Davis, urging him to employ the squadron under his command for the sole and only purpose it is kept here, viz: the vindication of our national honor and the protection of the commerce and lives of our people, instead of keeping it idly in this harbor when the ships of every other nationality are hastening to the scene of outrage upon us, and, through us, upon the civilized world. You proceeded to read what I placed in your hands; and when nearly through with it, handed me your official instructions from the State Department, directing you to see me, before you proceeded to the river.

After you had finished reading the correspondence, upon which no commentaries were made by either of us, you proceeded to detail your programme on arrival at the La Plata. I listened, and said I did not like to make any commentaries upon it, unless you requested me to do so; although I fully admit, that on further reflection I should have deemed it my duty to have earnestly protested against any such proceeding, and distinctly have placed before you what I considered to be your duty in the premises. You thought of addressing a letter to the admiral, setting forth your official character, &c., &c., and that you desired to present your credentials and deliver to Lopez certain very friendly messages and assurances from the President, which letter the admiral might use. I advised against any such proceeding and objected to your making any advances whatever towards Lopez; the whole matter having entirely changed since you were accredited to Paraguay. Lopez has placed himself entirely beyond the pale of civilized nations; and least of all can the United States have intercourse with him, except through the naval and military power of our country. To me your duty appears very simple; and I will proceed to give you my view of it, holding myself responsible to our common superior for so doing.

I think you should at once address an official note to Admiral Davis, stating who you are, and requiring from him the employment of the naval force under his command in rescuing the members of the United States legation, forcibly seized in violation of every principle of international law and the comity of nations. And you should particularly press upon him the gravity of the emergency, and strive to enlighten him in regard to his duty in the premises; in order that our country may, as far as practicable, be relieved from the odium of being careless in affording protection to our legations throughout the world, and unmindful of our national honor.

Do all in your power to induce him to take all his squadron, except the Guerriere, up the Paraguay, and from the deck of his flag-ship send a flag of truce into the country, demanding, without parley, the immediate surrender of Bliss and Masterman.

He (Lopez) has virtually declared war upon the United States, and neither you nor I have a right to make peace, or to decide what the offended dignity of our country demands. If he is no longer in authority, then you have nothing to do with him; while, if he is, then it is for our government to deal with him, and you and I have nothing to do but await its action. If, in the mean time, the allies should set up a government of their own in Paraguay, as by treaty they are pledged to do, most assuredly you can have nothing to do with that affair; and if recognized at all, it must be by our own government, and not by you or me; and you will do well to enlighten the admiral in regard to his duties in such a contingency, which, in all probability, is certain to occur.

Under all the circumstances of the case, then it is manifest that it is your duty to remain quietly at Buenos Ayres or Montevideo until you can receive further instructions from Mr. Seward. All your instructions, and all your messages from the President to Lopez, are cancelled by the latter's act of war against the United States. This letter to you will constitute a part of my dispatch to the Department of State, by the Mississippi, on the 26th, and, beyond all peradventure, you will be in possession of fresh instructions on or before the 1st of January next; which will be less than two months after your arrival at the river. They will come by the return steamer, or if not then by telegraph to our legation in London, and hence to the river by any one of the seven lines of steamers now sailing monthly from Europe to the La Plata, touching at Rio. My only apprehension is that if Bliss and Masterman are still alive they will have been rescued by some of the vessels of war belonging to other nationalities now in the Paraguay. That such is their intention, I know, and such intentions are not concealed in the general indignation of the public at the non-action of our squadron on this station. God grant that we may be spared that blow.

In my opinion, your course is a very simple one. You have no duties to discharge in connection with Paraguay. Lopez, by an act of war against the United States, has cancelled alike your duties and your instructions, and nothing remains for you to do but to consult the honor and dignity of your country by remaining here, or in the La Plata, until you can hear from Washington. You say it is very desirable you should meet Mr. Washburn. I think it is. He will arrive here on the 4th November, and your presence at the river is not immediately necessary.

I inclose you a copy of Mr. Washburn's official letter to the British envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary to the Argentine, and through him to the other legations in Buenos Ayres. It is a duplicate of the one sent to me by Mr. Washburn, and which I sent to Admiral Davis, indorsing its authenticity, and I furnish it to you under like circumstances.

I am, my dear general, very sincerely, your colleague and obedient servant,
J. WATSON WEBB.

RIO DE JANEIRO, October 27, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: The communication of the 23d instant, which you did me the honor to address to me, reached me last night through the courtesy of Mr. Monroe. After reciting some portions of a conversation held at your residence on the 22d instant, your excellency proceeds to advise me fully and earnestly as to the course proper to be taken by me in anticipation of instructions from Washington in regard to the late unfortunate occurrence at Asuncion.

I trust it is needless to inform you that the counsel of a colleague so distinguished for all the qualities that tend to give value to advice will receive such attentive and respectful consideration as your excellency's high character and great experience deserve for it.

Referring to the interview held at your house on the 22d instant, I ask leave to remind you that the purpose of my visit on that occasion was to lay before you, by the direction of the Secretary of State, his letter of instructions to me, which contained the following paragraph, to which I specially called your attention:

"You will, however, stop at Rio long enough to communicate with Mr. Webb, and also at Montevideo and Buenos Ayres, to communicate with the consulate and legation at those places, and to ascertain whether the military obstacles to your passage up the river, which were heretofore apprehended, have been removed."

You were good enough to assure me promptly that you knew no obstacles would be opposed by the government of Brazil to my passage up the river, and also, at my request, you promised to send me an official communication on the following day containing this assurance.

In the communication I have had the honor to receive from you no mention is made of this subject. Believing that it may have escaped your attention, I take the liberty of referring to it for the purpose of asking if it is your excellency's wish that I should rely on the verbal assurance given in the interview of the 22d instant, which will, of course, be sufficient if you should for any reason deem it unadvisable to make it the subject of an official note.

On the occasion already twice referred to, I informed your excellency that Rear-Admiral Davis had notified me that he held himself in readiness to proceed with his squadron to the La Plata, and thence with the lighter vessels of the fleet up the river, and that he invited me to accompany him on the flag-ship for purposes of mutual consultation. I informed the admiral then that I must delay for the purpose of obtaining from you the assurance in relation to the action of the government of Brazil to which I have referred, and subsequently that I was desirous of meeting Hon. Mr. Washburn, my predecessor, who your excellency informed me was daily expected to arrive from Buenos Ayres. Mr. Washburn, it appears, did not arrive on the packet of last week, and I now indulge the hope of meeting him in Buenos Ayres. I mention these things for the purpose of adding that the flag-ship will sail to-morrow for the river, and the other vessels of the fleet to-day, and that it is my intention to accompany the admiral. If, therefore, your excellency has not decided that it is unnecessary to communicate to me in an official note the assurance in regard to military obstacles to my passage up the river, may I ask that, if it suits your convenience, you will do me the favor to send it before the departure of the Guerriere. If I do not receive it I will infer that in your excellency's opinion the verbal assurance already received is all that is required to fulfill the instructions contained in the extract I have made from the letter of the Secretary of State.

Your excellency will perceive that the little time allowed me before sailing for the river will prevent my referring to the several points of interest and importance contained in your letter of the 23d instant, further than to thank you sincerely for the kind interest you manifest in a subject not free from difficulty, and in regard to which I trust that my official action may be such as to meet the approval of the government at Washington, and at the same time give no ground for the belief that the kind offices of our distinguished representative in Brazil have not been appreciated at their full value.

In conclusion, permit me to refer to one other point. From your letter of the 23d instant, to which I am replying, I learn that I created the impression on your mind in the interview of the 22d instant, that notwithstanding recent deplorable events in Paraguay, it was my intention and desire to reopen diplomatic relations with the government of President Lopez. In conveying this impression unintentionally, I had the misfortune to fail to make myself correctly understood. In calling attention to the subject now, I beg of your excellency to believe it is solely because of my anxiety to secure, as far as may be possible, the approval of your excellency's judgment.

Your colleague and obedient servant,

M. T. McMAHON,

Minister Resident of the United States at Paraguay.

His Excellency General JAMES WATSON WEBB,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary near the Court of Brazil.

Mr. Washburn to Mr. Seward.

BUENOS AYRES, October 31, 1868.

SIR: The inclosed* dispatches which were written and forwarded by me about a year ago, to the care of our late minister here, Mr. Asboth, were handed to me yesterday by Mr. Worthington, who found them among a lot of loose papers left by his predecessor. It would seem that the state of Mr. Asboth's health for several months before he died was such that he was unable to attend to any business.

I am now awaiting the arrival of Admiral Davis and Mr. McMahon. From the former I received a letter some two weeks ago, in which he informed me that he should leave for the Rio de la Plata as soon as Mr. McMahon should arrive at Rio, and as he said it would be of great advantage to them both to confer with me on the situation of affairs in Paraguay before my departure for the United States, I have awaited their arrival. I hope they will soon be here, as I am impatient to be away. The state of Mrs. Washburn's health, however, has not been such since her arrival here that it would be safe for her to venture upon the sea. I am in hopes, however, she will so far improve that we shall be able to leave in time to take the American steamer of the 26th November from Rio.

I observe that there is not entire harmony of opinion between our minister at Rio and the admiral. I regret this extremely, as the difference has arisen in regard to the proper course to be pursued respecting my difficulties in Paraguay. Both of them have written to me in the kindest terms, and have expressed a desire to do anything in their power to assist me. Mr. Webb has already done much; for I fully believe that if the Wasp had gone up the river a month later, it would have returned without me. The admiral has written that to vindicate me and my conduct from the aspersions of the press, both here and in Rio, he is disposed to send me as far as Rio in a vessel of the squadron, in case one can be spared for that service. From this I am led to suppose that he was not fully decided whether or not to send a part of the squadron to Paraguay to demand satisfaction from Lopez.

I have nothing later from Paraguay since my last dispatch. The allies seem to be moving on in their old sluggish way, but what has become of the unhappy wretches still left in the power of Lopez no one here knows anything later than I have already written in previous dispatches. Mr. Gould, the English secretary of legation, went up in a gunboat to try and get away some of the English, but he was unsuccessful. He refused to trust himself in Lopez's power, as, having been in Paraguay before, he knew the danger.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

MONTEVIDEO, URUGUAY, November 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I arrived at this post on the 3d instant, having left Rio de Janeiro on the 28th, on the United States flag-ship Guerriere.

I immediately communicated with the United States consul, in order to ascertain if the military obstacles to my passage up the river, heretofore apprehended, were removed, as far as the government of the Oriental Republic is concerned.

Deeming it advisable that any communication made to the Oriental government on this subject should be made through Mr. Worthington, United States minister accredited to the Argentine and Oriental Republics, a view in which the consul concurred, I proceeded to Buenos Ayres and submitted to Mr. Worthington your dispatch of 2d September last, numbered 3.

He immediately addressed an inquiry to the government of the Argentine Republic on the subject referred to in your dispatch, and returned with me the same night to Montevideo, where he addressed a similar communication to the Oriental government.

I learn from him that the government at Buenos Ayres has replied to his communication, requesting a few days' delay before giving a definite answer, for the purpose, I believe, of consulting with their allies. The government at Montevideo has not yet replied.

On the morning of my departure from Rio, I received from General Webb a letter, a copy of which I inclose, marked A, informing me that "the way (up the Parana) is open to the vessels of war of all nationalities, and most assuredly will not be closed against us, through whom the insult to all of the civilized governments of the world has been offered."

This communication from Mr. Webb is in reply to the letter I addressed to him on the 27th October, ultimo, a copy of which I transmitted in my dispatch of the same date to the department.

Upon receiving the required assurance from the respective governments of the Argentine and Oriental Republics, I will proceed as stated in my dispatch of the 20th October ultimo.

I had an interview with my predecessor, Mr. Washburn, on the 8th instant, at Buenos Ayres. I learned from him nothing in addition to the facts already made known to the department.

The latest intelligence from Paraguay is to the effect that Lopez is still at Villeta, where it is rumored the allies intend to attack him to-day. As to his force there is much variety of opinion; but Captain Kirkland, of the Wasp, a most reliable witness, reports to me that he saw at that point not less than twelve thousand men under arms, and this before the rear-guard of the Paraguayan army had arrived from the defenses of the Tebicuari. In conversation President Lopez informed him that he was prepared to retire from Villeta to other and interior positions if deemed advisable. It is probable, however, that he will wait to be attacked in the strong position he now occupies, and then retire in the interior.

Information, received as late as the 8th instant from the Parana, is to the effect that Bliss and Masterman are unharmed, though still retained in custody.

Since commencing this dispatch I have heard from Mr. Worthington, unofficially, to the effect that the Argentine government will give explicit and full assurance that no obstacles, military or otherwise, will be opposed to my passage up the river to my post of duty upon the part of that government.

I have reason to hope that a similar assurance, equally definite, will be promptly offered by the Oriental Republic.

Mr. Washburn has arrived from Buenos Ayres, and intends proceeding, by the steamer of the 15th instant, to the United States.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

M. T. McMAHON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

A.

Mr. Webb to Mr. McMahon.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Boa Viagem, October 27, 1863.

MY DEAR GENERAL: This government will only be too well pleased to have our squadron to go up the Paraguay; and to my certain knowledge the Emperor has expressed his astonishment at my inaction; little knowing, until he saw the Brazilian Times of the 23d, that I had discharged my whole duty in the premises. The way is open to the vessels of war of all nationalities, and most assuredly will not be closed against us, through whom the insult to all the civilized governments of the world has been offered. The only wonder of the allies and of every intelligent person in this region is, that for three weeks past our squadron has been lying in this harbor, leaving to other naval powers the vindication of our national honor, and the attempt to rescue the members of our legation forcibly detained in Paraguay.

In all probability the time for effective action is past, but whether it is or not, and although we cannot regain the prestige so wantonly thrown away, I am well pleased to learn that our squadron is about to proceed to the river, after having postponed its time of sailing nearly three weeks, to demonstrate that our minister could not expedite its movements! A demonstration so important in the opinion of Admiral Davis, that to make it he has sacrificed the prestige of our country and the vindication of the rights of its imprisoned citizens.

Very truly, your friend and obedient servant,

J. WATSON WEBB.

SIR: Your dispatch from Buenos Ayres of the 26th of September last, giving an account of events at the close of your mission in Paraguay, has been received. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Welles.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 17, 1868.

SIR: A dispatch was received yesterday from Charles A. Washburn, esq., late United States minister to Paraguay, which was written at Buenos Ayres on the 26th of September last. The dispatch shows that a controversy has been carried on for some time between him and the President of Paraguay. The merits of the controversy cannot be fully understood until a copy of the correspondence itself shall have been received, which is daily expected. Meantime Mr. Washburn's dispatch conclusively shows that the situation of all foreigners, including United States citizens at Asuncion, is greatly imperilled, and that especially Porter C. Bliss and George F. Masterman, United States citizens, lately in some way connected with the United States legation, have suffered personal violence, and have perhaps been murdered. A dispatch has been received from Mr. Webb, United States minister at Rio, in which he states that he has requested Rear-Admiral Davis, commanding the South Atlantic squadron, to send or to proceed with an adequate naval force to Asuncion, to protect American citizens. Mr. Webb is unable to inform the department whether Admiral Davis would assume the responsibility of complying with this request without special instructions from this government.

The situation thus presented seems to me so critical that I have thought it my duty to advise the President that the rear-admiral should be instructed to proceed with an adequate force at once to Paraguay, and take such measures as may be found necessary to prevent violence to the lives and property of American citizens there, and, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to demand any other prompt redress for any extreme insult or violence that may have been arbitrarily committed against the flag of the United States or their citizens.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 21, 1868.

SIR: I transmit a copy of the orders which have been issued by the Secretary of the Navy to Rear-Admiral C. H. Davis, commanding the South Atlantic squadron, occasioned by recent events in Paraguay, in connection with your predecessor and other citizens of the United States. The department has not yet received from Mr. Washburn detailed reports upon the subject. No doubt, however, you will by personal intercourse with him, and from other sources, have obtained such a knowledge of the facts as will enable you to proceed judiciously in co-operation with Admiral Davis for the purpose of vindicating the honor of this government and the rights of any citizens of the United States in Paraguay who may not be able to obtain redress through the ordinary channels. You will notice that Mr. Welles expresses confidence in your discretion. This opinion the department trusts will be justified by the firmness and wisdom of your course under the difficult circumstances which will surround you upon your entrance on your mission.

After the foregoing part of this paper was prepared, your dispatch of the 26th of October, No. 6, from Rio Janeiro, was received. Your purpose therein mentioned of proceeding with Rear-Admiral Davis up the Paraguay River to Villeta is approved. You will forbear from presenting your credentials to the President of Paraguay until a satisfactory solution of the grievances which are the subject of my several instructions shall have been obtained, and you will in every case be governed by these instructions. This will not prevent you from opening and conducting in your official character as United States minister resident to Paraguay any correspondence which shall become necessary with the President of that republic, or with any other proper party in that country. All correspondence will thus be conducted by yourself, but it will be desirable that Rear-Admiral Davis should join you in the same.

This paper is necessarily hurried in order to avail myself of the mail steamer of the 23d.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

MARTIN T. MCMAHON, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Welles to Mr. Seward.

NAVY DEPARTMENT, November 18, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herein a copy of my instructions to Rear-Admiral Davis, of the South Atlantic squadron, prepared in conformity with the request contained in your letter of the 17th instant, and the advice given by you to the President.

It has been my practice to give as specific instructions as possible to our naval officers, and to impose upon them no greater responsibilities than the occasion demands. In all cases approaching this in magnitude and importance, they have been enjoined to act in conjunction with the minister representing our country at the government in question.

I see by the last arrival that General McMahon, our lately appointed minister to Paraguay, who left the country several weeks since on his mission, has arrived at Rio, and who, it seems to me, should at least be consulted in this matter.

I have great confidence in the judgment and ability of Rear-Admiral Davis; but should he not be relieved of some degree of responsibility which belongs appropriately and peculiarly to General McMahon, by consulting with and receiving the advice of that very capable gentleman, who is intrusted with that service, and is the selected representative of this government to Paraguay?

I deem it my duty, moreover, to add in this connection that while instructions can be given without difficulty to Rear-Admiral Davis, he may find it difficult, and perhaps impossible, to execute them with his present limited command.

Asuncion is nine hundred and thirty miles from Montevideo, up rivers which are tortuous and filled with sand-bars, subject to heavy rises and great depressions, which render their navigation difficult.

Rear-Admiral Davis has no vessels adapted to river service, and not exceeding four of the smallest could, under the most favorable circumstances, reach Paraguay. He is without troops or supplies, and Lopez by the last accounts had fallen back from the river, and is wholly inaccessible to naval vessels. The demand for redress, if it cannot be enforced, ought not, it seems to me, to be made. To make the attempt and fail would be worse than if the attempt had not been made.

On a former occasion, when a demonstration was made against Paraguay, a naval force of light-draught vessels was sent out, and coal, provisions, and supplies were forwarded to Montevideo, Rosario, and Corrientes. The expedition was at that time duly prepared and cost the government several millions of dollars. As this subject seems to be intrusted to the naval officer on that station, instead of the minister, who is the selected representative, I would respectfully state that it will be necessary that Rear-Admiral Davis should be largely re-enforced, and that the Navy Department be furnished with authority and means to enable that officer, in the last resort, to carry into effect the instructions which have been sent him in pursuance of your communication, and of the advice given by you to the President.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State.

Mr. Welles to Admiral Davis.

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
November 18, 1868.

SIR: I have received from the Secretary of State a letter in relation to a controversy which has arisen between Charles H. Washburn, esq., late minister to Paraguay, and President Lopez.

In his communication the Secretary of State informs this department that—“Mr. Washburn's dispatch conclusively shows that the situation of all foreigners, including United States citizens, at Asuncion, is greatly imperilled, and that, especially, Porter C. Bliss and George F. Masterman, United States citizens, lately in some way connected with the United States legation, have suffered personal violence, and have perhaps been murdered.”

Mr. Seward further informs the department that Mr. Webb has had an interview with you, but is unable to inform the Secretary of State whether you would assume the responsibility of complying with a request which he (Mr. Webb) had made to you to send an adequate naval force to Asuncion to protect American interests, without special instructions from the State Department.

It has not been usual for the naval officers to receive instructions from that department, and I apprehend there has been some mistake in this instance; but Mr. Seward writes me that “the situation thus presented seems to me so critical that I have thought it my duty to advise the President that the rear-admiral should be instructed to proceed with an adequate force at once to Paraguay and take such measures as may be found necessary to prevent violence to the lives and property of American citizens there, and, in the exercise of a sound discretion, to demand and obtain prompt redress for any extreme insult or violence that may have been arbitrarily committed against the flag of the United States or their citizens.”

I have nothing to add to the foregoing extract, further than to direct that, on the receipt of this dispatch, you will proceed to act in conformity with the views and suggestions of the honorable Secretary of State in his advice to the President. Should you, in the discretion therein given, come to the conclusion to proceed or send to Paraguay to make the demand indicated, I regret that you have not more suitable and better vessels to enforce it, and supplies more ample than you possess.

Very respectfully,

GIDEON WELLES,
Secretary of the Navy.

Rear-Admiral CHARLES HENRY DAVIS,
Commanding South Atlantic Squadron.

BUENOS AYRES, November 21, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I have received from Mr. Worthington, United States minister resident to the Argentine and Oriental Republics, the assurance that the allied governments engaged in the war against Paraguay will oppose no obstacle to my passage up the rivers Parana and Paraguay to my post of duty, and that they have issued appropriate orders to the generals commanding their respective forces.

The communication containing this assurance, a copy of which I inclose, marked A, comes from the Argentine government, and was issued, it appears, upon consultation with the representatives of Brazil and the Oriental Republic.

I will leave for Paraguay this evening on the United States steamer Wasp accompanied by Admiral Davis. Three other vessels of the squadron passed this port to-day on their way to the Parana.

No change in the military position has taken place since my last dispatch. The allies have not yet attacked the position of President Lopez at Villeta.

MR. MINISTER: The Argentine government has solicited the assent of its allies to resolve upon the affair spoken of in the note your excellency did me the honor to address to me, dated the 10th of the current month, and I have the satisfaction to say in answer thereto, that the allied governments order the generals of their respective forces not to put any obstacles to the transit of General McMahon save that they find necessary to delay him in the interest of the war operations that may be at the point of being executed, as it was declared in the recent case of the steamer Wasp. The allied governments are persuaded that General McMahon, understanding the importance of these operations and the interests depending on them, will contribute on his part so that they do not suffer any embarrassment.

I avail myself of this opportunity to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP WASP,

Off Angostura Batteries, Paraguay, December 11, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I left Buenos Ayres on the 21st November ultimo in company with Admiral Charles H. Davis, commanding the South Atlantic squadron, who had transferred his flag to the Wasp. We passed the military lines of the allied belligerents on the 3d instant at Las Palmas and arrived the same day opposite the headquarters of President Lopez, and in front of the Paraguayan battery of Angostura. Three vessels of the squadron, the Pawnee, Quinebago, and Kansas, remained at Corrientes below the allied lines.

Immediately upon arriving the admiral communicated with President Lopez, demanding the delivery of the two men, Bliss and Masterman. His letter, a copy of which I inclose, marked A, was delivered to the President by Captain Kirkland, of the Wasp, who returned in a few hours with the information that the President requested an interview with the admiral on the beach, and also expressed a desire that I should be present at the interview. Believing that it would be more consistent with the dignity of the government that the negotiations for the delivery of Bliss and Masterman should be conducted wholly by the admiral, I declined to accompany him to the interview. Shortly after five o'clock in the afternoon the arrival of the President at the beach was signified to the ship by the dipping of the Paraguayan flag in the fort. The admiral immediately went on shore and had an interview of some hours' duration, in which it appears the President expressed the following views: That the men, Bliss and Masterman, were guilty of serious crimes, and were not members in good faith of the United States legation; that they were at that moment actually undergoing trial; that, nevertheless, the President of Paraguay, confiding in the justice of the American government, would deliver them to the authorities of the United States, thereby exercising arbitrary authority in taking them from the custody of the judicial authorities, and expected to justify their seizure in Asuncion by showing to the government of the United States that their pretended connection with its legation was merely for the purpose of shielding them from the consequences of their guilty acts; that, if he had delivered them under the terms of the admiral's letter claiming them as attached to and under the protection of the legation, he believed that it would be conceding an important point, which he denied and hoped to disprove. The admiral, although not fully concurring in this construction of his first letter, or of its effect, consented to replace it by another in different terms.

On the following day he sent the second letter, as agreed upon—a copy inclosed, marked B. He received on the same day a reply, a translation of which is inclosed, marked C. This reply of the President was not definite. He was willing to deliver the men, and confide them to the justice of the government of the United States; but he still objected to the terms.

Here the correspondence was interrupted by two Brazilian iron-clads, which came around the point about a mile below us, the leading one carrying the American flag and a flag of truce at the fore. The commanding officer notified us that he was about to open fire on the Paraguayan batteries. We accordingly dropped out of range—an example shortly afterwards followed by the Brazilian vessels. They continued their fire, however, until the following morning, the Paraguayans not replying after dark.

The next day we returned to our former position, and the admiral addressed a letter, a copy of which is inclosed, marked D, in which he stated in substance that it was not his province, nor had he authority either to offer or refuse any terms that would in any manner affect the status before the law of the men whose delivery he claimed. The same day the President replied to the effect that the men would be delivered on board the flag-ship on Tuesday, the 8th instant, at three o'clock in the afternoon, and requested that the admiral would appoint one or two officers to witness the verification of the legal process against the accused on the morning of the same day. This communication, a copy of which is inclosed, marked E, stated that the delivery was made as an act of courtesy on the part of the government of Paraguay, and as a proof of its friendship for the government of the United States and of confidence in its justice, and that he did not understand it to be in answer to a reclamation or demand.

The admiral's previous communication having sufficiently expressed that his purpose was simply to obtain the men, and that his doing so did not commit him to or against any view which the government of Paraguay might entertain or express on the subject, replied that he would be prepared to receive the men on board at the hour named, and would send two officers to verify or witness the legal declarations, as requested. (See inclosure, marked F.)

Before this reply was sent ashore we were again disturbed by the arrival of a Brazilian iron-clad flying the American flag and a flag of truce at the fore, as a notice to the Wasp, followed by a single turreted monitor. We dropped down the river out of range, and in half an hour the Brazilians did the same.

The following morning we returned and the letter was sent ashore. Later in the day an officer came on board with the information that the President was at Ivahé, a few miles above us on the river, where on the day previous he had defeated the Brazilians with heavy loss.

On the 8th instant Commander Ramsey and Lieutenant Commander Kirkland went to the headquarters of President Lopez and heard the declarations of the accused persons, Bliss and Masterman, read over to them, sworn to and signed. The officers who witnessed the transaction inform me that the declarations are voluminous, containing much irrelevant matter; that the manner of the two men while listening to their declarations and undergoing examination was different. Bliss seemed self-possessed and frequently corrected his testimony; Masterman was nervous and frightened, and when questioned by Captain Ramsey as to whether he intended to swear voluntarily to all he had heard, said, "Please don't ask me any questions."

On the 10th (yesterday) at 11 p. m. the men were sent on board the Wasp, at the same time the President sent to inquire at what time I desired to land. I replied that I would land to-day at 1 p. m.

The papers which accompanied the prisoners are sealed and addressed to you and will be transmitted by the admiral.

I trust that my course under the circumstances I have narrated in this and previous dispatches will be approved by the government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
M. T. McMAHON.

Rear-Admiral Davis to President Lopez.

UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP WASP, (4th rate,)

In front of Angostura, Paraguay, December 3, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that I have arrived in front of Angostura, having on board his excellency General M. T. McMahon, the minister of the United States to the republic of Paraguay.

As an indisputable preliminary step to the presentation by General McMahon to your excellency of his credential letter, I have to request that Messrs. Bliss and Masterman, the persons arrested and detained in Asuncion while under the protection and attached to the legation of the previous United States minister, be restored to the authority of the United States flag.

Knowing that before the occurrence of this arrest and detention it was the earnest desire of the government of the United States to continue under the existing circumstances its friendly relations with the republic of Paraguay, a desire sufficiently manifested by the prompt appointment of General McMahon, it is my hope that your excellency will hasten to remove the only obstacle which stands in the way of these relations.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

C. H. DAVIS,

Rear-Admiral Commanding the Naval Forces of the United States in the South Atlantic.

His Excellency Marshal Don FRANCISCO SOLANO LOPEZ,
President of the Republic of Paraguay.

Rear-Admiral Davis to President Lopez.

UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP WASP, (4th rate,)

In Front of Angostura, Paraguay, December 4, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to apprise your excellency of my arrival in front of the batteries of Angostura.

My object in placing myself in personal intercourse with your excellency is to request that Messrs. Bliss and Masterman, the individuals arrested and detained in Asuncion on the 10th day of September last, may be delivered into my keeping subject to the orders of the United States.

It does not belong to me to define, or even to consider, the status of these individuals. But on this subject your excellency will, I do not doubt, repose confidence in the justice and friendship of the United States, which has afforded your excellency many recent proofs of its respect and sympathy.

Any papers your excellency may be pleased to send with these individuals will be transmitted to Washington by the earliest opportunity.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

C. H. DAVIS,
Rear-Admiral Commanding Naval Forces of the United States in the South Atlantic.

HEADQUARTERS AT PIKYSRY, .
December 5, 1868.

ADMIRAL: I have the honor to inform your excellency of the receipt of the note which you have been pleased to address, under the date of yesterday, to his excellency the marshal President of the republic, by whose order I now reply to your excellency.

The Paraguayan government, always influenced by the best and most friendly sentiments towards the United States of America, would gladly avail itself of every opportunity in which, without receding from its sovereignty and its rights, it could offer fresh proofs of its constant friendship, but his excellency the President regrets that it is not in his power to accede to the delivery, on the terms of your excellency, of the accused Bliss and Masterman to the keeping of your excellency, who, if not called upon to define or even to consider, should not at least conceal from yourself the fact of their being criminals deeply committed in the affairs of a horrible conspiracy, very particularly the former.

Nevertheless, his excellency the President of the republic would cheerfully consent to the delivery of the criminals Bliss and Masterman, provided it were requested in a manner more in conformity with the fact of their being accomplices of Mr. Washburn, and the first intimately acquainted with his intrigues in the character of conspirator and agent of the enemy, of which he is now accused in the national tribunals, since they could be useful in the administration of justice by the American government, to whose judgment he would confide the above-mentioned criminals.

I avail myself of this opportunity to assure your excellency of my very distinguished consideration.

JUAN MANUEL PALACIOS,
Chief Military Secretary.

His Excellency Rear-Admiral C. H. DAVIS,
Commanding Naval Forces of U. S. in the South Atlantic.

UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP WASP, (4th rate),
In front of Angostura Paraguay, December 5, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a communication from your excellency, in reply to my communication of the 4th instant, in which your excellency expresses a willingness to deliver to the United States government, in my keeping, the accused persons, Bliss and Masterman, mentioned in the said note, but that your excellency objects to their delivery under the terms of my note.

I wish your excellency to believe that it is no part of my official duty either to offer or to refuse any terms which will affect the alleged criminal condition of the two persons in question.

The papers accompanying those two persons will sufficiently express to the government of the United States the judgment of the government of Paraguay in their cases.

I take this occasion to inform your excellency that I am accompanied by a minister accredited to the government of Paraguay, who, should no difficulties exist to prevent it, will present his credentials.

Considering this, and the friendship of the government of the United States of America for that of the republic of Paraguay, I have to ask your excellency to embark the accused persons, Bliss and Masterman, on board of this vessel, in order that I may keep them in security, subject to the disposition of the government of the United States, of whose justice and friendly sentiments your excellency can entertain no doubt.

Your excellency is aware that the present position of this vessel is one in which she should not be detained longer than is absolutely necessary.

Will your excellency, therefore, be pleased to inform me when I may expect to receive these persons on board, or to apprise me at the earliest moment that it is not your excellency's intention to send them at all, if such should be your final decision.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

C. H. DAVIS,

HEADQUARTERS AT PIKYSRY, December 6, 1868.

ADMIRAL: His excellency the marshal President of the republic directs me to reply to the communication of yesterday's date, which he has just received from your excellency, in answer to the communication of mine of the same day, written also by his excellency's command.

As to what is said of the form of your excellency's application for the embarkation of the criminals Bliss and Masterman, that it never intended either to offer or refuse terms which might affect the criminal condition of the individuals in question, but to leave it well understood that this application could not be complied with in the sense of a reclamation, but of a graceful courtesy on the part of the government of Paraguay towards that of the United States of America, if in my answer your excellency could find anything different I beg pardon.

Your excellency will now permit me to remark that I have written nothing in that communication which authorizes your excellency to believe that it has ever been the intention of his excellency the President of the republic not to deliver up the criminals Bliss and Masterman unreservedly.

I thought that I had made it distinctly apparent that his excellency regretted that it was not in his power to accede to the conditions of the first demand, but since neither a reclamation nor a demand is in question, thus strengthening my former communication, his excellency has given the necessary orders for the delivery of the criminals in a conspiracy, Bliss and Masterman, on board of your excellency's vessel, that they may be securely retained subject to the disposition of the government of the United States of America, asking permission to recommend to your excellency their entire non-intercourse with the belligerent countries in whose service the conspiracy was set on foot.

Your excellency will consider this application sufficiently justified by the actual state of the war, which has also led your excellency to request that you should not be detained longer than is essentially necessary.

In this prospect I am happy to inform your excellency that the prosecuting officers, who have received the order of his excellency, with a recommendation to be brief, expect to get through in time for the embarkation of the criminals Bliss and Masterman by 3 o'clock of the afternoon of the 8th instant, and at the same time they have expressed a wish, which they hope will be gratified, that your excellency will name one or two of your officers who can witness, on the morning of the same day, the verification of the declarations of both of the accused in the case.

His excellency the President thanks your excellency for the information that you are accompanied by a minister accredited to this republic, the presentation of whose credentials the minister will be pleased to arrange at his convenience in the customary form.

I profit by the occasion to offer to your excellency the assurance of my very distinguished consideration.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's letter of the 6th instant.

In obedience to your excellency's wishes I shall appoint two superior officers, one of them the chief of my staff, to witness the verification of the declaration of the accused, Bliss and Masterman, and I shall be ready to receive the accused on board of my flag-ship at the time appointed by your excellency.

These officers will be at your excellency's command on the morning of the 8th instant.

UNITED STATES FLAG-SHIP WASP,
Off Angostura, Paraguay, December 11, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to state that this dispatch contains only an account of the military position of the belligerents, with reliable intelligence from the theater of war on the Paraguay River up to the present date.

My dispatch of the 11th instant, numbered 11, sent by this mail, is devoted to the subject of the release of Bliss and Masterman.

The principal position of President Lopez at this time on the river is at Angostura. There he has two batteries, about three hundred yards apart, numbering in all fifteen guns, one a Whitworth gun of superior caliber, one an eight-inch gun of Paraguayan manufacture, the others old-fashioned smooth-bore guns, about 32-pounders. These batteries, the lower one especially, command a reach of the river below for about two miles. There the river turns abruptly to the left and reveals the allied position. Several iron-clads, or monitors, several gunboats, are about one or two miles below, the transports and supply ships in considerable number. The anchorage here is known as Las Palmas.

Above Lopez's position at Angostura, about six miles distant, is Villeta. Above Villeta about two miles is Ivahé. Here are several Brazilian iron-clads which ran by the batteries of Angostura with closed ports. Here also is the main body of the allied army, which crossed into the Gran Chaco at Las Palmas, proceeded up on the Chaco side and recrossed at this point into Paraguay. From Ivahé the allies advanced on Sunday, the 6th instant, into the interior, until they were decoyed into a tract of dry land, surrounded by swamps and entered by a single causeway and bridge. Here they were attacked and defeated with a loss of six thousand men and two pieces of artillery, according to the Paraguayan account, and of one thousand five hundred as conceded by the Brazilians, who also admit the loss of four general officers and many others of less rank.

The Paraguayan officers claim that their loss is almost nothing, and that the enemy were driven back to the river in confusion. The Brazilians claim that they captured four guns, and that they still hold the bridge and the causeway. It is quite certain that the battle was very disastrous to the allies, and very probable that the Paraguayan accounts are much nearer the truth. On the afternoon of the engagement the batteries in our front were dressed in flags, and there was much rejoicing in the Paraguayan camps.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
M. T. McMAHON.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[Translation.]

Deposition of the accused, George Frederick Masterman, made on the 11th of September.

Says he has resided seven years in Asuncion, where he was engaged by the government as apothecary, and continued the business till September; that he was arrested for disobedience to the orders of the commander of the city, in not giving up letters directed to Dr. Rhind, that should have passed through the post office; that he is a Protestant in religious belief.

Says the minister of the United States procured his release in September to attend his lady in her confinement, and Doctor Rhind, who is also an Englishman in the service of Paraguay, having told him that the government would not prosecute him, he remained in Mr. Washburn's family as physician, and lodged with the secretary of the legation in the second court of the house.

Believes he was imprisoned because suspected of knowing of a conspiracy in the city; that Dr. Carreras told him, when he went to live at the legation in February, at the time the enemy's iron-clads came up, that the war was nearly over, and a revolution was organizing to put an end to it and establish a more liberal government; that a committee of eminent men had been chosen to form it, but he did not say who they were, or give the plans of the new government; and he heard Carreras and Rodriguez, both of whom were in the legation, talk to Minister Washburn about the conspiracy, and he heard them say that Washburn was interested in it, and intended to act with the committee in favor of the revolution; and he had often heard the minister say that Lopez was no general, for he lost many men for want of skill and by mismanagement, and it would be well to change the government, and he was in favor of it. Says that when Dr. Carreras spoke to him of the revolution, he invited him to take part in the conspiracy, but he gave him an evasive answer, and said he thought a change of government would produce beneficial results, yet he did not wish to take an active part in the revolution.

That the minister was constantly lamenting that he could not make money in the country; only a few days previous to the deponent's arrest, speaking of the war, the minister said: "I could be of great service to Lopez by bringing about a peace with the enemy, and I would do it if only the marshal would treat me well;" and the deponent understood this to mean a good sum of money, for the minister is very covetous, and complained that the government of Paraguay had never given him anything but a few bales of native tea.

Mr. Bliss was also mixed up with the revolution, and always spoke contemptuously of Paraguay and in favor of the revolutionary movement, but deponent cannot say what part he would have taken, for he did not often converse with him, being much occupied with his scientific researches. Previous to the evacuation Bliss lived in front of the legation, and only came there in March, with Mr. Manlove, another North American who lived near the legation, and had been arrested for riding in the streets after the order of evacuation, and also another time for opening the house of Mr. Narciso Lasserre, a Frenchman, without giving notice to the police, and taking some things out of it after the evacuation. Mr. Bliss was then at the legation and passed his time in teaching Mr. Rodriguez English, rooming with him and Carreras, and in translating the notes of the minister of foreign relations into English, said notes being on the subject of asylum in the legation, and about persons engaged in the conspiracy to stop the war and form a new government for the republic.

That on the 10th instant, at eleven o'clock in the morning, before going out, Minister Washburn called Mr. Bliss aside and spoke to him for a quarter of an hour; and then told the deponent what he had said to Dr. Carreras and Rodriguez, and charged him not to say anything about it; the minister appeared excited and anxious.

All he knows about the affairs of the American legation is what Mr. Washburn told him, as follows:

That soon after the minister's visit last year to the enemy's camp, under pretext of effecting a compromise with the allies, and thus bring about peace, he told him it was all a sham, as he went to see which side would give him the most money. Caxias offered him 20,000 gold ounces, ($340,000,) but he thought Paraguay would offer more; but disappointed there, he was inclined to favor the allies; and for that purpose went to see Caxias to inform him of the situation in Paraguay, and advise him to take his forces by Encarnacion to make an attack, so as to avoid Humaita; but Caxias said he was afraid to do it without the support of the squadron. Washburn then asked him why he did not attack Humaita with his iron-clads; Caxias said he was afraid of torpedoes; the minister said he would show him how to make a machine to catch the torpedoes without risk; Caxias accepted the offer, and the minister instructed him how to make the machine. Some time afterwards the minister told him he had received a note from Caxias saying the machine was successful. The minister also expressed his surprise that troops were not sent by way of Mato Grosso, as it would produce such a fright that the city could easily be captured.

The deponent did not see the letters Caxias wrote to the minister, but the latter told him they were about the war and his promises to aid the allies; and this was why Washburn took such an active part in the business of the revolutionary committee composed of Doctor Carreras, Rodriguez, Benigno Lopez, José Berges, and Saturnino Bedoya, with Bliss and Coriolano Marques as his assistants in trying to put an end to the war and set up a new government. The minister said he always burned the letters from Caxias.

One afternoon in March, while the minister was walking in the hall of the house with the deponent and Mr. Menké, the secretary of the legation, he said to them: "Do you know there is a plot to assassinate Marshal Lopez, and end the war? Some daring men are to go to his camp with some message and then kill him, while the revolutionary flag is to be hoisted in the capital." The conversation was here interrupted, and we heard no more about the assassination conspiracy.

The deponent did not hear from Washburn directly what sum of money he was to get, but he heard him say to his wife, one night, in the parlor, that Benigno Lopez had offered him 2,000 ounces of gold, and much more in bills, for his aid in the revolution.

Besides those mentioned as engaged in the revolution, deponent says there were Mr. Menké, the secretary; Vasconcellos; Leite Pereira; Fidansa and Antonio Rebandi; whom he often heard spoken of as engaged in it.

The minister said he was in favor of making Carlos Saguier president of the republic because he was a Paraguayan; but the other foreigners were in favor of Count de Eu. On the 25th September the deposition was continued as follows:

Minister Washburn always blamed the French consul for sympathizing with the government of Paraguay, and even called him a fool when he drank to the health of Lopez; ridiculed him for quitting the city when the proclamation for evacuation was issued; said the government could not compel him to leave, and he was simple for obeying the order; and showed that he thought more of his hide (meaning his skin) than he did of the honor of the French nation; that he was a drunken beast, uneducated, and entirely disqualified to represent worthily a great nation like that of France.

NOTE.—The prosecuting attorney allowed George Masterman to write to his mother in England. The translation of the letter is as follows:

"SEPTEMBER 12, 1868.

"MY DEAR MOTHER: In my letter to you of the 8th instant, sent through Mr. Washburn, I mentioned the terrible conspiracy to destroy the government of Paraguay and its President, who by his skill and bravery in this war had defied the power of Brazil and gained a reputation unexampled in America. The conspiracy was suggested and chiefly arranged by Mr. Washburn, who was in league with the enemy. As I was living in his house I could not help hearing about it; and I am sorry I did not denounce him to the government, but I have done all I could to make up for the neglect. I have candidly confessed all I know of this terrible business; and I hope I will be pardoned by the President. I hope my life may be spared, so I may see you again.

"Your affectionate son,

"GEORGE."

On the 7th of October the examination was continued, and the deponent declared as follows:

Washburn said he hoped to save the deponent by taking him away with him; but when his passport was made out without deponent's name being included, the minister advised him to declare his innocence of all complicity in the conspiracy, and to sign no paper that he had not read, for there was no faith to be put in the tribunals of the country; and the deponent promised to do as Washburn advised him.

One day, when Washburn, Bliss, and the deponent were together in the dining-room, the former said he supposed his Congress would order his conduct to be inquired into, and he hoped the two gentlemen would give proper testimony; and then, turning to Bliss, said: "As you are living with me like a brother, and know all about my affairs, your evidence will be very important." And then Washburn proposed to Bliss to publish the work he had written on the Indians and their languages, and promised to eulogize him in the introduction he intended to write for the book, and laud him as a man of talent and capability. The three houses mentioned, belonging to Luis Tara, were rented by Charles Ulrich, a German. The deponent went to live in them with Manlove because the English engineers had taken the house where he formerly lived, and subsequently Mr. Bliss came to live with him. He did not know what Washburn had to do with the houses, but he heard Mr. Menké, the secretary, say that Ulrich had made a written agreement with Washburn to extend the protection of his flag over the houses, and it was done. As deponent was physician to the legation, where Washburn had invited him to come, with the promise to attach him formally, he was always treated as a member of the legation, in official notes, so as to prevent him from being demanded by the public authorities to answer a charge of complicity in the conspiracy. But, in reality, Mr. Washburn treated him with contempt, afterwards abused him, and finally drove him from the house. If Washburn did keep him at the legation, it was only to prevent him from being tried publicly, and then his confession would tell all about the conspiracy in which Washburn was engaged.

On the 27th or 28th September he went to Mr. Washburn's house to attend his wife in confinement, and Mr. Washburn said if he would live there he would make him surgeon of the legation, and he agreed to remain; but, so long as he was in the house, he never was treated as attaché to the legation. From the very first day Washburn treated him as meanly as a servant. One day, when talking of certain American customs, the deponent ridiculed some of them, more in jest than in earnest, and Mr. Washburn became very angry, and deponent left him to become quiet.

He called to see Mr. Washburn the next day, and said to him, "You were too angry yesterday when conversing with me to weigh your words; I hope you think differently of me to-day." To which Washburn replied, "No, I am still of the same opinion." Then deponent said, "Then I am to blame, and, having found out how sensitive you are, I will behave differently hereafter, to avoid disputes."

Soon after this Mr. Washburn went to Mr. Manlove's house and said to him, "I have treated Masterman badly, and I am sorry for it, but I cannot apologize; you must do it for me." Mr. Manlove told me that the same day.

Deponent went that evening to sup with Doctor Rhind, and told him about Washburn, saying he was so irritable a man he was sorry he went to live at his house. Rhind said, yes, Washburn was a coarse, uncivil man, but as deponent was there he had better stay. Deponent consented to stay only till he could get some situation under the government, for he had no other way to live. After this deponent was never on good terms with Washburn, but continued to live in one of the rooms of the house till November, when Washburn and his family went to live in Saturnino Bedoya's house, in Trinidad, and deponent made two professional visits per week to the family there.

About two weeks before the evacuation of the city Washburn returned from Trinidad with his family, and took up his residence at the legation. Mrs. Washburn said she hated to leave Trinidad, as she expected to remain there till ready to quit the country, but she had to leave on account of Madam Juana Carrillos. It was then that deponent left the legation and went to live with Mr. Bliss, not far off, and again in another house, in the same square. While he was there the evacuation of the city took place, and the English machinists took refuge in Mr. Washburn's house. There were eight men and their families, six women and a dozen children, in the house; and, as there was no room, he had to move elsewhere.

The next day Mr. Washburn invited him to breakfast, and introduced him to Doctor Carreras, whom he had never seen, and to Rodriguez, whom he knew only by sight. Mrs. Washburn and the four men were at table, when Mr. Washburn told his wife that one of the English machinists, with his wife, refused to live with the others because they were low and vulgar people. The deponent thought this singular, as he had lived with them, and found them to be very respectable people.

Mr. Washburn must have misunderstood what was said, for, on leaving the table, he said to deponent angrily, "So you think Benjamin Franklin ought not to have taken a seat in presence of George III," meaning to place the machinists above deponent, who replied, "On the contrary, sir, I think Franklin greater than any king in the world."

Afterwards, while walking in the garden, Washburn came up to the deponent and said angrily, "Mr. Masterman, I will bear no such remarks as you made at table;" and deponent replied, "I did not intend to offend you by my remarks." "Yes, you grumbled because I put you with the arsenal men; if you are better than they are, the sooner you leave my house the better." Deponent attempted an explanation, but the minister would not listen to him, and ordered him away. Deponent then said: "I will go, for Mr. Manlove invited me to stay with him, and I will take this opportunity to tell him you have treated me most shamefully. You have done this because I am poor and in your power; if I were in other circumstances you would not dare to treat me so."

Just then one of the machinists passed and deponent asked him if he had not treated him respectfully; and the machinist said, certainly; and then deponent began to move his baggage to the corner house.

Early the next day Manlove came to deponent and said he had rented two rooms of Ulrich, and laid out three hundred dollars for beef, pork, and fowls, and if he would pay half of it, he would give him a room where he could read at his ease. Deponent accepted the offer and did not see Washburn for fifteen days, when he was called to see Mrs. W., who was unwell.

During this time, Anabella Casal, a Paraguayan, and friend of Mrs. W., was living at the legation, and as Parodi had treated her badly when she was sick, deponent was called to visit her.

A short time afterwards Washburn came to Manlove's door, where Bliss and deponent were sitting, and said to the latter: "When I want your services I will send for you; till then you need not enter my house again." Deponent replied: "It was pity for Anabella that brought me before, and as she is not your servant, I supposed she had a right to send for whom she pleased ; however, I will do as you bid." Washburn had already engaged Parodi to attend to the sick in his family.

The next day deponent sent this note :

"Mr. Masterman presents his compliments to Mr. Washburn, and would thank him to pay the subjoined account."

The account was for one hundred and fifty dollars, more or less, for attending Basel, a servant, who had an attack of cholera, and other sick in his house. The note was sealed with wax.

Washburn sent this open note back by Scotty, his English servant :

"Mr. Washburn has the honor to inform Mr. Masterman that he wants the room he occupies, and begs he will quit it with all his things before four o'clock this afternoon ; for he can no longer bear the insolence of a vulgar, ignorant, pitiful pill pedlar ; and as to the account sent, he must inform Mr. Masterman that he owes him ten times as much."

Washburn had the brutality to read that insulting letter to three of the English machinists—Watts, Eden, and Newton—before sending it, and told them if Masterman did not instantly leave his house, he would send for the police and have him put out.

As soon as deponent got the letter, he went to Manlove to show it to him and ask him if the house was his or Washburn's. Manlove was furious on reading the letter ; said the house was his, and deponent should not be driven out ; and then went to Washburn's room, where deponent heard them talking loudly for half an hour. When Manlove came back he told deponent he could not help him and he would have to leave, for Washburn had entered into a written agreement with Ulrich to rent the corner house, and of course it belonged to the legation.

Washburn took a ride that evening on horseback, and on his return he sent for Manlove and said to him, that if Masterman left the house he would certainly be sent to jail, as he had no permit to appear in the street ; and therefore he had better stay in the house, but under the express condition to keep in his room. Deponent was obliged to accept these hard conditions, and remained in his room for two months.

Deponent next day wrote to Doctor Rhind and told him all that had happened. Rhind came to the city the next day to see the minister, who quarreled with him too, and ordered him out of his house. Then deponent told Doctor Rhind of his grievances, and begged him to speak to the Vice-President about his case, or write to Doctor Stewart and get him a situation in the general hospital as surgeon. Doctor Rhind fell sick about that time and could not attend to business.

About three weeks after, Washburn broke with Manlove about the corner house ; each claiming the property. Both were drunk at the time.

After this deponent spoke to Manlove and advised him to write to Washburn the next day and try to make up with him. Manlove did write very politely, and Washburn answered rudely and told him to leave the house ; and as he had the keys of Lasserre's house, with license to enter it, he had better go there and live.

Manlove then wrote to the minister and begged him to get permission from the police to live in Lasserre's house. Washburn said he would do no such thing. So the next day Manlove attempted to move into Lasserre's house and was arrested for it.

After this, deponent had nothing to do with Mr. Washburn, until he sent for him to see his sick daughter, who was growing worse under Parodi's treatment. On reaching the house Mr. Washburn extended his hand, but deponent refused to take it, and did not make up with him until he was summoned by the court to be tried for conspiracy. Two days after the first note, while deponent was supping with Meink and Bliss, Washburn came in and asked Bliss if he had given Masterman the notice. Deponent asked what notice ; and Washburn said deponent and Bliss were to be tried by the national government for conspiracy ; that he had not told them of it sooner, because Masterman was not well, and he thought he might die if confined in a close jail. The deponent then said he hoped Mr. Washburn would send his microscope to his sister, as a memento, if he was executed ; and Mr. Washburn said, what foolishness to be talking about microscopes when your life is in danger ! The instrument is worth four hundred patagones, or sixty pounds sterling, replied deponent, and I have had it with me half my life. The minister said he would make no such promise, for he did not know if he would get out of the country alive.

That same night Mr. Washburn asked deponent what he intended to do ; if he would leave the legation ; and deponent replied, that as he had taken no active part in the conspiracy, he would give himself up to the authorities, and Bliss ought to do so too, for there was no American vessel in the river to help them. Then turning to Bliss, he said, and what are you going to do ? Bliss said he was going to stay where he was as long as he could. Washburn then said if they would remain in the legation he would say officially that they were members of the legation, and they might be saved in that way. To this the deponent replied that as his name was not on the first list, it was too late to put it on now ; but Washburn insisted it was through mistake, and not intentionally, that his name was not put down at first as a member of the legation.

On another occasion Washburn told Bliss and deponent he would make a serious proposition to the government for them, which was that they should be kept at the legation until some American war vessel could carry them to Buenos Ayres and deliver them to the respective admirals of their nations. Both accepted the proposal at once, and promised to do as the minister told them while his word was pledged to the government to keep them in his house.

They remained fifteen days in the house under arrest, until the minister received a note from the government saying his proposition would not be accepted.

After this Washburn became reserved towards deponent and Bliss, but continued to make them believe he would try to save them by including them in his passport and thus taking them out of the country.

From that time Washburn showed great anxiety to get out of the country, and even expressed the fear that his house and papers might be suddenly examined by the police.

Deponent asked several times to send a message to the English minister, but Washburn paid no attention to his request, and Bliss was scarcely noticed by him.

Finally Mr. Washburn received his passport, and found that both Bliss and the deponent were excluded from it. He then said he would do all he could for him; that he intended to tell all of the foreign ministers in Buenos Ayres of the persecution of foreigners, and try to induce them to do something for them. As soon as he got up an excitement against Paraguay, he would go to the United States, for there was to be an election there for President in the autumn, and if General Grant, his intimate friend, was elected, the disturbances in Paraguay would certainly be settled satisfactorily, meaning those imprisoned for conspiracy would be released and satisfaction be demanded for grievances.

After detailing here all the mistreatments, slights, and insults from Washburn, in return for services willingly rendered, deponent declares, that so far from enjoying the privileges of a member of the legation, as Washburn asserts he did, he was used by him for his professional services, and treated most shamefully, as is seen in every part of this candid confession he has made in satisfaction to justice and in respect to truth.

On the 28th of November, when formally questioned and asked if he acknowledged the foregoing deposition to be his words and the signature at the bottom his handwriting, he answered and said that what he had heard read was his deposition, made before the court of justice in confession of the part he had taken in the conspiracy against the country and the supreme government. He affirms and ratifies all he has said, but makes this explanation of what he declared on the 11th of September, namely, that Caxias offered Washburn twenty thousand ounces of gold. This offer was made to Washburn before his return to this country, and while he was at Corrientes, by one of Caxias's officers, who used these terms:

"Mr. Washburn, your expenses here must be very great, living as you do with your lady and servants in a hotel all the time you stay here. You will allow us to pay your expenses; we can furnish you all you want; the empire is rich enough to place twenty thousand ounces of gold at your disposal."

This is precisely what Washburn told the deponent; and he also declares that all he has said in answer to charges against him for criminal complicity in a conspiracy against the government is true, and he affirms it to be the truth of what occurred; says the signatures at the foot of each interrogatory are his; that the names and surnames are correct, and the writing is that which he uses in all his papers and written contracts and agreements.

Another new ratification made on the 8th of December, as follows: And again appeared Mr. George F. Masterman to ratify the deposition he had made and in presence of F. M. Ramsey, commander in the American navy, W. A. Kirkland, lieutenant on the gunboat Wasp, who were sent by Rear-Admiral C. H. Davis, commander of the South Atlantic squadron of the United States navy, and before the undersigned, notary public, confirmed all he had said as the truth.

G. F. MASTERMAN.

In testimony whereof we put our hands and seals to the above instrument.

Depositions of Porter Cornelius Bliss.

[Translation.]

On the 17th September he declared as follows:

It is true he knew of the revolution and took part in it; and he proceeds to state how he was induced to engage in the infamous conspiracy.

The first time Washburn came here as minister, which was before the war, he was indifferent to Paraguay; but he soon began to hate the country because he did not succeed in getting the late President to recognize the old Hopkins claim, amounting to a large sum of money.

It was by the influence of the Hopkins Company that Washburn was first appointed minister to Paraguay; he had instructions to prosecute the Hopkins claim, and he brought Bond, the agent of the company, along with him. When Washburn found out he could get no money out of the Paraguayan government, he conceived a hate for the late President, and blamed the present marshal for influencing his father to reject the claims.

Washburn had a difficulty with the late President about a passport to visit some distant provinces, which was refused him. He then wrote to the minister of foreign relations, and tried to break off diplomatic relations, as he confessed to this deponent. This fact is mentioned to show the quarrelsome nature of Washburn, who tried to create international disturbances for so slight a cause. The passport affair was afterwards settled amicably.

About a year before the war the President requested Washburn to send to the United States and purchase for him samples of the best fire-arms and implements of war, for the purpose of equipping the national army.

Washburn undertook this commission and received several thousand dollars on account; but, under pretence of writing for his American agent, who would soon reach Buenos Ayres, as he said, he delayed the business for many months.

In January, 1865, when he left Asuncion for the United States, he took an order on Felix Eguzquiza, Paraguay consul at Buenos Ayres, for several thousand dollars, which he said his agent used in the United States to purchase the arms; and he told deponent he drew one thousand dollars over the sum spent for the arms. The arms did not come, and thus Washburn caused the government to lose a precious year, in which time the arms could have been purchased in this market. When he took leave of the President to return to the United States, he spent two hours with him and promised to do wonderful things for Paraguay; but we never heard of his promises afterwards. The President also asked him to see Candio Bareyro, the Paraguay minister in London, on his way, and make a true statement of the situation in prospect of a war with Brazil. Washburn did execute this commission, but in a very singular way; a commission for Bareyro, as minister to the United States, was given to him to deliver to its address; on the delivery, he advised Bareyro not to go to the United States, because he could do nothing there, as he knew by his official correspondence with the government. Thus advised by Washburn, Bareyro did not go on his mission.

When Washburn started home, he did not intend to return to Paraguay, but expected to get some better position, more to his taste; but President Lincoln's sudden death depriving him of that hope, he had to come back to Paraguay. Finding himself compelled to do this, he delayed as long as he could, making favor with both sides, so as to serve his designs.

When he got back to Paraguay the second time, he pretended to be very angry with the allies for detaining him, and boasted that he had to run the blockade. While encouraging the government of Paraguay, he told his friends that it would soon be destroyed by the superior forces of the allies. He often expressed contempt for the Brazilians, and said any other nation would have conquered by this time. Every day he would exclaim, "What in the devil are those Brazilians doing that they do not advance?"

During the six or eight months that he delayed down the river, he received four thousand dollars a month from Octaviano, by arrangement with Polidoro, to detain him as long as the allies desired. This agreement was with the consent of Bartolomé Mitre, then commander-in-chief of the allied armies; but as he had no funds, he was a silent partner, and let the Brazilians operate with their money.

The six or eight months that Washburn staid was just the time reckoned by the Brazilians for the conquest of Paraguay; but the series of disasters like those of the 24th of May at Roque creek, the 11th of June at Yataitycora, 18th July at Sauce, and 23d September at Curupayti, producing a necessity for a new levy of troops, and the command being given to the Marquis Caxias, all that time was lost.

Now the Emperor thought it was time to try some intrigue inside of the republic, and he justly supposed Washburn would be more useful to him within the republic; therefore he gave contradictory orders to Admiral Tamandaré: one was not to let Washburn pass under any circumstances; the other to pass him willingly, but under public protest.

Tamandaré came to see Washburn on the American steamer, and to make the protest; and it was arranged that he should go up to Paraguay by force, pretending much sympathy for Paraguay and a corresponding hatred for the allies.

As soon as Washburn reached this republic he began to talk and act to produce a compromise with the enemy, and thus put an end to the war. For this purpose he proposed to act as mediator, and said General Mitre was a perfect gentleman, and would certainly see that favorable terms were offered to Paraguay.

When Mitre was called home to attend to a rebellion in his own country, and Caxias had taken command of the allied armies, Mr. Washburn continued to labor for a compromise with the enemy, and in March he actually went to the enemy's camp to seek an interview with the commander. In his journey by boat to Pasopucú, Washburn was accompanied by Benigno Lopez, to whom he made great boasts of his offers of mediation.

During that visit Caxias made a serious impression on Mr. Washburn, showing him the important positions of the allies; while Washburn told him all about the situation of the Paraguay forces, under cover of overtures of peace, and advising him to extend his lines so as to surround the Paraguay encampment; and at the same time counselled him to send ten thousand men over the Tebicuari at Caapucu, and capture the capital in the rear. Caxias said he knew it could be done, but said it was best to advance cautiously and prepare the people who were disposed to take an active part in the revolution.

After that Washburn frequently said the situation of the national forces was desperate, and that they would soon have to give up. In this he was seconded by Mr. Cochelet, the French consul. They exaggerated the activity of the enemy, and told of railroads to be built from one point to another as if by miracles.

About a year ago, when Cochelet left the country, he took many letters and packages for persons on the La Plata river, some of them ministers, and wrote to Washburn, telling him he had spent four days conferring with prominent men about the prospects of the revolution, and there were thousands of refugees in Buenos Ayres who were ready to aid it.

Cochelet also carried letters from Washburn to Edward Hopkins, ex-American consul at Asuncion, and president of the company that had urged Washburn's appointment as minister to Paraguay, for the purpose already mentioned. Hopkins is now in Buenos Ayres operating against Paraguay, and is a great favorite with the allies. He has made a considerable fortune by contracts with the government, and commissary business with the allied armies. He owns two or three steamers which he employs as transports for the allies. His great expectation seems to be to revive the company claim against the government of Paraguay; and the allies have promised him it shall be paid when Paraguay is conquered. Hopkins, therefore, is Washburn's chief accomplice in the attempt to overthrow the government of Paraguay. Hopkins is also in correspondence with the conspirators in Asuncion, through Washburn.

Speaking of José Berge's declarations, referred to officially by the minister of foreign affairs, mentioning the interviews and conversations about the revolution, Washburn was surprised at their truthfulness, and gave utterance to this sentence:

"Berge must have a devilish good memory, or he must have taken notes at each interview, to remember everything so minutely and cite so correctly as he has done."

Deponent says when Washburn got the note from the department, asking for Berge's papers deposited with him, he tried to find a place in the house to hide them in, for he expected the house to be searched next day; but failing to find a secure place, he spent much of that night in his office alone, destroying Berge's papers and all others he expected to be called for.

He says the declarations of Benigno Lopez were mostly true, particularly that about the sum of money received, and of conversations about a change and form of government, the French consul, the interview returning from Fidanza's house; and he says the declarations of the others were substantially true.

So, whenever he received a note from the minister, he confessed its truth and acknowledged its justice, but said he was obliged to deny everything.

Among the persons sheltered at the legation, José Pereira was received on condition that he was to be given up in case a demand for him was made. When Carreras and Rodriguez, of Uruguay, were demanded, authors on the law of nations were consulted upon the right of asylum, and finding nothing in their favor, a consultation was held to determine what was to be done in their case. Washburn was inclined to refuse to deliver them up, if demanded. To settle it they told Washburn that if he would promise to remain in the country till the war was over they would stay at the legation, for the government would not force them away; but if he intended to leave they would give themselves up if demanded.

Washburn was sorry to see them leave, not only because he liked them, but because, if examined, he was afraid they would disclose some of his important state secrets.

When deponent and Masterman were demanded a second time, Washburn refused to give them up, and said he had a right to protect them, though they proposed to deliver themselves up; and he said, moreover, it was his duty to protect them, because he led them into the trouble, and if they were tried it would be found out that he was at the head of the conspiracy.

Deponent first perceived Washburn's ill will to Paraguay after his visit to the enemy's camp in March, 1867; he then saw that Washburn had sold himself, body and soul, to the allies. Not long after that visit Washburn asked him to translate a note from Caxias in reply to his offer of mediation. The note was a rejection of all negotiations for peace. Several times after Washburn would ask him the meaning of certain Portuguese words without telling him why he wanted to know; but he found out that they were in a letter from Caxias the year before, telling Washburn what to do for the benefit of the allies. The letter also expressed the satisfaction with which Caxias received the reports of Washburn's labors for him, and advised him to engage those nearest the government, as most effective and less to be suspected; though no names were mentioned, it was evident the letter referred to Benigno Lopez, José Berges, and Saturnino Bedoya.

Deponent was not certain of the existence of a conspiracy till the enemy advanced to the river, a short time before the iron-clads forced the pass of Curupayti. The news of the advance filled Washburn with joy, and he exclaimed: "Now we will soon see the end of the war, for this is only the first step of a series that is to follow!" Meaning, of course, that this was the movement he had suggested to Caxias at the time of his visit.

Caxias informed Washburn of the advance his squadron was to make on the 15th of August, and of other movements, that did not succeed on account of the disaster at Humaita.

About the same time Washburn informed deponent that the war was to be ended by a triple simultaneous movement; the squadron was to come up, a column of the allies was to cross the Tebicuari near Caapucu, and march to the capital by way of Paraguari; and finally, the conspirators were to arise. Washburn charged deponent to keep this secret, as it would compromise him if known, and said all the foreigners were to form in companies for the pretence of protecting their property, but in reality to receive the invaders and aid the revolutionists.

As the Brazilian column did not march, nor the steamers come up, Washburn was disappointed in his machinations; so he next sent to Mr. Gould, secretary of the British legation at Buenos Ayres, a plan of pacification to be proposed to the belligerents, thus hoping to attain by strategy what he could not do by force of arms, viz: to get Lopez out of his way. The negotiations lasting more than a month delayed the revolution, and it was put off till the enemy's vessels should arrive in front of the capital, or a column come in the rear by land.

This plan was also frustrated by the evacuation of the capital, and defeated the hopes of the revolutionists. National forces were sent to the Tebicuari to prevent Caxias's column from ascending by that way. Another plan was to evacuate Humaita on the 24th of June, under pretext of want of supplies, but in fact to deceive the Paraguayans, and give a chance to the revolutionists in the temporary capital of the republic. This too was defeated by a discovery of the conspirators.

Washburn received his passport on the 5th instant, and finding that deponent's and Masterman's names were not in it, and fearing his government might hear of the mean conduct of one of its ministers in the country to which he was accredited, he ordered deponent to write letters in his defense, and to prove his innocence. During that day and the next, deponent wrote three letters for that purpose; one addressed to deponent's father; another to a paper in New York; and the third to a protestant preacher in Buenos Ayres, who was a correspondent of another New York paper.

Washburn busied himself last year making up a history of Paraguay; but not having sufficient information, and wanting capacity for it, he thought proper to steal deponent's books and papers to help him out in his literary labors. This feat occurred on the 12th of September, while deponent was sick in bed, and given over by his physician.

When deponent recovered, he found himself very poor; for, during his illness, his money and everything valuable were stolen from the house, and he was compelled to accept Washburn's hospitality, and work for him to pay for it. His business was to compile historical data of Paraguay, for fifty years back, for Washburn's proposed work. Washburn particularly charged him not to take accounts of late battles from the official papers, unless he was certain of the facts; for he intended to give a mutilated history, full of his own vague fancies, and unjust criticisms. For this work Washburn agreed to give him three dollars a day, in paper money, when the atacon was worth four paper dollars, thus imposing upon him, and taking advantage of his necessities, when he knew he had no other way to live, and was compelled to serve an ungrateful man who would not listen to reason.

Here is a copy of deponent's letter to Mr. Washburn, asking for his manuscripts:

"SEPTEMBER 11, 1868.

"SIR: Now that I am out of your power, I will tell of the important part you took in the revolution, and how you inveigled me and many others into it. I have said you were the soul of the rebellion, and though I regretted to mortify you so much, how could the truth be concealed, when you continued your machinations up to such a late date? Therefore I consider myself no longer bound by the promise you forced from me yesterday in your office, not to tell anything you had done, at any time, against the government. Your big speculation with the Hopkins Company, in which you were to pocket over $100,000, has leaked out, as well as the golden pill Polidoro and Octaviano gave you to swallow, and the gold bait offered by Caxias, when you went to see him at the encampment, last year.

"The object of this letter is to ask you to give to bearer my historical manuscripts, which I engaged to write for the government, and which you took from my room while I was sick.

"As you know, they will make a voluminous history of Paraguay up to 1810; and there are also over two hundred pages of notes in Spanish, on subsequent events, and a chronology up to the present time.

"You will also have the goodness to send me the three letters you compelled me to write in your defense; one to the New York World; another to William Tell Goodfellow, in Buenos Ayres; and the third to my father, Henry Bliss, in New York.

"As the truth is now out those letters can be of no use to you, for they are false; and you need no longer wear a mask of hypocrisy; and in honor you ought to comply with this request.

"I don't ask for the English manuscripts you made me write against Paraguay, for they are your property; but I advise you not to deny what now is so plain.

"Yours, respectfully,

"PORTER C. BLISS.

"Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN,

"United States Minister Resident."

The above letter, sealed, was sent to Captain Kirkland, commander of the gunboat Wasp, to be delivered to Mr. Washburn, who was on board.

Here is the note to Captain Kirkland:

"SEPTEMBER 11, 1868.

"SIR: You will find inclosed a letter for Mr. Washburn, asking him to return some important manuscripts of mine, which he fraudulently took possession of, and some apocryphal letters he forced me to write to prove that his acts were neutral, and show he was a friend to Paraguay.

"I beg you will delay your departure till Mr. Washburn can have time to comply with this request. I take the occasion to offer you my respects.

"Yours, &c.,

"PORTER C. BLISS."

The letter to his father is as follows:

"PARAGUAY, September 11, 1868.

"MY DEAR FATHER: I consider it my duty to inform you that the letter you will receive through Mr. Washburn, dated the 5th instant, is entirely false in its contents, as it was written by order of Washburn, with a view to vindicate him from the accusations of conspirators, who gave truthful evidence before the courts. He wanted to publish the letter for his justification, when the truth of the matter is, Mr. Washburn was not only the head of the conspirators here, but has led me into it. I have sincerely repented, and now place all my hopes in Marshal Lopez's magnanimity. I have written two other letters under duress; one to the New York World, and the other to William Tell Goodfellow, of Buenos Ayres. I have not time to contradict them publicly at present.

"Do not believe in what you find in those letters; on the contrary, Washburn's conduct has been most infamous, and I hope you will make this retraction public.

"Your affectionate son,

"PORTER C. BLISS.

"HENRY BLISS."

On the 12th day of September the evidence was as follows:

The United States gunboat Wasp was sent from Montevideo, through the agency of Edward Hopkins and Baron Souza, Portuguese chargé and consul to Paraguay, under pretence of bringing Washburn and his family away from the country; but, in reality, to carry the latest news to the conspirators. For a long time previously Washburn had not received a single dispatch from his government, much less an order to leave the country. Washburn did not want to leave the country at that time, nor to send his wife away; the only business of the Wasp was to bring news to the conspirators and let them know when to organize the revolt. Caxias's opposition to the passing of the Wasp was only a pretense to conceal the real object of the voyage.

When Washburn went to San Fernando to send for the Wasp, all he did was to order the commander not to come, because he (Washburn) did not want to leave just at the time his hopes were about to be realized; consequently, when the French consul telegraphed from San Fernando that the Wasp was coming, Washburn sent word back to the commander to go down the river and return in three months, when he thought the war would be over; so when Washburn asked permission to go to San Fernando, it was not to see about the Wasp, but to make arrangements for the outbreak of the revolution.

In his note of the 12th or 13th July, in reply to one ordering refugees out of the legation, Washburn said he wanted to send his wife to Buenos Ayres for her health. This could not have been the truth, for Mrs. Washburn was then in as good health as she is now; all that Washburn wanted was to give his friend, the Marquis of Caxias, notice of the situation, for time was now passing and Washburn was tired waiting for the finale of his drama.

The only answer to this extravagant and undiplomatic request was a telegram from Benitez, in these words: "Much obliged for the request to send your lady to Buenos Ayres." Washburn saw that his designs had not escaped the penetration of the government, and he regretted having made the request.

When Washburn visited the President at San Fernando, he told him that Dr. Carreras had inherited a large fortune from an uncle in Bolivia; that he was favorable to the national cause, and could influence the Pacific republics in favor of Paraguay if Lopez would let him off. The truth of it is, Carreras was not allowed to leave, because it was known that he was implicated with Washburn in the revolution. Washburn took a great dislike to Cuverville when he first arrived, and the hate was returned with usury. Cuverville was acting French consul, and differed much from his predecessor, Cochelet, who was Washburn's bosom friend, and hated Paraguay. Washburn thought it was Cuverville who denounced him to the authorities, and told of his conspiracy to overthrow the government; and for that reason called him a scoundrel, and, another time, a beast. Deponent thinks Cuverville is a gentleman and man of honor, and that Washburn is vulgar, in every sense of the word.

At this juncture, deponent received Washburn's reply to his letter of the previous day, asking for the manuscripts left with him. The letter was in English, on a coarse piece of paper, in these words:

"UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP, September 12.

"I have nothing belonging to you in my possession. Please deliver the inclosed to Marshal Lopez, also two letters to Doctor Carreras.

"Yours, &c.,

"C. A. WASHBURN.

"P. C. B."

The deponent then continued thus: When Washburn returned from San Fernando, he said his reception by the marshal was not very gracious, and the visit was worse than useless, for it did no good for Carreras, nor for Manlove; and he was sure Cuverville had informed on him, before Benigno Lopez joined the army.

Washburn told deponent that Cuverville spoke imprudently about important affairs, such as change of government, and candidates for the presidency; which he would not have done if he had resided longer in the country, for then he would have learned to hold his tongue.

Washburn finally tried to make friends with Cuverville, though he professed to hate him so cordially. When he received the official note of the 31st of July, and which was published in the Semanario of the 1st August, was sorry that he had called Cuverville a mean, impolite, and unreliable man.

Cuverville demanded satisfaction for this abuse from Washburn, who denied using the words, though he remarked to deponent that the epithets were too mild for the Frenchman's meanness.

In the same apologetic letter he invited Cuverville to come to town and see him. He wanted to learn from him what was going on in Luque. Cuverville did come to see him, and their conferences must have been very interesting since neither deponent nor Masterman was allowed to be present.

Finding out that the conspiracy was discovered Washburn exhibited a feverish impatience to quit the country, though he had not expressed the desire to do so before. Day after day he sighed for the return of the Wasp. This uneasiness worked so much upon him that he gave up all his friends and left in the legation a quantity of boxes and trunks, without marks to identify them, belonging to persons who had no other property in the world. In two days he could have given up this property to the owners; and he knew that some of the trunks contained papers of persons implicated in the conspiracy, and if they fell into the hands of the authorities it would put him in a hornet's nest.

Here is Washburn's insulting letter to President Lopez.

"UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP,

"Near Angostura, in the Paragura River.

"SIR: As Captain Kirkland was leaving this vessel yesterday, to take leave of you, I gave him a memorandum of certain things to which I begged him to call your attention. Captain Kirkland informs me that on arriving at your headquarters he found he had forgotten to take the memorandum with him, and, of course, could not fully comply with my request, as he had only glanced at the paper. In consequence, at the moment of starting, I take the liberty to deviate from diplomatic usage and send you a private note. I suggested, in that memorandum, that I could show you a letter from General Webb, our minister at Rio, from which it would appear that he came near having a rupture with that government, because it refused to let this vessel go above the squadron. He did this on his own responsibility, without waiting for orders from the United States, which, on hearing of the outrage, would certainly have taken most energetic measures to secure its rights by force, and save the minister from a very unpleasant situation.

"That letter, which you saw, proves what truth there was in Berge's assertion that I was in connivance with General Webb, and in the interest and pay of the Brazilians. I have several letters for Doctor Carreras which I requested Captain Kirkland to deliver, but he refused unless I opened them, lest he also might be accused of favoring a treasonable correspondence. Therefore I send the letters myself, as I think there is nothing of treason in them, and I do not think any treasonable letters have ever passed through my hands, to or for anybody. In fact, I do not think there has ever been any conspiracy. The declarations of Berge and your two brothers Venancio and Benigno, implicating me in the conspiracy, are entirely false, and you know it, and you also know that they would never have made such declarations if you had not forced them to do so. You know very well that assertions of that kind will have no force outside of Paraguay. Nobody will believe a word of them, for they can be proved to be false; you ought not to kill the persons that made them, but the persons who forced them to be made.

"Before quitting Paraguay for good, it is my duty to protest against the arrest of Porter C. Bliss and George F. Masterman, members of my legation. Their arrest in the street, while going with me from the legation to the steamer, was as previous a violation of the law of nations as if they had been taken out of my house. It was not only an insult to my government, but an affront to all civilized powers, and places Paraguay outside of the family of nations, and for that act you will be looked upon as a common enemy that refuses homage to the law of nations. You will also be considered a common enemy for imprisoning all foreigners in Paraguay and putting them in irons, and then going into their houses and taking their money, under the contemptible pretext that they had not paid taxes and had robbed the treasury.

"The threat you made to Captain Kirkland on his arrival, that you would imprison me, will be duly reported to my government, and I will only repeat his reply to you, that if you did so my government would have hunted you, not only everywhere in America, but over all Europe.

"Your obedient servant,

"CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

"H. E. Marshal LOPEZ, President of Paraguay."

On the same day, 13th of September, the testimony was as follows:

The correspondence between the revolutionists and the enemy was chiefly addressed to Caxias, as he knew all the plans; but other letters were addressed to Baron Souza, and Washburn generally wrote to Hopkins.

One reason why letters were sent to Souza was, that they could pass for official dispatches between the Baron and the Portuguese consul and vice-consul in Paraguay, and they generally went under a flag of truce. Thus was the treasonable correspondence carried on without exciting suspicion. Sometimes individuals living in the country carried packages by land by Caapucu, to the enemy's advanced pickets in that region. This mode of correspondence was managed by natives in favor of the revolution, but employed by the government; in that way the communications of Berge, Benigno Lopez, and Bedoya were carried. After some of the above joined the army, Colonel Venancio Lopez sent communications to them in that way, when he was induced to join the conspirators by Washburn.

Washburn acknowledged to deponent that many of the papers he destroyed in the night of the 23d and 24th of July last belonged to José and Miguel Berge, to Saturnino Bedoya, to Benigno and Venancio Lopez, and he believes the other papers destroyed by Washburn belonged to other conspirators.

Deponent has a personal knowledge of all the correspondence from persons at the American legation with the enemy; but he can only give hearsay evidence of other correspondence through Washburn. He saw Caxias's letters to Washburn, and helped to answer them. Carreras told him of letters from Caxias to him; and of letters written to Baron Souza. Carreras was the bitter enemy of the Brazilians, and dreaded to fall into their hands. At the suggestion of Washburn, he wrote to Caxias, offering to join in the conspiracy, if the Brazilians would spare his life when they entered Asuncion; and to show his sincerity he began by giving Caxias details of the situation, and suggesting movements for the capture of the city.

Caxias not only agreed to pardon him, but promised to reward him for his services to the Brazilian cause. The part that deponent took in Washburn's correspondence with Caxias was to furnish geographical and historical information, as Washburn's ignorance and laziness incapacitated him for the task. Washburn often asked deponent how far it was from such to such a place, for instance, from Humaita to Tebicuari, &c., &c., and made inquiries about the condition of the roads and streams; and deponent answered with the map before him.

With other information communicated by Washburn to Caxias was that most of the persons that had protested against Brazil, at the beginning of the war, were now ready to aid the allies, if they were assured of success.

Washburn's firm belief was that the allies would succeed sooner by a forced movement on the capital by way of Encarnacion, and he never ceased to urge it upon Caxias. This is meant when he advised him to extend his lines to the Paraguay river, when he visited him in March, 1867. Washburn said he knew nothing of military strategy, but, from the maps, that was the most practicable plan. He also told Caxias that the people in Paraguay were tired of war, and would help him to end it, no matter in what way. Caxias did not approve of Washburn's plan, because of the disasters at Belgrano, but he promised to send ten thousand men from their post on the Parana towards Caapucu. He did send a few forces in that direction, but effected nothing by it; and of course Washburn was greatly disappointed. In ill humor at the result Washburn wrote these words to Caxias:

"The Brazilians do not deserve victory, for they have shown a pusillanimity unworthy of human beings."

He declared that a Yankee army, under similar circumstances, would have finished the war in fifteen days; that French or English soldiers would have ended it in one month; Spanish or Italians, in a couple of months; Chaco Indians or Hottentots, in three months; monkeys, in one year; but as Brazilians were fighting it, they might finish it in three years!

This letter naturally displeased Caxias, yet he apologized for his failure by saying it was only a reconnoissance he intended by the movement. His present intention was to reduce Humaita, and that he intended very soon; afterwards, with the squadron, he intended a flank movement upon the capital, and Mr. Washburn would soon have his hopes realized.

The letters written to Caxias, at this time, were from Doctor Carreras, Venancio, and Berges, and Mr. Washburn was the bearer of them, under cover to Kirkland, commander of the Wasp, telling him the package only contained a protest against his detention of the Wasp.

On the 10th of June Captain Kirkland wrote Mr. Washburn that he was ready to start for Buenos Ayres, and sent him a letter from Caxias, exhorting the revolutionists not to lose patience, for he would certainly be up the river by the 24th July, the day fixed for the surrender of Humaita.

Deponent believes Captain Kirkland did not know the nature of the correspondence that was passing through his hands.

When Washburn received the note of the 4th denying passports to deponent, Masterman, and Baltazar, a servant, he did not know what to do, for he knew as soon as he left those three men would be put in prison. Deponent knew he would report the case to his government, but he also knew Washburn was afraid to do anything there.

Two days before Washburn left he telegraphed the French and Italian consuls to come and see him; that he was about to leave, and was at their service. On the 9th these gentlemen came into town, and remained with Washburn, as his guests, till he started. Mr. Chapperon, the Italian consul, accepted the keys of the house in which Washburn lived, and promised to take care of the money and valuables deposited in the house.

The two consuls then spent a few hours in the Italian consulate writing letters to their respective governments. Washburn took charge of the letters and four or five bundles of different sizes, which deponent saw placed in his hands.

As deponent had no conversation with Washburn at the time, he does not know what he said to the consuls about the conspiracy.

Finally, deponent and Masterman left the legation with Washburn, were arrested in the street and taken to jail.

In explanation of his declaration about the signers of the protest, on the 30th August, deponent says Washburn had a list of them made out to send to Caxias, in order to show him what changes had been made in his favor.

On the 14th the deponent continued his testimony as follows:

Washburn got all the information he could, particularly from José Berges, who was then minister of foreign affairs, for the purpose of sending it to Caxias. One day, in answer to the question where the national troops would go if forced to quit the Tebicuari, Berges told him to Villeta and Angostura, as the last was the best place for a battery to keep the iron-clads from coming up the river, and Washburn immediately reported it all to Caxias. Washburn also informed him that the Paraguayan government was building houses at Tobati, with the intention of making it a point of defense.

Washburn inquired all about the military arsenal in the city; about the cannon foundry at Ibicuy; the manufacture of war munitions; about the search for nitre in different parts of the republic; and about the gunpowder factory at Velenzuela. He got this information from the English workmen at the arsenal, the foundry, and the powder factory. Deponent will not say the Englishmen knew what use Washburn was going to make of that information.

Washburn was much frightened at the intimation, in the Semanario of the 25th July, that Asuncion would be burned like Moscow, in 1812, when Napoleon I was approaching it, because he was afraid he might lose something by it, or be obliged to go out to Luque, or some other place, as a temporary residence; and he often said he would not quit the capital under any circumstances.

Washburn said if he was not then so busy with the Paraguayan government on other important points, he would make a protest against the burning of Asuncion that would make a famous echo in the world. He told the Italian and French consuls it was their duty, in the interest of their countrymen, to protest against it; and if it were done, he said he would make it appear to the world as the greatest act of barbarism committed for a century. There were not the same circumstances to justify it like the burning of Moscow, of which it would be but a puerile and ridiculous imitation.

Washburn did his best to find out the telegraphic news, asking the director, Tramfelo, constantly what was going on in front. He got no satisfactory answers from the wily official.

The last information Washburn communicated to Caxias was, that the Paraguay army was only fifteen thousand strong, including sick and wounded, and that it could not be increased, for the cradle and the grave have been robbed to fill up the ranks.

He also wrote that Lopez was afraid to trust his best men, and had actually imprisoned all the Englishmen and other foreigners, except Drs. Stuart and Esquier, from which he inferred they were dissatisfied with their situations, or were tired of the war, and would readily favor any plan to change the administration or put an end to the war.

Washburn often sent numbers of the Semanario and the Cabichui to Caxias, particularly those containing reports of political meetings, and engravings, and sarcastic articles about Caxias. He wrote thus:

"I send you some witty papers for your amusement and to show you how a great general of the allies is treated by the papers in Paraguay."

He also said of the patriotic speeches that appeared in the Semanario that they were got up for the occasion by professional orators, and did not express the sentiments of the people. Dr. Boca, for instance, had written more than five hundred speeches for such occasions, and they were all just as like as coins from the same mold, and the same soup was served every Saturday from the Semanario, viz: praise of Lopez. Its columns were devoted to the praise of the government, and nothing could be discussed if not in laudation of Lopez.

In fact, Washburn ridiculed the government to all his correspondents.

On the 15th the evidence was as follows: Deponent confesses having signed a document, with ten others, at Berges's house at Salinares, to concert with the commanders of the allied armies to bring about a revolution against the national government. He acted as secretary to the meeting and drew up the secret pact sworn to by the conspirators present to take Lopez's life. The persons that assisted him in drawing up this document were José Berges, Benigno Lopez, and Antonio Carreras. The document was engrossed in a fine, clerkly hand, and to the best of his recollection was as follows:

"We, the undersigned, citizens of the republic of Paraguay, and strangers residing therein, having good reasons for desiring a prompt termination of this long and bloody war that is ruining the country and destroying the male inhabitants, and believing it necessary to select competent persons to bring about a radical change in the system of government by putting out of the way the only obstacle to the accomplishment of this, and having the consent of the allied enemy, we bind ourselves mutually to work together to effect a change of government and choose a new chief magistrate, and if it is found necessary to resort to violence to rid ourselves of the President of the republic, we also obligate ourselves to do so, after trying other means to effect the same end. We swear by our word of honor upon the holy evangels, to aid each other in whatever is agreed on by the majority of the signers, to realize the design already expressed, and to keep the secret of this conspiracy upon the pain of death. In faith whereof we have signed this pact in each other's presence. Dated at Salinares, November, 1867, (about the middle of the month he thinks.) Signed by Benigno Lopez, José Berges, Saturnino Bedoya, Antonio Carreras, Francisco Rodriguez Sarreta, José Maria Leite Pereira, Antonio Vasconcellos, Simone Fidanza, M. Libertat, Domingo Ponié, Porter Cornelius Bliss."

Manlove did not come in time to sign.

After the signing of the above document, another was drawn up as a constitution for the country after the first project was executed. It was signed early in December by Carreras, Rodriguez, and deponent, at the house of Benigno Lopez, in Asuncion. Conferences were held at the house of Carreras in Trinidad, at Berges's office, and several other places, before it was finally adopted.

Deponent drew up another paper on police regulations, which was agreed to by his accomplices, but it was not signed by them. It was left with Washburn for safe keeping, or to be destroyed in case of danger. These are the only documents the deponent drew up and signed, but he heard of another made out by the revolutionary committee and signed by Berges, Bedoya, Benigno, Carreras, and Rodriguez, before the other papers mentioned.

All the deponent heard about a previous plan to assassinate Lopez, he got from Carreras and Martinez, an Argentine colonel who lived in Paraguay. The Saa committee, composed of Martinez, Costa, Lucero, and Guaicochea, was sent from Bolivia to offer their services to Paraguay; but failing in that, they conceived the idea of murdering Lopez, so as to gain the good will of the Argentine government, and thus open a new field to their adventures.

On speaking of the assassination conspiracy to Washburn he pretended not to believe it, and said if any one could be hired to do the act, it would be that Argentine butcher Mendocino—for that's the epithet he applied to that leader—or Coriolanus Marquez.

In his replies to official notes from the department of foreign affairs, Washburn often said that he had received no letters by the Wasp, except for Vasconcellos. This was not true, for deponent knows he received letters for Berges and Venancio Lopez from Caxias; and when asked by deponent why he made the misstatement, he said he was not under oath before a court to tell the truth.

That letter of Caxias contained a proclamation to be used when the insurrection should take place, urging the people to put down Lopez, the plague of the country, and welcome the allies that would insure them peace and prosperity.

Washburn took the package from Caxias to Vasconcellos himself, and when opened it was found to contain a letter for Carreras, which Washburn also delivered in person. Deponent does not know what that letter was about; nor does he know what the one to Venancio Lopez contained.

For his services in the conspiracy deponent got 5,000 patacones from Benigno Lopez, at one time, and on three other occasions $5,500 in paper money, which he thought came out of Lopez's private property, but found it came from the national treasury, which was the banking house for the conspiracy. Deponent learned this from Washburn, who had received large sums of money on account from the same source. This was found out after the evacuation of the city. Washburn also told him that Carreras and Rodriguez had received money for their co-operation in the contemplated conspiracy.

All the money received by deponent (except $800, his expenses up to the time of his imprisonment) was deposited with Washburn, to be taken to Buenos Ayres and deposited in Mana's bank there, subject to deponent's order.

Washburn acknowledged to deponent that he had received large sums of money from Benigno Lopez to pay the conspirators. Deponent saw two women carrying the money in covered baskets on their heads to the legation more than once. All this money, with much more belonging to Carreras, Rodriguez, and others, was carried away by Washburn to be deposited for the owners in Buenos Ayres.

On the 16th the testimony given was this:

Deponent heard of the surrender of Humaita from Washburn, who had a letter from Caxias, dated the 10th of June, informing him that the surrender was agreed upon for the last of July with the chief officers, Francisco Martinez, and Remigio Cabral, called admiral of the Paraguay navy. Deponent thinks a letter came at the same time from Caxias to José Berges, announcing the same event.

On the 19th deponent continued his statement thus:

He often heard Washburn say that Vicente Barrios was the worst man in the republic, and that he was longing to get into the President's boots—meaning to take his place in command—and if he were put out of the way by a ball, or in any other manner, Barrios would certainly assume the supreme command. Francisco Rodriguez Larreta used to speak in the same way of Barrios, but said it would be much worse for the people if he got into power.

In September or October, when it was reported in the capital that General Brugges, Commander Marco, and another officer were shot, Washburn attributed the arrest of his German friend, Emil Neumann, to his circulation of the report, and said it would be nice if Neumann turned out to be a prophet, and Brugges was proved to have belonged to the conspiracy. The French consul, Crochelet, was the first to circulate the rumor. When Gumesindo Benitez came to Washburn, on the 26th July, to get a package for Berges, Washburn said he was confused, and evidently did not understand the part he was to play; for he spoke rapidly in a low tone, with his eyes fixed on the ground, and his continued assertion was—we know everything. Washburn also said his friend Gumesindo was no more secure in his shoes than Berges was, but he forgave him the trouble he had given him for the last month, seeing he was forced to act as he did. He said Fernandez was the best man for the war department, because he had made his pile while managing Lopez's private property; and when an opportunity offered, he would act cordially with the revolutionists.

Deponent corrects his statement that he only heard of the treasury money after the evacuation; he now remembers that he heard of it in October. About his own connection with the conspiracy, he says: Early in October, after a hard spell of sickness, while he was working for Washburn at a low salary, he was sent for by Berges, who was then minister of foreign relations. Berges pretended much friendship for him and said he was sorry for him, and regretted that his work on national history had been interrupted for a year, and that he had received nothing from the national treasury for his labor; and he wanted him to resume the work. Deponent asked if this was from Lopez. Berges said no, but he had the power to make the proposal, and to pay for it out of the treasury; and added: "Go to the treasury now, and I will send an order to pay you $300 down." Deponent then went to the treasury, where he met Saturnino Bedoya with a paper in his hand, which he gave to Felipe Milleres, saying: "Draw up a receipt for $3,000 in favor of Cornelius Bliss." Milleres looked at the order, and said: "This is for $300, and not for $3,000!" "True," said Bedoya, looking at the paper again, "it is only $300, but it might as well have been for $3,000." Then Bedoya asked: "To whose account must it be placed?" "To the account of the department, of course," replied Berges. Then deponent said: "Let it be stated in the receipt that the money is for literary labors."

Some days afterwards, speaking to Washburn about this, the latter said he was very long finding out what character of persons Berges and Bedoya were; deponent ought to know that all the money in the treasury was at their disposal, but for peculiar services, different from those deponent had previously rendered. Washburn then advised deponent to see Berges again. This was done, and deponent entered personally into the schemes of the conspirators.

Speaking of the arrests, Washburn said Lopez would gain nothing by them, for Fernandez was commander in the city, Gumesindo Benitez and Bernardo Ortollado at Luque, and affairs would yet be well for the revolutionists, particularly if Caxias made the contemplated movement. He did not mean to say that the Vice-President was concerned in the conspiracy, for he was a nothing, a mere cipher at the left of a figure, as he expressed it. When the Wasp arrived the second time, about the end of August, Washburn said if it brought any letters for Caminos he would not deliver them, because the government had complained of him as bearer of treasonable correspondence to public officials.

In November, 1865, when Washburn passed through the enemy's squadron on his way to Paraguay, he learned that a counter-revolution was preparing at Asuncion, and when he arrived there he found it to be true.

About the last of August, while deponent was at the American legation, a servant girl, named Lubia Rivas, said to Mrs. Pereyra that the soldiers guarding the legation had said that the bishop advised the President to treat with the enemy, because much blood had been shed, and the people were tired of war; and Mrs. Pereyra told this to Washburn, Masternan, and deponent.

Washburn used to say the bishop was a man well versed in all sorts of intrigue; that he made money by selling the secrets of the confessional; called him a spy and detective; and was the worst adviser the President could have in this war.

On the 4th of October the examination continued as follows:

When Fidanza asked deponent about Cuverville, the French consul, he said he had broken with the government, on account of the imprisonment of so many French subjects, and he and the Italian consul had written to their governments on the subject. To which Fidanza replied, "I have much confidence in Washburn."

When Berges heard of Washburn's departure, he said to deponent, "So Washburn is gone! Was he in a good humor?" Deponent said he thought not. "Well," added Berges, "What can we expect from him?" Deponent replied, "Washburn says he will move heaven and earth to bring an American fleet down here, but I don't believe he can; for his complicity in the revolution is well known abroad." "And what did he do with the papers?" asked Berges; "Burned them," replied deponent. "And did he destroy those of Benigno and Venancio?" "Yes," was deponent's reply. When deponent asked Berges about Bedoya, Rodriguez and Vasconcellos, he said he knew nothing about them.

Deponent says he knew nothing in Washburn's letter to Caxias, but he knew what was in Caxias's letters to Washburn, because he translated them from the Portuguese. Some were intended for circulation among the conspirators, while others were marked, Very private; intended for Washburn alone, as Caxias seemed to have great confidence in him. The reason Washburn did not show those letters to any of the Paraguayans was because they contained information of the ultimate plans of Brazil and the Argentine government, in respect to Paraguay, that would not be very pleasant to them.

By letter, dated in March, soon after the assassination of Flores and the inauguration of the new Oriental administration, Caxias told Washburn that neither Brazil nor the Argentine government were satisfied with affairs at Montevideo, and that country would be allowed no part in the treaties, after the war. In other letters Caxias spoke in the same manner of the Oriental Republic, and said affairs would be settled between Brazil and the Argentine Republic by agent at Rio. He mentioned José Marmol as one of his agents.

Speaking of the conspirators, and mentioning by name the two brothers and brothers-in-law of the marshal, Caxias said, it was well enough to use such persons in the revolution; but after the war not one of the Lopez family would be allowed to remain in the country; and Washburn had better not unite his interests with theirs, because they were mere puppets worked by strings from Brazil.

Edward Hopkins used about the same language in his letters to Washburn, and added, in one of his last, that a new secret treaty had just been signed at Rio Janeiro between Brazil and the Argentine Republic, leaving the Oriental Republic out of the question. It explained the treaty of the 1st of May; said the war had been different from what was anticipated, and new questions had arisen with other South American powers. Hopkins said he learned this from his intimate friend Doctor José Benjamin Gorostiaga, a person of great influence with Mitre.

The treaty seemed to have had this foundation: The Imperial and Argentine governments considered themselves released from all obligations to the Oriental government by the murder of Flores, and when the war was over they intended to divide not only Paraguay and the Bolivian plains among each other, but take possession of Uruguay, and use the Paraguay army as they pleased for territorial extension.

The Oriental Republic was to be divided into two portions, by the Rio Negro. The Argentine Republic was to have Montevideo and all the territory south of the Rio Negro, and Brazil was to have the rich departments of Paisandu, Salto, and Tacuarembó, north of that river and bordering on Lake Merin. For this liberal grant of land from Brazil the Argentine Republic was to give up its rights and claims to the missions between the Parana and the Uruguay, and Brazil was thus to form a new province to be called Uruguayana, with the capital of that name, or the town of Salto Oriental. As to the Chaco, the Argentine Republic was to give all of it north of the Pilcomayo to Brazil, so as to extend its possessions towards Bolivia, against which republic war was soon to be declared, so as to give the Argentine Republic a chance to recover its old province of Tarija, and Brazil to seize the Chiquito and Mayo missions, which it had so long coveted, using as a pretext that Bolivia violated neutrality in the Paraguay war by sending the army arms and munitions. In reference to the treaty of May 1, 1865, securing independence to Paraguay for five years, it would expire in 1870, and then the country could be divided. Before that, however, a kind of government was to be formed of Paraguayans now out of the country, and not one member of the Lopez family, nor any of its allies, were to take any part in it.

The two most important personages in this plan are Candido Barsyra and Carlos Saguier. The latter has made good use of his money by educating young men of Paraguay in Europe. He is Washburn's favorite for next President.

The new government being established, negotiations for paying the immense war debt were to be entered into, and it was to join the allies in a war against Bolivia, and furnish 95,000 men of all arms for that purpose—the whole of the Paraguay army, as Caxias supposed. These troops were to be dispersed among the Brazilian regiments so that they could not revolt. The superior officers were to be Brazilians; only subordinates would be allowed to retain their places.

In the division of territory all that part of the republic north of the Xpane River was to go to Brazil, and all south of the Tebicuari was to belong to the Argentine Republic. This division was to be made after the 1st of May, 1870, till which time the republic was to remain independent, within the limits fixed by the secret treaty of the "triple alliance."

At no definite time after this another quarrel was to be picked with the new government of Paraguay, and the remainder of the republic was to be divided between Brazil and the Argentine Republic; Brazil taking the portion north of the river Caañabé, which empties into the Paraguay between the departments of Villeta and Villa Oliva, near Angostura, and the Argentine Republic all south of that river.

The excuse for this wholesale confiscation of a republic was to pay the expenses of the war. Caxias said the same in his correspondence with Washburn. He said if Paraguay was put up and sold at auction it would not bring half enough to pay the expenses of the war; and, moreover, the territory would be a sort of compensation for the loss of all that portion of Brazil north of the Amazon and adjoining French Guiana, which was about to be ceded to France in liquidation of a mortgage to that country.

On the 5th of October the evidence was continued thus:

When the Wasp came up the last time to take Washburn away, it brought him a letter from Caxias, informing him that the subterranean telegraph had brought news of the arrest of some of the conspirators, but it was nothing, as conspirators were to be found, not only among civilians, but even in the army. He was sorry so many foreigners had been imprisoned, but it would only be an additional inducement for him to hurry to their assistance. He was convinced that the war would soon be over, because many of the officers who appeared loyal before the capture of Humaita were now ready to change sides, and some fine morning Lopez would wake up and find himself alone in his camp.

After the reception of this letter, and while preparing to leave, Washburn studied the map of the country between the Tebicuari and Cañabé or Paray to get an idea that might be useful to Caxias in his military operations.

Washburn was anxious to see Lopez's escape to the mountains cut off, for if he got in the hills the war might last many years longer. He said he did not know much about military affairs, but he was sure his opinion would be worth more than that of any Brazilian general, and for that reason he was anxious to see Caxias and give him a piece of his mind on that important maneuver.

It was Washburn's intention, on reaching Buenos Ayres, to call a meeting of the foreign ministers, (English, French, Prussian, Italian, and Portuguese,) as their dean from his long residence in Paraguay, not taking into consideration that he was no longer de jure nor de facto minister to Paraguay after receiving his passport, and he was to tell them of the outrages and indignities that had been heaped upon him by the government of Paraguay, and of the imprisonment of foreigners, countrymen of the ministers, whom he entitled his colleagues.

He thought by this to get a protest, signed by the whole diplomatic corps in Buenos Ayres, against the Paraguayan government, and use it, like Archimedes, as a lever to move the world against Lopez.

He placed much confidence in the help of Mr. Noel, the new French minister in Buenos Ayres, because he was a friend of Cochelet, the late French consul at Asuncion, and would share his hate for Paraguay and its government; and, besides, Mr. Noel has been employed in the South American branch of the Foreign Office, and would know all about the country and its bad governments. Now, Washburn thought to get Mr. Noel to write to Cochelet, consul in Gibraltar, to go direct to Paris and influence the French government in favor of a change of administration in Paraguay; and he intended to print his correspondence with the Paraguay government, in pamphlet form, with annotations, in Buenos Ayres, to circulate and serve, as he expressed it, as an instrument of warfare. He had no hope of the British government doing anything, for ever since the Castano affair it had little to do with Paraguay, and would not interfere now, unless for the protection of two or three British subjects. As to his own government, the North American, Washburn, as has been stated, would do all he could to induce it to demand satisfaction for insults he had received; but he could not have much hope of success in that, for these reasons:

When the Wasp arrived in Paraguay waters the commander sent word to Washburn that he had a package of dispatches for him from Washington. Washburn wrote to him to keep the dispatches till he came on board. Now these dispatches might have contained important instructions to be carried out before Washburn left the country; but he was afraid his government would disapprove of his refusing to obey the order of evacuation, or of his protecting James Manlove, an American citizen, as a member of the legation.

In one of his letters to Washburn, Caxias told him that public opinion in Europe was prepared to consent to the extinction of Paraguay; for the agents of the allies there had purchased silence from the few Paraguay agents and other influential persons on that side, mentioning Baron du Graty, Paraguay minister to Prussia; Chevalier Von Gulich, ex-Prussian minister to Paraguay; and Carlos Calvo, representative of Paraguay at London and Paris, at different times. Caxias also declared there was not a Paraguayan on the Plata who was not ready to welcome a new order of things in the Republic, and, besides others well known, he mentioned Eguzquiza, Brizuela, José Caminos, and his son Felix.

Mr. Cuverville, the French consul, told deponent his feelings towards the Paraguay government had changed from friendship to bitter enmity, and he now favored Washburn's plans, and had written to his government to that effect, as well as the Italian consul, and the letters were sent out of the country by Washburn.

The fact that Fidanza and Libertat lived a long time with those consuls, and their intimacy with Domingo Ponié and other notorious conspirators, show that they must have known of the conspiracy for a long time.

After the conspiracy to assassinate Lopez was made known in the Semanario, Washburn said no person was so proper to execute that horrid deed as General Barrios, and that seemed to have been the opinion of every one of the revolutionary committee. Anybody could plan a murder, and many might approve of it; but to execute it a person of high rank, like General Barrios, was required; for he could then put himself at the head of the army and get off safe. And then Washburn quoted the words of Jesus Christ, "A man's enemies are in his own house," and of the Psalmist, speaking of Ahi-thophel, of whom he complained, saying: "My familiar friend, in whom I have trusted, and who has eaten with me the bread of my own table, is the one who has raised his hand against me;" applying all this to General Barrios.

At that time Washburn was reading the works of Nicolo Machiavelli, who was a great man, and whose principles were not appreciated by moderns, as he said; and he called deponent's attention to that chapter on conspiracies, where these words are found:

"Those who plan conspiracies or revolutions are not persons outside of the government circle, for only such persons as are acquainted with government affairs can execute such plans; and they are generally persons who have received great injuries or great favors from the government, and who are in positions proper to that end."

On the 7th October the declaration was as follows:

Washburn, knowing deponent would be tried for conspiracy when once out of the legation, and his complicity would be discovered, often told him how to answer interrogatories put to him by the court. In the first place he told him to insist upon his rights and privileges as a member of the American legation, and to deny the jurisdiction of any court not subject to the American government. That failing, he was to plead the incompetency of the court, whether civil, military, or ecclesiastical. Deponent was to refuse to take an oath, or sign any paper; or if forced to do so, he should insist on the privilege of signing every page, for fear of forgery: such were Washburn's suspicions of the justice of Paraguay courts.

When Washburn expressed a fear of being called to account by the American Congress, through an investigating committee, "with power to call for persons and papers," he told deponent and Masterman they would be important witnesses, and they must testify in his favor, as it would be to their interests also; thus attempting to suborn them to perjury.

Besides this hint at pay for perjury, Washburn promised deponent a good place in the American government; and offered to write a flattering introduction to his history of Paraguay, which he had once refused to do when requested, though an act of mere justice; and this was part pay for perjury.

At the time of the evacuation of the capital, deponent, Masterman, and Manlove were living in Ulrich's houses; and to prevent the three persons from leaving, Washburn extended the protection of the legation over those houses by pretending to rent them from Ulrich, who gave him a receipt to that effect. The receipt was false, as no money had passed between them; and what Washburn said about it was not so. Washburn's only object in doing this was to be able to say that deponent, Manlove, and Masterman were living in the legation; and this false assertion he made very frequent use of in his correspondence with the government authorities.

On the 19th October the declaration was as follows:

It is certain there was a secret provisional treaty between the allies and the Paraguay conspirators, signed in December by the American minister, Washburn, for the allies; by Doctor Antonio Carreras, for the Oriental government; and by Benigno Lopez, José Berges, and Saturnino Bedoya, on the part of the Paraguay conspirators. Deponent did not see this treaty, because he was not then on good terms with Washburn, having quarreled with him on account of pay for work done; and the estrangement lasted six weeks. After making up with Washburn, who was then living at Trinidad, in a house belonging to Madam Bedoya, deponent learned from him the terms of the treaty, about as follows: It promised success to the revolution; offered amnesty to all who had supported Lopez; gave the signers of the treaty the power to form a new government; insured the independence of Paraguay, within the limits fixed by the treaty of the 1st of May, 1865; promised to support the government for one year, and for a longer period on condition of paying the expenses of the war, estimated at 150,000,000 of patacones, (which Washburn considered very reasonable,) all to be secured by mortgage on public lands and maté groves; abolition of the yerva (native tea) monopoly, and tobacco monopoly; liberty of worship; establishment of three departments of government; regulation of taxes and the tariff; and a provision for making the treaty permanent.

Deponent has said nothing about this secret treaty previously, for the following reasons: First. Because he knew nothing of it, except from hearsay, on account of his quarrel with Washburn. Second. Hearing of the dishonesty of the allies, and of the double alliance, he considered the treaty a fiction that would never amount to anything. Third. For regard for Doctor Carreras and the other signers, who confessed their other misdeeds, but said nothing of this. Fourth. Because he considered the acceptance of such powers by Washburn as the darkest stain upon his character, as a minister of a neutral power, of which he is a bastard specimen, and he wished to keep secret this, the most infamous of Washburn's many crimes, till he could make the most of it. Fifth. Because he intended to inform Washburn's government of his conduct, if he ever got back to the United States, and he wished to nurse his wrath for consummate revenge.

Deponent thinks the treaty was signed at the country seat at Trinidad, in duplicate, one copy being sent to Caxias and the other kept by Washburn till he destroyed it on the night of the 23d-24th July, as already stated.

Deponent thinks Washburn had full powers from the Brazilian and Argentine governments, and Dr. Carreras had powers from the Oriental Republic, and a consulting vote for the Argentine government. Deponent is sure that Benigno Lopez gave Washburn, when he visited Caxias in March, 1867, a paper with pencil marks of the plan of operations to be pursued against Paraguay, which Washburn took to Caxias and explained to him, but which he could not execute for want of troops. During this visit Washburn also corrected a plan of the Paraguay encampment, drawn by a Polish engineer in the employ of the allies; he also brought back a letter from Caxias to Benigno Lopez, containing plans for the future adjustment of peace, which were identical with those in the secret treaty made afterwards.

Although deponent confesses to have taken part in some of the schemes of the revolution, he was shocked to see Washburn accept powers from Brazil, and did not hesitate to tell him how disgraceful it was, and what a shame it was to his government. Washburn's reply was, he had done it as a private individual, and not as American minister. To which deponent answered: "And when the devil gets the soul of the private individual, where will the minister's soul be?" Washburn could find no fit replication to this, and he kept silent.

Carreras told deponent he was one of the signers of the treaty, but he had not much confidence in the allies or anything they said.

Deponent had some conversation with Mr. Libertat, chancellor of the French consulate, but never visited him at his house. Libertat was one of the eleven signers to the secret pact of Salinares, and deponent has talked to him in general terms about the revolution, but cannot remember what was said.

On the 4th November the deposition was as follows: Washburn told deponent that at the time of his arrival at Rio Janeiro, in 1865, the leaders of the imperial government there made no secret of their intentions, in case of success in the war against Paraguay. He said Paranhos, Saraiva, Octaviano, Zacarias, and even the Emperor, confessed the intention to annex all the territory on the left banks of the Plata, Parana, and Paraguay rivers to Brazil.

Washburn believes another war will break out, after the conclusion of the present one, between the Argentine Republic and Brazil, about the division of spoils; and he expressed as much in his note to Caxias, in reply to the one mentioning the secret treaty.

Washburn's words were about as follows:

"Alliances or offensive coalitions between three or more powers are generally ephemeral and transitory, as seen in the many coalitions of William III of England against Louis XIV of France, and the no less numerous ones against Napoleon I, hardly one of which lasted more than a year. It is strange, and almost a miracle, that the present "triple alliance" has lasted over three years, and that apparent cordiality still exists among the contracting powers. You inform me how things are going on in relation to the Oriental Republic, and I need no hints to conceive the secret intentions of Brazil in reference to the Argentine Republic. Your excellency may rest assured that, whatever may happen, my gratitude to the imperial government for its confidence and distinguished favors (alluding to the full powers he had received) will be reasons sufficient to make me wish it all possible success, and give it all the advantages of my official position."

The Emperor Napoleon III has a mortgage on that vast region of Brazil north of the Amazon, and has done all he could to get a prince of his house on a throne of South America. His original idea was to extend his colony of Cayenne by annexing to it British and Dutch Guiana, to be acquired by purchase, and then add the Brazilian territory mentioned, so as to form an empire or kingdom almost as large as Mexico. In case Brazil chose to pay off the mortgage, he proposed to erect a kingdom on the Plata, containing all the territory east of the Plata, Paraguay and Parana rivers, or composed of Paraguay, Mato Grosso, and Eastern Bolivia; and as inducement, he proposed to marry the new monarch to a princess of the house of Braganza.

This proposition did not meet with much favor in Brazil because the nobility there preferred annexing the conquered territory to Brazil; or in case of a new empire, they wanted one of their own princes or princesses to occupy the throne, proposing the Count d'Eu, or the Duke of Sax, with his wife, the second daughter of the house of Brazil.

In his conferences with the statesmen above mentioned, Washburn rejected the French proposition, on account of the Monroe doctrine professed by the North American government, not to permit the erection of any throne on the American continent, or at least no throne for a European prince. For the same reason he opposed the founding of a throne for a prince of Brazil, because Napoleon would not allow any of the Bourbon family on a new throne in Europe.

The dominant idea at Rio Janeiro was to annex Paraguay, or a portion of it, directly to Brazil, as a province. It was insisted that such was the traditional policy of the empire, and that Paraguay ought to belong to Brazil by right of conquest, and as a necessary indemnity for the expenses of the war. The objection to this was that to admit Paraguayans to a full enjoyment of all rights and privileges as Brazilian citizens would be treating a conquered race with too much leniency, when they ought to be made to suffer for obstinate resistance, and to be deprived of any vote or interest in their home government.

Those opposed to the erection of Paraguay into a kingdom said such a measure would encourage the dismemberment of the empire; and Counsellor Paranhos, senator from the province of Mato Grosso, was accused of not being very orthodox in regard to the integrity of the empire.

Others proposed a temporary state for the second princess and her husband the Duke of Sax, to prevent them from disturbing the quiet of the present empire.

Washburn proposed to make Paraguay a colony, directly dependent on the imperial crown, to be governed by regents appointed by Brazil. He said this would be in harmony with its present system of government, and would be well suited for such a backward country as Paraguay, where the chief offices are now held by foreigners, and it did not matter whether the Count d'Eu or any other person held the title of viceroy or governor general. Ever since the Paraguayan expedition, Count d'Eu had wanted to be commander-in-chief of the Brazilian army in Paraguay, no doubt with the ultimate intention of becoming governor; but he did not insist on the position, for fear of exciting the suspicion of the allies; yet he still aspired to the same place.

Washburn suggested some of the Paraguay leaders, but their ideas were for independence, and Count d'Eu would make them as good a ruler as they deserved.

Deponent knows that when the new issue of paper money was made in October last, the committee summoned Washburn to a conference to determine if it would not be well to retain most of the new currency for themselves, and thus prevent Lopez from getting hold of it, for the purpose of continuing the prosecution of the war. It was considered whether it would not be well to send most of the paper issue out of the country to Marquis Caxias, with the understanding that it was to be received by the Brazilian government at a fixed rate. In fact, the proposal was subsequently carried out by the agency of Washburn, who carried large quantities of the new paper money to Caxias, as well as ounces of gold and other valuables. Deponent does not know how much was sent, nor in what way; but he is certain it was done more than once.

Most of this money was intended as a present to Caxias, or rather as a bribe to favor the Paraguayans engaged in the rebellion, and to engage him to aid them.

Deponent knows that Washburn had Caxias's promise of many thousand ounces for the part he was to take in the conspiracy, but Washburn never told him exactly how much he was to get.

Deponent knows that about the middle of last year the leaders of the conspiracy conceived great hopes of large profits from the contribution of jewelry and plate by the fair sex of the nation, and were much disappointed when Lopez determined to take only the twentieth part of what was offered. Yet, as the collection of this twentieth would be confided to the treasury department, the chiefs of committees would get their share by entering in their books only a portion of what they collected, and by persuading the givers not to limit themselves to a twentieth.

Speaking of the gold and paper money sent to Caxias, to make him hurry up with the promised aid, Washburn said to deponent, that if that was the idea of the revolutionists, they would be greatly disappointed, for Caxias knew how to take care of number one, and would delay operations, just to get more money out of them, on the principle of not killing the hen that laid golden eggs.

Washburn rejoiced to see this money sent away, because it would deprive Lopez of means to continue the war, and in case he fled the country, he would find the coffers of the treasury empty. And he used to laugh at the poverty of the new government to be erected when the allies triumphed, at not finding a cent in the treasury, nor anywhere else; they would have to sell the whole country to pay the war debt; and he compared the poor people to the Hebrews in Egypt, that were ordered to make bricks when they had no straw to make them with; said the beggars would be richer than the nation; and then he would illustrate by pertinent anecdotes, as was his custom.

Washburn said the excuse Caxias gave the leaders of the revolution for not aiding them, according to promise, by sending his fleet above Humaita, was his fear of torpedoes, of which the Brazilians had a mortal dread, and Washburn could not convince Caxias that his fear of torpedoes was unfounded and ridiculous.

When the minister of foreign relations here told Washburn he was afraid Masterman and deponent would escape from the American legation and go over to the enemy, he promised to keep them in a secure place till he could send them to Washington, and actually confined them to one room, where they were under a kind of arrest, with a promise not to come out for twenty days, when the affair would be forgotten.

On the 9th day of November, as a first act of ratification, deponent said: That all the foregoing declarations he had heard read are the same he made in respect to truth and in answer to questions put to him in reference to his participation in the infamous conspiracy against the country and government of the republic, all he did in favor of the revolution, and all he knew about the iniquitous combinations to overthrow it; that he has nothing to contradict, but has much else to say, that he did not remember before, viz:

Deponent declares that as early as 1864, the imperial government kept a secret agent or spy in Corrientes, named Machado, who was favored in every way by the government there, in compliance with Mitre's orders; and this he learned from Machado himself, who was an acquaintance of his, and from the governor, Lagrana, to whom deponent was presented by Machado, in the year 1865, when in Corrientes, on his way to this republic.

In the last voyage of the steamer Marquis Olinda from Montevideo to Corrientes, in November, 1864, the ex-president of the Argentine confederation, Santiago Derqui, came a passenger. After the battle of Pavon, he had lived a refugee in Montevideo, and Mitre now let him come back to Corrientes, to act as a secret agent in the war against Paraguay. He did act as such, and when Paunero came up with the Brazilian squadron to attack the city of Corrientes, on the 25th of May, 1865, he landed at the Derqui villa, where he got information preparatory to his attack on Corrientes. Another branch of Derqui's business was to stop all communication between General Urquiza and President Lopez, for which he was peculiarly fitted, because he had been the friend of both parties, and because of his central position in Corrientes.

During Washburn's six months' stay in Corrientes he bought many thousand dollars of Paraguay paper money at a great discount, and when he reached Asuncion he sold it at a premium, thus making large profits in the speculation. This money had been left in Corrientes when the Paraguay army evacuated that city, and of course it was worth little at the time Washburn was there. He was also in the habit of purchasing bills of exchange on Rio Janeiro and Buenos Ayres, and making immense profits by their sale, thus speculating on the necessities of the people. When he came up to Paraguay he brought a cargo of groceries, not for his personal use, but to sell at an exorbitant price to the needy who had the money to pay for them.

Washburn also put into his pocket the half of seven and odd thousand dollars, which he recovered from the Paraguay government for a German Jew, named Luis Yager, who pretended to be an American citizen, for damages done him by the army while he was at Bellavista.

Washburn witnessed the attack on the bank of Ytapiro, on the 10th of April, from a steamer belonging to the well-known Santiago Caustan; he knew beforehand that Lieutenant Romero was going to make the attack. A few days after the battle of the 2d of May, Washburn was at Mitre's headquarters, attending the examination of two Paraguay deserters, old acquaintances of his, named Bernardo Recalde and Manuel Alonzo or Decoud, from whom he expected to get important information for Mitre.

Washburn began to show hostility to the government of Paraguay soon after his second arrival there, and he found a worthy colleague in the person of Cochelet, the French consul, who was less disguised than Washburn in his hatred for Lopez.

The great opposition of the foreign residents of Asuncion to the celebration of independence day, the 25th of December, 1866, was due to the influence of Washburn and Cochelet upon that portion of the population.

When Washburn visited Caxias, in March, 1867, he found him troubled by ridiculous rumors about the great help that Paraguay expected from Bolivia, Rio Janeiro, and Buenos Ayres newspapers; said Lopez had employed two or three thousand men to open a road to Bolivia over the Chaco plains; that Dr. Carreras had been to Bolivia two or three times as agent of the Paraguay government; that a Bolivian minister had arrived at Asuncion, where he was received with banquets and illumination; and finally, that besides sending a quantity of ammunition, Bolivia was ready to throw itself into the arms of Paraguay.

Washburn confirmed the report about arms, so as to excite Caxias against Bolivia; and he did swear to divide that republic between Brazil and the Argentine Republic, after the conquest.

On that same occasion Caxias gave Washburn to understand that the Spanish government had been for years united with the imperial government in hostility to the republics of the Pacific; that Brazil sympathized with Spain in her present war against them, and it would be very easy for Brazil and Spain to make common cause against their mutual enemies in South America.

It was at this visit, too, that Washburn interceded with Caxias for his friend, Dr. Carreras, asking his life and property to be spared, and promising his aid in the projected revolution.

At Caxias's camp Washburn met Captain Watson, secretary of the British legation at Buenos Ayres, and formed an intrigue with him to try to influence the diplomatic body in that city, by means of letters and false reports of the state of affairs in Paraguay, sent verbally by Watson.

Deponent was to have attended Washburn on that trip, as secretary or interpreter, for Washburn had invited him to go, and leave had already been obtained from the proper source; but Washburn embarked hastily, without saying a word to deponent, and left him greatly disappointed. Washburn never explained to deponent the cause of this strange conduct, but he supposes that Benigno Lopez, or somebody else whom he consulted, advised him not to take deponent along, as it might be dangerous to trust him with such important secrets.

In his dispatches to his own government, Washburn said nothing of his complicity in the revolution, but tried to influence his government against the cause of Paraguay, not saying he knew anything of a conspiracy, but hinting there might be such a thing. It is well known that Washburn and Cochelet had full knowledge of the conspiracy, and took part in all that was done, up to the time of Cochelet's departure; and that Washburn favored the object of the meeting at Salinares, and did all he could for it; thus he may be considered an accomplice in that pact, just as much as if he had signed the document.

During his second residence in Paraguay, Washburn wrote a book, or more properly a libel, entitled "History of Paraguay," the material of which was taken mostly from books and pamphlets published by the enemy since the commencement of the present war; particularly from certain pamphlets written by Hopkins, Manuel Pedro de Peña, and Luciano Recalde. All he says about Paraguay proper he got from deponent's historical manuscripts. Deponent also furnished him with private data, which Washburn did not make proper use of, for he could not distinguish what was of real value from what was mere tradition; therefore deponent denounces and repudiates the use Washburn made of his materials, as they were used for a purpose entirely contrary to that which deponent intended to use them for.

The book is chiefly composed of anecdotes, witticisms, and jokes, collected by Washburn from all quarters of the globe, to serve as illuminations to his apocryphal history. In it he represents the inhabitants of Paraguay as a hybrid and semi-savage race, inheriting all the bad qualities of their progenitors, the Spaniards and Indians, without any of the good qualities of those original races. He expresses the opinion that the Paraguay race is destined to extinction, and deserves that fate for its abject humility and hypocritical adulation of the most infamous tyrant of ancient or modern history.

For instance, to cover Marshal Lopez with scorn and vituperation, he begins by an attack, blasphemous, impious, and violent in its language, upon St. Francis of Salos, because the marshal bears the name of that saint; and notwithstanding the great favors he received from the marshal's mother, he insinuates in his book that she stole the jewels belonging to the Virgin of Miracles, at Caacupe.

He made infinite fun of Lopez's campaign in Corrientes, in 1846, and ridiculed his mission to Europe, his mediation in the Plata, and everything he did up to the time he was made President, which he says was effected by force, and not by voluntary votes. He says Lopez's government is not different from that of the dictator Francia; or if there is any difference, Lopez's is worse, his will being the supreme law of the land. He declares Lopez's intention was to crown himself Emperor if he succeeded in this war; that his unbounded ambition was the sole cause of the war; and that his cunning and duplicity are equal to his treachery and cowardice; for he never exposed himself to personal danger. With surprising inconsistency, Washburn expressed similar opinions of the allies, thus making himself an Ishmael of modern times, who turns his pen impartially against his pretended friends as well as against his enemies; and he was right when he said no country in South America would receive him after the publication of his book.

He even calumniated and villified his confederates, the Emperor, Mitre, Caxias, Polidoro, Tamandaré, and Ignacio, accusing the leaders of the allies, particularly Caxias, Tamandaré, and Ignacio, as being cowards, unfit to command. He rejoiced to ridicule the agonizing situation of Brazil, illustrating it by his vulgar jests and anecdotes, and exulted in its exhaustion of men, money, and credit. He insisted that there was a strong republican party in Brazil; and dwelling upon the immense extent of the empire, the want of union between its distant provinces, and the great evil of slavery, he prophesied a sudden dissolution of Brazil, and its reconstruction into several republics; and this probability, he said, was admitted by Caxias himself.

In one of his letters to Caxias, Washburn broaches the grand question: What is to be done with Lopez after he is caught? and he answers it himself: Let him be delivered up to the tender mercies of his own people. He then suggests the formation of a tribunal of inquiry, or what was anciently called a high court of impeachment, to investigate all the acts of Lopez's administration; the record of this, he said, would fill more than one hundred reams of stamped paper, filled with the testimony of his victims; for there was not a family in the republic that did not wear mourning through his crimes, and every living member of them would cry for vengeance against the author of their misfortunes and calamities. In this manner, he said, justice would be satisfied, and the allies would save themselves the compunction and opprobrium that would certainly persecute them if they repeated the sanguinary drama of Paisandu.

At sunset, on the evening of the 23d of July, Washburn got a note from the ministry of foreign affairs, asking for Berges's papers. He immediately hunted up hiding places for his treasonable documents, and finished by consigning many of them to the flames, as the safest place for them. He performed a good joke by putting some he wanted to keep in a demijohn of brandy, to be preserved in spirits, until he could get away from the accursed country. But he needed the liquor so much, he drank it, though it smelt and tasted strongly of treason, and then broke the bottom of the demijohn and extracted the papers, safe and sound, and in a good state of preservation.

In addition to what deponent said about Washburn's intrigues with Caxias, on the arrival of the Wasp, he says that Washburn wrote three letters to Kirkland; each one different in tenor from the others. He sent the first from San Fernando to Caxias. In it he did not say whether it was his intention to quit the country or to stay; but he refused to go overland through the enemy's lines. This was a mere dilatory process on the part of Washburn.

After his returning from San Fernando, Washburn and Caxias were anxious for the Wasp to come up, as they feared the conspiracy was about to be discovered. When he got the second note from Kirkland announcing Caxias's new proposal to send a Brazilian steamer to the port of Tacuaras, Washburn wrote him a furious answer, accusing him of stupidity, ordering him to inform Caxias of his intention, and to come up the river immediately, cost what it might.

Washburn sent that letter without consulting anybody about it; but when he found Carreras, Rodriguez, and deponent opposed to its tenor, believing it would do more harm than good, he regretted that he had written it.

After some dispatches exchanged by telegraph with the French consul and Colonel Caminos, Washburn recovered courage, and believing his relations with the Paraguayan government in a better condition than he had supposed, he declined leaving the country immediately. Then revoking his former letter that had not gone from San Fernando, he wrote another ordering Commander Kirkland to go back to Buenos Ayres, pretending a disagreement with Caxias as a pretext, and to return in a couple of months, by which time he hoped the revolution would take place, if Caxias lent the promised aid.

In reference to the proposed proclamation arranged between Caxias and Berge, to be issued on the day the revolution broke out, as before mentioned, deponent has to add, that the idea of promulgating it was abandoned. The three allied governments had already acknowledged the new revolutionary government as the real expression of the national will, and as such it had been admitted by formal treaty to the rank of a fourth power in a new alliance, and to show their generosity the allies had insured the independence and self-government of the republic, within certain limits, and had modified the more onerous conditions of the secret treaty of May.

Washburn did not inform his government of his complicity in the revolution, but he tried to prejudice it against Lopez, in this manner: He said the sufferings of the unhappy people of Paraguay had been so varied and severe, that they had been agonized by the three greatest plagues that humanity can bear, namely—war, pestilence, and famine—all of which had been inflicted upon them by Lopez, with the additional suffering under the yoke of the most terrible despotism that the subjects of a tyrant were ever known to endure; that it would be a miracle of patience if the long-suffering people did not wish an end of the war, no matter how effected, and he would not be surprised if some of the more daring spirits took the business into their hands. And he added, that, although he did not know positively, for he was neutral, yet he had good reasons to believe that persons composing the present government, that is, the public functionaries, would desire nothing better than to get rid of Marshal Lopez. He was astonished that this had not been attempted long ago, by a revolution, for it is well known that revolutions of that kind are as common as the new moons in all the South American republics. To illustrate this assertion, there is the Argentine province of Rioja that has had no less than seventeen governors in two years, all of them put up or down by revolutions.

About the beginning of this year deponent made out an annotated catalogue of persons decorated with the order of merit, with a specification of the five grades into which it is distributed. This work was done for Washburn. The list had marginal blanks for the insertion of remarks concerning the good or bad luck of the bearers since the reception of the honor.

The purpose of this list was to demonstrate, as Washburn thought, that three-fourths of the military men so decorated were not living; and of the civilians, almost all of them had fallen into disfavor with the marshal, and no doubt all of them wished the enemy success.

Deponent thinks a copy of this list was sent by Washburn in April last to his government, to prepare it for the revolution that would certainly take place. He also is certain a copy was sent to Caxias before that date, though he cannot say exactly when.

The second examination for ratification resulted as follows:

On the 8th day of December, 1868, the accused, Porter Cornelius Bliss, was summoned to appear before the judges and notary in presence of J. M. Ramsay, and W. A. Kirkland, deputized by Rear-Admiral C. H. Davis of the American squadron, and took a solemn oath to speak the truth to all questions put to him in the present examination. His former depositions were then read to him, and he was asked if he acknowledged them and the signatures at the bottom, if they were his; and he replied that he acknowledged the depositions as the same that had been taken down from his dictation, and the handwriting as that which he always uses in signing his name in Spanish.

He was also asked if he affirmed and ratified these declarations under the solemn oath he had taken, and if he had anything to take from or add to them; and he answered that he confirmed and ratified them, and had nothing to add to or take from them, further than what had been already done.

All of which having been read in presence of Mr. Ramsay and Mr. Kirkland, they signed as witnesses with the judges in the case, and the accused, who ratified his declarations before me, the notary.

[BEING THE CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE MINISTER OF THE UNITED STATES AND THE GOVERNMENT OF PARAGUAY, FROM MARCH 26TH, 1868, TO THE CLOSE OF MR. WASHBURN'S MISSION.]

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benítez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, March 26, 1868.

SIR: In a recent interview which I had the honor to hold with your honor, you were kind enough to remark that it might be of advantage to me in making excursions into the country if I had a passport from your office. Though I have never suffered any inconvenience as yet from not having a passport, but have always experienced either with or without one the same courtesy and kindness from all, both officials and private citizens, yet, as your honor remarked, at this time, when extra vigilance and care are required, it is quite possible that a passport from your honor might be of service in preventing any misunderstanding on the part of officials and consequently avert anything that might cause annoyance. I will therefore thank your honor if at your earliest convenience you will send me such passport as may be of service in preventing any difficulty or misunderstanding.

I take this occasion to renew to your honor assurances of distinguished consideration and esteem.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister for Foreign Relations.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Luque, March 27, 1868.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 26th instant, in reply to my suggestion that you should have a passport to go to the country, that you had never been molested without one. I said in times like these, a passport would be of no disadvantage, and might be of service to you; you asked for one.

In reply I must say to you, that when I offered to give you a pass to go out of the city, it was to protect you from molestation by the patrol and sentries or other officers to whom you might not be known; and one would have been sent to you immediately, if you had told me where you wanted to go.

If you will tell me where you wish to go, one will be sent you. This question is asked, not because we care where you wish to go, but to save you trouble on the way, though it seems from your note that you do not wish to betray the place of your destination.

I embrace the occasion to repeat the assurance of my consideration and esteem.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Luque, March 29, 1868.

I have the honor to acknowledge the reception of your note of the 26th instant, in which, referring to my observation on the expediency of your carrying a passport, in case you went into the country, you were pleased to say that you had never yet been molested for want of one, but had ever been treated with civility by everybody, citizens as well as soldiers; yet, at my suggestion, that in these troublous times, when double vigilance was required, a passport might be of service to you, to prevent you being molested by officers, and to prevent other difficulties, therefore you requested a passport of that character to be sent to you as soon as possible, to prevent any misunderstanding. In reply, I must say to you, that when I offered you a passport for the special occasion of an excursion into the country, when you would have to go out of the capital, it was done with the intention of preventing any misunderstanding with the patrol and military sentinels of the military post where you had your residence, and with officials outside of those limits to whom you might not be personally known. I would have sent you the passport immediately, if you had been civil enough to inform me where you wanted to go.

I beg, therefore, that you will indicate this circumstance, with the understanding that this department has no other interest in knowing it than to save you from trouble, and if you do not see fit to do so, as appears in your note, to which this is a reply, we will not insist on its acceptance.

Yours, &c.,

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,

Luque, April 25, 1868.

I have the honor to acknowledge the reception of your note of the 19th, in which, after alluding to a former interview about sending the correspondence for your government to the representative of the United States in Buenos Ayres, you state that every day makes it more necessary to send on that correspondence, and then you give me the reasons therefor, and end by asking me to make this known to the President, that he may order it to be sent by a flag of truce.

I have communicated the contents of that note to my government; and knowing it to be your duty to correspond with your government, I am ordered to inform you that the correspondence of the legation will be received in the department and transmitted by the secretary general in the same manner as your other communications.

I embrace the occasion to renew to you the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, June 20, 1868.

The Portuguese subject, Don José Maria Leite Pereira, having disappeared some days since from his ordinary residence in Trinidad, in contravention of orders in force, I have the honor to inquire of your excellency if it be true, as the police has been informed, that the said individual is now in the American legation, and for how long since; hoping your excellency will also please inform me of the nature and motive of his remaining in that legation.

At the same time I beg your excellency will remit me a list of all the persons who, without belonging to the legation, are sheltered in it.

On this occasion I have the honor to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration and esteem.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, June 22, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 20th instant, in which you advise me that the Portuguese subject José Maria Leite Pereira had disappeared from his ordinary residence by evasion of the police orders, and you request me to inform you if, as the police had reported, he was in this legation, and how long he had been here; and you add that I am also to inform you in what quality and with what motive he remains in this legation.

You also request me, at the same time, that I will send you a list of all the persons that, without belonging to the legation, are sheltered by it.

You will permit me to observe that all these questions pertain to the internal affairs of this legation, and that therefore I am under no obligation, except as a matter of courtesy, to return any answers to them. Nevertheless I shall give you the desired information, so far as I have it, though the note of your honor calls for it in terms so peremptory as would justify me in withholding it.

The individual mentioned by you, Don José Maria Leite Pereira, whom I had always known as the acting consul of the King of Portugal, and so recognized him on various official occasions, came to this legation, accompanied by his wife, on the 16th instant. They have remained here ever since in the quality of guests of Mrs. Washburn and myself. Of his motives in coming here I am not further informed than that they are founded on the representation of Mr. Cuberville, at present in charge of the French consulate, after his return from his late visit to San Fernando.

I give, as requested by you, a list of the persons not belonging to the legation, but whom I have nevertheless received within its premises, some as guests and some in other capacities. In my note of the 24th of February, which was not sent but as an accompaniment of that of the 4th of April, I gave a list of the persons belonging to the legation. None of these are included in the present list, which is as follows :

Mr. and Mrs. Eden, Mrs. Thomas (widow) and three children, Mrs. Cutler (widow) and two children, Mr. and Mrs. Watts and four children, Mr. Newton and four children, Mr. Miles, English ; Don Antonio de las Carreras, and Don Francisco Rodriguez Larreta, Oriental ; John A. Duffield and Thomas Carter, Americans ; José Maria Leite Pereira and wife, Portuguese ; Adolph Brose, German.

I take this occasion to tender to your honor assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

LUQUE, June 27, 1868.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 22d instant, in which is confirmed the fact that the Portuguese subject, José Maria Leite Pereira, is sheltered in the legation of the United States in contravention of all governmental dispositions.

Reserving for another occasion my answer to the various points touched upon in your excellency's note, I limit myself for the present to request of your excellency that since the aforesaid Leite Pereira is accused and has to appear before the proper tribunal, you will have the goodness to cause him to be delivered to the police officer who will present himself for that purpose at your house two hours after the delivery of this note.

I take this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration and esteem.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency Mr. CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Señor Fernandez to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

ASUNCION, June 27, 1868.

Major Fernandez has the honor to salute the honorable minister of the United States, and to thank him, in the marshal's name, for the notices in relation to the Wasp which he intrusted to me for his excellency.

Major Fernandez is ordered by the marshal to request you to tender his thanks to Mr. Kirkland, commander of the United States steamer Wasp.

Major Fernandez has inquired for papers and packages to be sent to Mr. Washburn by Mr. Kirkland, and has learned that the enemy's truce-boat only delivered the note of the 20th instant, at Timbo, which he has the honor to make known to you, with his respects.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Asuncion, June 28, 1868.

SIR: At 6 o'clock last evening the note of your honor of the same date was left at this legation. Being absent at the time, it was not delivered into my hands till some time after. In this note you state that mine of the 22d instant has confirmed the fact that Don José Maria Leite Pereira is sheltered in this legation in contravention of all government orders.

Your honor adds that, reserving to a suitable occasion your answer to the different points embraced in my note, you limit yourself for the present to ask that the said Leite Pereira being accused and required to appear before the proper tribunal, I should deliver him to the police official who was to call for him two hours after the delivery of your letter.

The official came within one hour after the note of your honor was received by me, and I advised him that I would not then deliver the said Leite Pereira, but would to-day write an answer to your note of yesterday, giving my reasons therefor.

I must confess to a very great surprise on reading this note of your honor, as I conceive that on two very material points it does not show the respect due to an accredited minister of a friendly nation. I am requested in a manner almost peremptory to deliver up a guest of mine, against whom no specific crime or charge is laid, and who, like myself, is entirely ignorant of the nature of the accusation that you say has been made against him. I am also requested to deliver him to a police officer, who would be sent to take him. This request that a foreign minister should deliver a party to the police appears to me of so strange a nature that under any and all circumstances I must decline to accede to it. All that I could do, even were a grave and specific crime laid to his charge, would be to advise him that my house could no longer give him an asylum; and when he was out of it, then he might deliver himself up to the police, or wait till he was arrested.

I find that all the writers on international law that I have been able to consult agree both in regard to extradition from one country to another, and to the delivery of persons who have fled for asylum to the legation of a foreign minister; that he is not under any obligations to deliver them, except for some definite and high crime against the state or sovereign. This being recognized as the law in such cases, it follows that before surrendering Mr. Leite Pereira I must first ask for the specific offence or offences of which he is accused. Says Vattel, in speaking of the rights of asylum: "When we treat of certain common offenses, of people often more unfortunate than guilty, or whose punishment is not very important to the repose of society, the hotel of an ambassador may well serve as an asylum; and it is better to allow offenders of this class to escape than to expose the minister to see himself frequently disturbed under pretext of domiciliary visits—than to compromise the state in the inconveniences which might arise." (Vattel, Law of Nations, book iv, chapter 9, section 118.)

Your honor will observe that according to this doctrine the mere allegation that a person is accused without stating his offense is not sufficient reason why he should be delivered up, and will do me the credit, I trust, to believe that if I did not surrender the individual in question it was from no wish or intention of shielding any accused person from the penalties of violated laws. It was simply to conform to the law established for such cases so exactly as to be my own justification in so grave a matter to my own government and the world.

The case for me is one of greater delicacy and responsibility from the fact that up to the day that Mr. Pereira came to my house he had been known to me and recognized by the government of Paraguay in an official capacity, that of acting consul of Portugal. His offense or crime, therefore, must have been committed when he still held that character; and the case presents grave doubts whether a consul of one nation has not exceptional and stronger claims on the protection of the minister of another than a person holding no public position. In the few authorities I have at hand I find no reference to any analogous case, as it appears that there is no precedent for a person holding a consular capacity being demanded as a criminal from the minister of another nation. Indeed, it has been held by many writers of high repute on international law, that in their persons they were entirely privileged, the same as ministers. One of these, Pinheiro Ferreira, in his commentary on Martyrs, says: "It may be affirmed in general that consuls, and commercial agents assimilated to consuls, as well as the persons forming part of the consulate, enjoy, like public ministers, inviolability as to their persons, though they have not the privilege of extraterritoriality. Other modern authors of much celebrity go still further in support of the immunities of consuls, while some do not go so far. But as your honor is doubtless familiar with the principal authorities on international law, it is not necessary that I should quote further, and in giving the above extracts it has only been to indicate the gravity of the situation in which I am placed. A too ready acquiescence would bring upon me, I am convinced, the contempt of the government of Paraguay, as it would the censure of my own government and the obloquy of the civilized world. Under such circumstances I most respectfully request that the specific charges against Mr. Leite Pereira may be made known to me, when, if they shall be of the grave character that shall require it, he will be advised that this legation can no longer give him an asylum.

I will only add that Mr. Leite Pereira has at all times expressed his entire willingness to leave this legation, and even surrender himself to the authorities of the country, whenever I shall indicate that my house can give him no longer protection; that, conscious of no offense, and relying on the justice of the tribunals of Paraguay, he will be ready to meet and disprove any allegations that may be brought against him.

I take this occasion to tender to your honor assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, July 11, 1868.

I have received the note of your excellency, dated the 28th ultimo, in reply to that which I, on the 27th, had the honor to address your excellency, acknowledging the receipt of your note of the 22d, in which you confirmed the fact that the Portuguese subject, José Maria Leite Pereira, was sheltered in the American legation, in opposition to all governmental arrangements, and limiting myself to request the delivery of the said individual, accused of a grave offense, and who was to appear before the appropriate tribunal.

As in the same note I announced to you that I reserved to another time my reply to the different points touched upon in your excellency's note of the 22d, and as, besides, the last dispatch of your excellency of the 28th contains other points not less important, and which, like the former, directly affect not only unquestionable rights, but also the principles which govern the conduct of nations in their mutual relations under the empire, of reason, of justice, and of law, you will permit me to consign in this note my reply to the two above-mentioned notes of your excellency.

Referring to my note of the 20th, in which I begged for information as to the fact which had been stated of the shelter given to Leite Pereira in your legation; the character and motive of his staying there; as well as concerning the request I made to be informed by list of the persons who, without belonging to the legation, are sheltered in it, you say that all these questions belong to the internal affairs of the legation, and that, consequently, your excellency is not under obligation to give any reply to it, except as a matter of courtesy.

You add that Leite Pereira went to that legation, accompanied by his wife, on the 16th ultimo; from that time he has remained as a guest; and that of motives of his going there your excellency is not further informed than that they were founded upon the representations of Mr. Cuberville, at present charged with the French consulate, after his return from his late visit to San Fernando; and close the note of the 22d giving the list asked for of persons, and stating that although not belonging to the legation, your excellency has received them within it, some as guests and others in other capacities.

First of all, I must manifest to you that the expressions referred to as from Mr. Cuberville prove, although in a very unsatisfactory manner, that the refugee in question sought the house of your excellency to escape from justice, and, for the same reason, the title of guest given him by you with that knowledge does not appear to afford a very correct explanation. And, respecting the declaration of your excellency, that you were under no obligation to give the explanations called for by my government, concerning a subject of vital interest under present circumstances, I must declare in my turn that you can have no right in the present case to deny the information and the explanations solicited in my note of the 20th, for the reasons which you will find in the present; but before going further I will make a summary of your note of the 28th. In it you state that at 6 o'clock, on the 27th, my note of that date was delivered at the legation, and that one hour after its receipt arrived the officer alluded to in my note; that you informed me that you would not then deliver up the said Leite Pereira, but would write a reply to my note, adding that the reading of my note had caused you great surprise at seeing that, concerning two very prominent points, it did not show the respect due to the accredited minister of a friendly nation; that your excellency was requested in an almost peremptory manner to deliver up a guest; that this request to deliver up one of your guests to an officer of police, sent to take him away, appears to you of so strange a nature that under no circumstances whatever could you accede to it; that all which you could do, even when the imputed crime was grave and specific, would be to notify the party that the legation could no longer shelter him.

And, after other observations made from this point of view, after citing Vattel and other writers upon international law, your excellency closes, requesting that the specific charges made against the said Leite Pereira may be communicated, in order that, should they be of the grave character requisite, he may be informed that that legation can no longer shelter him.

Having thus summed up the most essential points of your excellency's two notes, to which I have the honor to reply, I will immediately state to you that, according to the letter and spirit of said notes, your excellency has not chosen to give all your attention to a subject of such importance, looking from a very limited stand-point at the high principles on which the international code is based, and even refusing to recognize the legitimate right which my government has to take the measures which you so much wonder at, and which I doubt not you will reconsider.

It is painful for me, Mr. Minister, to find that your excellency has discovered in my notes any ground for the complaint made of lack of respect towards the accredited minister of a friendly nation, when my desire has been to abound in the contrary, according to the constant policy of my government, much more when this ministry had grave motives of complaint concerning the lack of consideration shown by you towards this ministry, and, what is more, toward the government itself; and since your excellency has chosen to provoke this controversy, you will allow me to mention these just motives.

You will remember that when the state of the war in which the republic is engaged against its pretended conquerors demanded that the city of Asuncion should be abandoned by its inhabitants, and declared a military post, the government ordered its entire evacuation, as was communicated to you at the proper time, which order was scrupulously obeyed by natives and foreigners without distinction; but you, making yourself the only exception, thought it your duty to contravene the said disposition of the government. It was then that this government expressed the hope that this circumstance, regrettable for it, would not be the cause of any contravention of the government's orders. Notwithstanding this, and the official statement made by you of having admitted temporarily into the legation several English families, your excellency has thought it your duty to continue maintaining in it a large number of foreigners of different nationalities, whom you admitted at a moment when, though without any foundation, they might believe themselves in danger from the approach of two hostile vessels; and you ought to be persuaded that although the government was not obliged to do so, yet, in pursuance of its usual policy of moderation, it chose to tolerate this conduct, in order that, since they were already within the American legation, they might not be troubled, confiding that the minister of the United States would dismiss them as soon as the grounds for fear had passed. Nevertheless, it is nearly five months since the two hostile vessels appeared and were momentarily in the port of Asuncion, and since all peril towards these individuals ceased.

Since that time, disagreeable circumstances have occurred between this ministry and the legation of your excellency, through the provocations given by your refugees, and, nevertheless, not one of them has left that residence in fulfillment of the orders of the government, and, on the contrary, others are received, as is proved by your notes.

Besides this, you ought to remember that your excellency has not had the goodness to communicate to this ministry even the simple acknowledgment of its note of the 23d of February, in which, among other things, it was said that in the desire of avoiding whatever disagreeable incident, it consented to the residence of the American citizens Bliss and Manlove in the dwelling of your excellency, but with the warning that, not belonging to the class of servants in which they appear in the list of the American legation, they cannot go out of it, in which case the police ought to arrest them, as was repeated to you in the posterior note of 4th March; but your excellency has been pleased not only not to acknowledge the receipt of that note of this ministry, but has regarded its request with little consideration, allowing the said individuals to go into the streets of the city, and, nevertheless, expressing in your note of March 24 that you did not recognize any violation of law or culpability on the part of Manlove, when, without any competent permission, he went to open the house of a French subject who was absent from that point.

When the consecutive cases of Manlove, Watts, and Bliss occurred, involving direct provocations to the authorities, this ministry, seriously calling the attention of your excellency, instead of proceeding to other measures, which it might rightfully have adopted, requested of you an assurance that these insults would not be repeated, but you did not choose to offer any. Nor did you see fit to acknowledge the receipt of the note of February 22, although it was accompanied by the governmental edict of the same date, ordering the total evacuation of the capital, it having been declared a military post, nor that of the 28th of the same month, in which your excellency was notified, by an authentic copy, of the supreme decree, which declares all the territory of the republic in a state of siege.

In spite of these antecedents, this ministry, being guided by the grave and circumspect policy of the supreme government of the republic, has guarded a conduct full of moderation towards the representative of the friendly nation of the United States, who cannot, without injustice, fail to recognize this fact; and it is indeed owing to this circumstance that I much regret that your excellency attributes to my note of the 27th any lack of respect towards the accredited minister of a friendly nation; and I can assure you that it is beyond my power to conceive that by the act of soliciting the delivery of a culpable person, who had taken refuge in the legation, and of having sent an officer to seek him, two hours after the delivery of the note, there can be inferred any offense to justify any such complaint.

I cannot but express to you my sincere thanks for the acquiescence or courtesy which your excellency supposes yourself to have used in giving me an account of the persons sheltered in your hotel, and you will permit me to declare, in turn, that this ministry cannot recognize in you the right to refuse to reply to the query made in its note of the 27th ultimo, since if this information belongs to the internal affairs of the legation, it does not less appertain to the territorial sovereignty of the place of your residence, as is demonstrated in the case of Leite Pereira, whose disappearance was not accounted for until your excellency's note of the 22d ultimo.

Returning to the subject of sending an officer of police to accompany the person demanded, I cannot understand the reason which you can have had for so imperiously declining to deliver up the person in question. Although there may be no precedent for it, it is in the natural order of things, as derived from common practice; but your excellency shows conclusively that you are in no case disposed to give up to the authorities any of your refugees, but at most to say to him that your house can no longer give him asylum. If there could be any offense in the sending of the said officer, I consider it well washed out by your excellency's negative and the sending away the same officer without having fulfilled his commission, it being, for that matter, very indifferent whether Leite Pereira be delivered up or dismissed from the United States legation, to be arrested in the street by a less distinguished functionary.

Your excellency says that, according to all writers upon international law, a foreign minister is not obliged to deliver up his refugees, except for some high and specific crime against the state or the sovereign, and adds, that this being recognized as law in such cases, it follows that before giving up Leite Pereira you ought first to call for the manifestation of the specific offense or offenses of which he is accused. Without recognizing in an absolute sense this principle, it is incumbent upon me to say upon this point that when the government of the republic solicited the delivery of Leite Pereira, clearly expressing that he had violated governmental dispositions, which is evident and notorious to your excellency yourself; besides the statement that he was accused, and that he must appear before a tribunal, you should not have hesitated a moment in recognizing that the criminality of the said individual is not of the character of the common offenses mentioned in your quotation from Vattel. From this point of view, I do not perceive any obligation to give you any more explanations concerning the crime of the accused person, whose appearance before the appropriate tribunal is imperatively necessary; and, on the contrary, I have reason to be much surprised at your pretension to be informed of the specific charges against Leite Pereira, in order that, should they be of the grave character requisite, he may be advised that he can no longer be sheltered; that is, constituting yourself the only judge of the question, and of the case of the delinquent in this country. To recognize in you this attribute would be to abdicate on the part of my government its rights and prerogatives, to the lowering of its honor and national dignity.

Please accept my special thanks for the transcription of a part of the paragraph 48 of chap. 9, book iv, of Vattel, and believe that it is precisely in view of this same quotation, and of what follows in the work of that celebrated author, that I have requested of your excellency that Leite Pereira should be placed in the hands of justice. And this is, Mr. Minister, as much as I think myself authorized to say in the matter of the guest who has provoked the discussion, trusting that you will consider yourself sufficiently informed to do justice to yourself in the case.

It has been precisely in order not to be obliged to molest you by following the course indicated by strict law, that this ministry has more than once expressed the desire that you would not shelter in your hotel, nor in its rear premises, so many persons of different nationalities, to the degree of depriving the public workshops of their artisans for many months, such as George Miles, prisoner of war, placed in the pay and service of the arsenal upon the same footing with the contracted operatives, John Watts, engineer, and William Newton, director of the foundery, all of them English, who like others are sheltered in your hotel.

Besides, the privilege of asylum, so long maintained without apparent motive, in a purely military post, without other inhabitants than the American minister, his guests and refugees, as your excellency calls them, might justly have given rise to a serious discussion concerning the extension which your excellency wishes to give to the immunities of your hotel; but the government has carefully endeavored to avoid it, and has limited itself in the matter to slight and friendly indications.

In what relates to the official character which you attribute to the refugee, I must say that before reaching the house of your excellency he received in the morning of the 16th ultimo a note from this ministry, in which, by virtue of a declaration of the chargé d'affaires of his Most Faithful Majesty the King of Portugal, he was notified that in the question which arose between him and the vice-consul of that nation long since, the latter alone would be recognized as the person with whom to treat in matters concerning the consulate of his Most Faithful Majesty, and that the former could not be recognized in the character of administrator of the consulate, which was solicited for him by Mr. Consul Madruga, by a note addressed to this ministry, but not answered. This fact leads me to omit all discussion of the question, especially since the same guest of your excellency will have informed you in detail of all that occurred with the government in this respect, in view of the official documents.

And I must ingenuously say to you that, although I am far from knowing the motives which led you to refuse to allow Leite Pereira to carry into effect his express desire to leave that legation to go and deliver himself to the authorities, I desire to respect the reasons which may have influenced you.

Although I do not propose to discuss here the incompetence of the location of the American legation within a military post, I must observe that I trust you will not fail to perceive that since Asuncion was converted into a military establishment, and the government and people, as well as the foreign agents and subjects residing in other places, not only the laws of the state are affected, but also a formal embarrassment has been created to the internal management of that post, by the existence of a diplomatic hotel within its limits.

Leaving aside, then, the question of the residence of your excellency in Asuncion, where there are no objects of diplomatic attention, I proceed to state to you that the ostensible motive of the asylum given by the American legation having ceased, that asylum must also cease, especially since it has begun to seriously affect the military regulations of the post and the most precise orders of the government; that if at the moment of the evacuation of the city that asylum was tolerated, there is no reason, nor is it to be permitted, that such a state of affairs continue as a place for refuge; and declaring that I am under no obligation to give any explanation either respecting the individuals comprehended in it, nor of those who in future may take refuge there. Without any fear of committing myself, I can assure you that you cannot cite any precedent, and that, on the contrary, no one can fail to recognize the reason and justice which characterize the loyal and prudent conduct of my government in a question of great political transcendency; and you yourself must recognize that, under all its aspects, such a house, with diplomatic immunities, affords the greatest inconvenience and peril in a strictly military post. In a word, Mr. Minister, I cannot for a moment doubt that you, weighing in your mind these grave considerations, will find that the exercise of your ministry and of the immunities of your legation is incompatible with the condition of the place of your residence; and that by the simple fact of having placed it in a military post your excellency has relaxed a part of its privileges, and especially the right of asylum.

But these circumstances assume a still graver character when your excellency declares officially that Leite Pereira, like yourself, is totally ignorant of the nature of the accusation made against him, and since your excellency constitutes yourself the judge who should determine upon specific charges against your guest, whether the asylum should cease or continue.

Notwithstanding, my government, always disposed to observe every consideration toward the friendly nation of the United States, and to do in favor of its minister all that the welfare and the best defence of the state may permit, must declare that the refugees of your hotel can no longer be indefinitely tolerated in a military place without fear that, abusing their asylum, they may become dangerous to the state, if not agents of the enemy; and taking into consideration the situation of the republic and of the city of Asuncion, as well as the circumstances expressed in relation to the declaration made by you in your note of April 4th, that you cannot offer any securities that occurrences like that of Manlove, or others similar, will not be repeated, this government must call your serious attention to the point.

In attention to what has been stated, I request you will please dismiss from your hotel to-morrow, before sunset, the said Leite Pereira, as well as all the other individuals who, not belonging to the legation, are at present in it, some as guests and others in other capacities, as your excellency expresses it.

I will not conclude, Mr. Minister, without making another observation of high interest, which is, that when in general native and foreigners have religiously complied with the order for the evacuation of the city, and the government affords them all protection and assistance possible in the state of flagrant war existing within the country—struggling hand to hand with the enemy which tenaciously strives to exterminate them—when public order, the morality of the people in all parts, and governmental dispositions guarantee persons and interests, the indefinite permanence of these persons in the American legation cannot be taken in a favorable sense, these circumstances being in themselves sufficient, without referring to other antecedents, to call seriously the attention of the government upon it in the solemn moments in which we are living.

These powerful considerations constitute the fullest justification of the request of my government, and I cherish the most positive confidence that you will recognize not only the justice, but even the moderation of this petition, and that that asylum will cease.

I embrace this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished consideration and esteem.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benítez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, July 12, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, in which you review at great length the circumstances that have arisen and the discussion that has taken place in consequence of the protracted residence in the legation of certain persons who do not belong to it, and conclude by saying that it is expected by this government that all such persons will leave it before sunset this day. Being thus restricted to a few hours, it is impossible for me to even allude to the many points touched upon in your note, and I am, therefore, compelled to defer a more formal answer to another time. I will here remark, however, that I dissent entirely from the opinions and conclusions advanced by you in relation to the rights and immunities of foreign ministers and legations. But this does not affect the practical view of the case in relation to all the persons whom you mention by name as remaining against the wishes of the government. They have all advised me, including Mr. Leite Pereira, notwithstanding his exceedingly infirm state of health, that, to relieve me of any embarrassment on their account, they will voluntarily leave the legation to-day; and of those whose names were not long since given as not belonging to the legation there will only remain Dr. Carreras and Señor Rodriguez, and their servant, and Mrs. Leite Pereira. To the residence of this lady here, as the friend and companion of Mrs. Washburn, I presume no objection will be made. These gentlemen, however, like the others, have expressed their willingness to leave if the government shall insist upon it. I, however, should greatly prefer that they remain. Such is also their desire, and I have therefore requested them to stay till I may be further advised of the final determination of the government. I do not understand that any offense is charged against them, except the bare fact of remaining in the legation, and if the government insists on their leaving it, then it will assume that I have no right to have guests or visitors in my house. This would place me in so anomalous and singular a position as would compel me to take different action than what I had intended, and therefore I hope the government will not insist upon it. I shall deeply regret the departure of Mrs. Thomas and Mrs. Eden, as their assistance to Mrs. Washburn is very necessary to her comfort and health.

Mrs. Thomas has served as a nurse, or "ama de leche," for nearly all the time she has been in my house, and at this time is in a very feeble state of health. In case that I do not hear of the return of the American gunboat (which I am now hourly expecting) within a very short time, it will therefore be my duty to my family to ask passports for them, and facilities for their passage through the military lines, and thence to Buenos Ayres.

I take this occasion to renew assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, July 12, 1868.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of this afternoon, in reply to that of yesterday from this ministry, in which your excellency is pleased to say that, being limited to a few hours, it was impossible to allude to the many points touched upon in my note, and your excellency was therefore obliged to defer a more formal reply until another occasion, observing, nevertheless, that you cannot entirely agree to my opinions concerning the rights and immunities of foreign ministers and legations. But as this circumstance does not affect the practical view of the case in relation to all the persons whom I had mentioned by their names, they had all, including Leite Pereira, stated that, in order to relieve you from all embarrassment on their account, they would voluntarily leave the legation; and of those whose names were given in as not belonging to the legation there would only remain Dr. Carreras, Mr. Rodriguez, and their servant, Mrs. Leite Pereira, presuming that no objection would be made to the residence of that lady in your house, as a friend and companion of Mrs. Washburn; that these gentlemen, nevertheless, have, like the others, expressed their desire of leaving if the government should insist upon it, and that you would much prefer they should remain, this being also their own desire, and for this reason your excellency has requested them to remain until informed of the final determination of the government, as you did not understand that any offense was imputed to them, except the simple fact of their stay in the legation, and that if the government should insist upon their departure, it would assume that your excellency has no right to have guests or visitors in your house.

Your excellency adds that this would place you in so anomalous and singular a position that you would be obliged to assume a different attitude from that previously intended, and consequently you hope that the government would not insist upon it—regretting very much the departure of Mrs. Thomas and Eden, as necessary for the comfort and health of Mrs. Washburn—and conclude that in case of not learning of the return of the American gunboat within a very short time, it would become the duty of your excellency towards your family to request a passport and facilities for their passage through the military lines, and then to Buenos Ayres.

Restricted, also, in point of time at my disposal in sending this communication, I shall limit myself to the principal points, and to those of moment, deferring to another occasion the reparation of any fault or omission whenever you may do me the honor to send the formal reply announced.

I regret, Mr. Minister, that my opinions and conclusions concerning the right of immunities have not merited your excellency's approbation; but I will make new efforts whenever you shall please to manifest your own.

I am grateful to you for having wished, in spite of this discordance of opinion, to meet the desires of my government in permitting the departure to-day, from your hotel, of all the persons whom I had mentioned by their names, including Leite Pereira. But if I have mentioned some names in my note of yesterday, it was not with the intention of limiting myself to them in my request; and if I have used the names of some of the workmen, it was only to remind you that they still remain there. But I ought to hope that your excellency has arranged the matter satisfactorily, since you have had the courtesy to cause the Mrs. Thomas and Eden to depart, notwithstanding the fact that Mrs. Washburn needs their services.

It never was my intention to cause the least trouble to this lady, nor to her friend, Mrs. Leite Pereira, who, as your excellency has very justly presumed, may remain with her without any objection, as well as the Mrs. Thomas and Eden, whose departure to-day from your hotel I therefore regret; but, since it has been so, they will be informed to-morrow that they can return.

I have been pained, Mr. Minister, that you have thought proper to announce to this ministry that if my government should insist upon the departure of the Orientals, Dr. Carreras and Mr. Rodriguez, you would be obliged to take a different attitude from that previously intended, expressing the hope that for that reason I would not insist upon it.

The phrase appears to me so obscure that I should have troubled you for some explanation, in order to answer it, did I not believe that it was only dictated by the belief that those individuals were chargeable with no offense beyond their residence in the legation. It is not, however, the case. And I must now inform you that they are also demanded by justice, and in so peremptory a manner that I am forced to beg you to dismiss them before 1 o'clock to-morrow.

It is painful to me to have to solicit of you within so brief a time the dismissal of two guests more, who are urgently demanded by the tribunal of justice. I did not make this declaration in my previous notice, supposing that you would have no motives of preference towards them than towards other refugees; nor did I think it my duty to exchange another communication with you upon a subject of this nature, which has already given rise to a correspondence which my government has desired to avoid, preferring that the action of justice should find them in the street.

You will perceive that there exist offenses on the part of these Orientals, and that not only must they be brought before the tribunal, but that it is urgent that they should; and I trust that, though your excellency has examined them, and requested them to remain in your hotel, that whenever they shall show themselves disposed to leave it, now that you know that they are guilty, you will hasten to dismiss them.

This reply and the present conditions of the place of your residence relieve me from the necessity of entering into the question whether your excellency has or has not the right to have guests or visitors in your house.

I thank you for the information that within a short time you intend to send your family to Buenos Ayres.

I improve this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurance of my distinguished consideration and esteem.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, July 13, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, in which you advise me, after a brief resumé of what had passed in relation to certain persons who for some time past have been domiciled in my house, that in requesting all such persons who did not belong to the legation to leave it, I was correct in my presumption that there had never been the least intention on the part of the government in regard to those ladies the Señora de Pereira, Mrs. Eden, and Mrs. Thomas, whose longer residence in my house was desired by Mrs. Washburn, for reasons stated in my note of yesterday, to molest them or interfere with their remaining here. To this it is added that the two latter will be advised that they may return to-day. For this promptness and consideration of Mrs. Washburn you will please accept my sincere thanks.

You then add that, in regard to the longer residence of the Señors Carreras and Rodriguez, instead of being in no other way culpable than for remaining in this legation, they are claimed by the tribunals of justice, and in a manner so peremptory that it is expected they will leave this legation by one o'clock to-day.

Having advised these two gentlemen of the contents of your note, they manifested much surprise, but expressed their readiness to go at once and meet and refute any charges that may be made against them, and they actually left before the hour indicated.

It is with as profound regret as I ever experienced in my life to have two friends whom I very much esteem, and who have been my guests for some five months, leave my house under such circumstances, as I am fully persuaded that no accusation can be brought against them from which they will not triumphantly vindicate themselves. During their long residence with me we have naturally talked with entire frankness on every manner of subject, and it appears to me that if they had either of them ever committed or connived at any act criminal or offensive to the government of Paraguay I should have learned something of it. But I have not. The first-named, Dr. Carreras, it is well known, came to Paraguay to give any assistance in his power to the cause of this country against Brazil, risking his life and fortune to arrive here; but as his services here have not been made available, he has desired to leave it for the same object, believing that by going abroad he could have an influence in enlisting the sympathies, if not the active assistance, of one or more of the Pacific republics in behalf of this country. How such a man, whose innermost sentiments I know so well, could have committed any offense against a government he was so anxious to serve is beyond my comprehension. The same interest in the cause of Paraguay has always been evinced by Mr. Rodriguez. This gentleman, you will recollect, came to Paraguay in a diplomatic capacity, that of secretary of the Oriental legation, of which he was left in charge at the departure of the minister, Señor Vasquez Sagastume. After the fall of the government which he represented his diplomatic functions were suspended, and he then desired to leave the country, but as yet has not been able to do so. Yet, as you are well aware, it is laid down by all writers on the rights of legation, that until they can depart from the country the members of a once accepted legation are entitled to certain immunities; and if any one commits an offense, the government to which he had been accredited is not authorized to try him, but may send him out of the country, and demand his punishment of his own government.

As both these gentlemen have held official position, Dr. Carreras the highest, save one, in his own country, their case will naturally excite great interest, and my own conduct in the matter will be severely criticised by my own government, and very likely by others, and should any grave and serious injury befall them I shall most likely be censured for not advising them to remain in the legation, unless taken out by force. But you are aware how exceedingly anxious I have always been to avoid anything that might lead to a rupture between this government and my own, and as I am convinced they will be able to vindicate themselves, I therefore have not done so. But I am exceedingly anxious that no serious evil shall befall them, for then I can have little desire to continue in a diplomatic career, but shall have much to leave it, and not expose myself to another so painful experience.

I have only to add that if these gentlemen or Señor Leite Pereira remain in this city, it will be a great gratification to me if I may be permitted to send their meals from my house, or other things necessary to their health or comfort. Will you please advise me on this point at your earliest convenience?

The colored servant of Dr. Carreras still remains with me in the capacity of a servant.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, July 13, 1868.

Again called upon by the judicial authorities, I beg your excellency will excuse me for molesting you once more, to request you to dismiss from your hotel the North American citizen Porter Cornelius Bliss, and the British subject George Masterman, accused of crimes not less grave than the others whose dismissal I have already had the honor to request.

I embrace this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished consideration and esteem.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benítez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, July 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, in which I am requested to send from my house the American citizen Porter C. Bliss and the English subject George Masterman, who you say are as gravely accused as the others that I have been asked to cease to shelter in the legation.

Respecting these two individuals, I have to say that I have always considered them as belonging to the legation. Mr. Masterman came to reside in it as medical attendant of my family in September last, and in my note dated February 24, but forwarded with my other note of April 4, his name is included as one of the legation. As no objection was then made, I considered that he was recognized as such by the government as much as any one in my house. The name of Mr. Bliss was likewise given as of the legation in both of the lists above referred to. In reply to my note of February 22, his excellency Señor Berges said that Mr. Bliss, not being in the class of servants, would confine himself to the legation premises, as he would be liable to arrest if found outside of them. For the last three months he has scrupulously done so, and besides has been of great assistance to me in my official duties, and so long as I remain in Paraguay I desire to retain him. Considering, therefore, as I do, both of these persons as members of the legation, I can have no discussion in regard to delivering them up or sending them from my house. Were I to do so, I should abdicate all my functions and rights as minister; for if I acknowledge the right of the government to take away one person whom I consider a member of my legation, I must concede it for all, and thus if it so pleased the government I might be left not only without a servant but without wife, child, or secretary. According to the reasoning of your honor in your note of the 11th instant, if it is only alleged that they are accused, I have no recourse but to deliver them up.

It is with a regret such as I have seldom experienced in my whole life that I observe, after so long a residence in Paraguay, where I have experienced so much kindness and courtesy from both government and people, and to which I have endeavored to respond in a manner that has nearly brought on a war between my country and your country's enemies, and which is still threatening hourly to do it, that I seem to have lost the confidence and respect of this government. That I had enjoyed them to a high extent until within a short period is amply shown both in official correspondence and in the columns of the official newspaper. But owing to my having received other persons into my legation than belong to it, or to my remaining in the city after its evacuation, or to some other cause of which I am ignorant, I seem to be regarded so differently that I do not see how I can be of any service to my own government, to that of Paraguay, or to any individual in it by longer remaining here. I had hoped to remain to the end of the war, and not to bid farewell to the people of Paraguay, who have carried on a war with a bravery and endurance that must render it one of the most remarkable in the pages of history, and give its illustrious chief magistrate and commander of its armies one of the most conspicuous places in the annals of the war, till I could do so seeing them in the enjoyment of that peace and prosperity that their valor and devotion had so nobly earned. But that hope I now see myself compelled to abandon. The course which I have felt it my duty to adopt seems to have been so at variance with the views of the government that I do not see that I can be longer useful. I therefore have the honor to ask for passports for all persons belonging to this legation, and that facilities for leaving the country, such as comport with the character of an accredited minister, may be furnished with as little delay as circumstances may permit.

I avail myself of the present occasion to tender to your honor the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, July 16, 1868.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 14th instant, refusing to dismiss from your hotel Porter Cornelius Bliss, North American citizen, and George Masterman, English subject, the first as belonging to the legation and as being very useful to you in your official duties, and the second as physician of your family, desiring therefore to retain them as long as you remain in Paraguay; and you say that the names of these individuals were presented to this government ministry as belonging to the legation; that in fact Masterman came to reside in your house in the above capacity in September last; that in your note of the 24th February, detained until the 4th of April and sent with another of the same date, this name is included as belonging to the legation; that as no objection was made you considered him as recognized by the government; that the name of Mr. Bliss was also given in both lists as belonging to the legation; that in the note of this ministry of the 22d of February it was stated to you that as Mr. Bliss does not belong to the class of servants he should be confined to the rear of the legation premises in order not to be subject to arrest in going out, which he had scrupulously done during the last three months; that considering these two persons as members of the legation, you cannot enter into any discussion relative to delivering them up or sending them out of your house; that if you should do so, it would be an abdication of all your functions and rights as minister, since if you were to recognize the right of the government to take away any person whom you may consider a member of the legation you would have to cede it in respect to all, and thus might be left not only without a servant, but also without wife, child, or secretary; that according to my humble reasoning of the 11th instant, from the moment that I should allege that they are accused, your excellency has no other resource than to deliver them up.

You say that it is with regret, such as you have rarely experienced in all your life, that after so long a residence in Paraguay, where you have experienced so much kindness and courtesy from both government and people, and to which you have endeavored to respond in a manner which has almost caused a war between your country and the enemies of mine, and which is still hourly threatened, it should yet appear that you have lost that confidence and respect of this government which you still enjoyed to a high degree until recently, as is amply proved as well by official correspondence as by the columns of the official paper; but that through having received in the legation persons who do not belong to it, or through having remained in the city after its evacuation, or for some other unknown cause, it seems to you that you are regarded so differently that you say you cannot see how you can be of any utility to your government, nor to that of Paraguay, nor to any individual in it, by longer remaining here; that you had hoped to remain until the end of the war, and not say good-bye to the Paraguayan people, which has sustained a war with a bravery and abnegation which must render it one of the most notable in the pages of history, and give to its illustrious magistrate and commander of its armies one of the most conspicuous places in the annals of war, in which you had hoped that your name would have a place as honorable as you could make it, leaving the country in the enjoyment of peace and prosperity so nobly acquired by its valor and abnegation; but that now you see yourself obliged to abandon this hope, and that the course which you had thought it a duty to follow appears to have been so opposed to the views of this government that you do not see that you longer can be of any use. And you conclude by saying that for this reason you have the honor to ask passports for all the persons comprising that legation, and that as soon as circumstances may permit, facilities may be given to you such as belong to the character of an accredited minister, in order to leave the country.

In fact, Mr. Minister, along with your note of the 4th of April there was delivered another, under date of February 24th, in which appears George Masterman, apothecary, dismissed by this government from its service, without specification of his quality in the legation; and being already aware that you had obtained his complete liberty in order to perform a certain service, I did not hasten to have his character specified, nor to refuse to recognize him. I confided that although having antecedents very little honorable, you would cause him to comport himself well in your hotel, and that the case now presented would not have offered. Besides, there was no objection, since I have considered Masterman as continuing in the service for which he had been put at liberty, and it will be very painful to my government that on account of a gracious concession on its part in favor of and for the service of a minister of a friendly nation, he should have gained access to the hotel of your embassy to become criminal with impunity, pretending to shield himself with the immunities so justly respected in the representatives of nations. I cherish the hope that you will not see in this a recognition by my government of Masterman as a member of the legation of the United States, with immunities.

Mr. Porter Cornelius Bliss arrived in the country for the second time two months after the breaking out of the war with Brazil, and solicited a contract for a literary labor with the government, and it was conceded to him. From that time he remained in its service and pay. This ministry has seen with surprise that its contracted servant, without having fulfilled his promises, and with pecuniary liabilities on account of this same service, and without previous notice, was enlisted by you as a servant.

It was then that, knowing that Mr. Bliss was also of no small utility to you, it was permitted that he should remain in Asuncion with you, but not in the quality of servant, which was not recognized in him; and it was then inexplicable for this government that Mr. Bliss, being received in the best society—that which you yourself cultivate—he should show such abnegation as to engage as your servant. I wish to hope that this account cannot be alleged as a recognition of immunities for the person demanded.

When you spoke of but three months of scrupulous fulfillment of the conditions imposed, you doubtless overlooked other months in which Bliss lived outside of the legation, to which he only came after the imprisonment of Mr. James Manlove, also enrolled as a servant of the legation of your excellency at the same time with Bliss, enjoying the same social treatment, and to-day also on trial for the same crime.

Leaving aside the circumstances under which these two individuals have arrived in the country, does not your excellency find something irregular and not easy to be explained in this conduct? But as you refuse to enter into any discussion relative to the giving up or the dismissal of these individuals, I will leave aside all that I might say, appealing to the justice of your excellency with the simple narrative of facts which I have just made, and the information that Masterman and Bliss are important members of a combination which, by agreement with the enemy, was to have broken out shortly in the country for the overthrow of its government, and the extermination of the army which combats for its existence, which information will undoubtedly suffice to cause the minister of the United States of America to expel such infamous criminals from his hotel.

This declaration, made after that which I had the honor to set forth in my note of the 11th instant, when you asked for a specific statement of the charges against the culprit Leite Pereira, and after what I have said above, is certainly not the discharging of a duty, but a friendly information, that the intruders in your legation have sheltered themselves there, abusing the good faith and generosity of your excellency, in order afterwards to abuse criminally its immunities.

I would have wished to spare you so great an annoyance, but the reminder which you make of your long stay in Paraguay, the apprehension with which you seem to be possessed of having lost the confidence of my government, the fear expressed of being no longer useful, neither to the government of the United States nor to that of Paraguay, nor to any individual in it, along with the doctrine that by permitting the trial of George Masterman and Porter C. Bliss you would have to yield all privileges, and might be left without a servant, without wife, without child, or without secretary, are the causes which have decided me to it.

I cannot understand the opposition which you find between your conduct and the views attributed to my government, and still less can I understand the reason of the fear that the name of your excellency will fail to occupy an honorable place in the history of our war, though indeed I presume it will be painful for you as it is for me to find in the hotel of your excellency criminals of such a character.

Certainly my government did not regard as an act of cordial friendship the permanence of your excellency in Asuncion for an indefinite time, with such a number of refugees, and without apparent motive, after its entire evacuation; but with frank friendship it has manifested its regret, and if you did not find it convenient to accede to the desires of the government, this circumstance has not sufficed to cause a withdrawal of confidence.

A proof of this is found in the fact that this ministry made no complaint except when it became my duty to accuse you of lack of respect to my note of June 28th, in thinking it your duty to refuse the delivery of the culprit Leite Pereira, then recently arrived for shelter in your hotel.

A rapid review of all the correspondence of this ministry, and of the columns of the newspaper which your excellency cites, will suffice to destroy the idea of lack of that confidence and respect on the part of my government which it has taken pleasure in demonstrating towards the representative of the American Union and his worthy family, who for the first time broke the blockade.

Strengthening thus my note of the 13th concerning the dismissal of G. Masterman and Porter Cornelius Bliss, to be delivered up or sent away, I am persuaded that you, thus informed, will hasten to expel from the hotel of your legation those who, bathing the national soil with fratricidal blood, pretend to undermine the just title to the sympathy of your excellency which the abnegation and great sacrifices of my country have acquired, as well as those which the singular and conspicuous services which its supreme magistrate and general-in-chief of its armies, Marshal Lopez, has conquered in this struggle.

As your excellency is pleased to base upon the fears already mentioned the painful situation in which you find yourself, of having to renounce your desires of not leaving Paraguay until the conclusion of the war, and your consequent request for your passports, I shall await to know if I have not been fortunate enough to have dissipated them, and shall afterwards ask the orders of his excellency the Marshal President of the republic respecting the said passports and facilities.

Having offered you in my note of the 12th instant that the Mistresses Thomas and Eden would be advised that they may return to the house of your excellency, it is now my duty to mention that having informed them of this concession they have replied that they would by no means return, perhaps because you yourself have not spoken to them, and for whatever may occur I inform you that concession still remains in force.

I improve this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurance of my distinguished consideration and esteem.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, July 20, 1868.

SIR: I had the honor to receive your note of the 16th instant on the following day, a little before noon. In this note, which is in answer to mine of the 14th, you, after giving a resumé of the contents of mine, proceed to give an account of the circumstances under which Mr. Porter C. Bliss and G. F. Masterman came into this legation.

In regard to Mr. Bliss you remark that soon after coming into the country he sought a contract for literary labor with the government that was conceded to him, and that from that time he had remained in its service and pay. Mr. Bliss informs me that he never had any written contract with the government, but was told he should receive certain compensation for the literary labors he was to perform; that from time to time he has received certain sums of money in payment of labor already performed, and that the amount received has not exceeded the sum due him. Such being his circumstances, I cannot see any good reason why I should not have admitted him into the legation and given him employment. You express surprise that I should have received a man of Mr. Bliss's attainments and social position into the legation in the capacity of servant. You will permit me to observe that I think a wrong construction has been put on the word "service," as employed in my note of the 22d of February. In saying that I had found it necessary to take more persons into my service than I had previously employed, I did not say in what capacity they were engaged. Mr. Bliss I needed as translator, and Mr. Masterman as medical attendant to my family, and as the peculiar qualifications of each were so well known I considered that it would have been entirely superfluous to state in what capacity they were employed. Nor do I find in consulting the most eminent authors on international law that ministers are ever required to state the capacity or character of the persons pertaining to their legations. It is enough that their names are given in, and, if not excepted to, they are thenceforth entitled to all the privileges of the legation.

In answering my note of 22d February, his excellency Señor Berges expressly recognized Mr. Bliss as belonging to the legation, but requested that, as he would not be known to the police as one of my servants, he would confine himself to it. In fact, he is the only person now in my house who ever has been recognized formally and in an official note. For some time after the order of evacuation was issued, Mr. Bliss and the most of those who came at that time to reside within my premises did not strictly confine themselves to it, though they never went far away from it. Mr. Bliss even continued to sleep in his own house opposite, and used to come and go in full sight of the police, and as he was never molested, concluded it was a matter of indifference to the government whether he still occupied his own house or confined himself to the legation. Indeed, when our unfortunate countryman, Mr. Manlove, came to grief, he went to the police office with him as interpreter, and, after his detention, took his meals to him for several times, so that I never could suspect his being a member of the legation could be questioned. He did not, as you intimate, seek refuge in my house. On the contrary, it was at my express request that he entered my service, though not as a servant, at a time that I thought his services would be most useful and necessary. You will, therefore, I trust, admit that, having accepted him as a member of this legation and given official notice of the fact, which notice was acknowledged, I cannot now repudiate him.

Respecting the case of Mr. Masterman, you say that it will be very painful to your government that, on account of a gracious concession to the minister of a friendly nation, he should have gained accession to this embassy to become criminal, and with impunity, under the immunities which are justly respected by the law of nations.

It cannot be so painful to you or to your government that anything of that kind should occur, as it is to me. To have my confidence abused in that way would show a degree of ingratitude of which I would fain hope no man is capable. But, if it has been so abused, and all that Mr. Masterman has been accused of shall be proved true, the law of nations prescribes a course for me entirely different from that proposed by your honor.

The law of nations, as you are aware, is very clear and explicit, not only in regard to the rights and immunities of ministers, but to all persons pertaining to their legations. "Such persons," says Martens, (Law of Nations, book vii, chap. 9, note,) "are placed under the protection of the law of nations, and are consequently not submitted to the jurisdiction of the country which they inhabit, even though it may be their own. They cannot be tried for any of their civil or criminal actions, except by the state represented by the minister. The legislation of the principal states of Europe is positive on this point. * * * From the time that the persons of the minister's suite leave his service they can be tried by the laws of the country where they are, if they are not subjects of the sovereign represented by the minister; in the contrary case the minister cannot consent to their extradition or to their being put in judgment for things done previous to their leaving him." Thus you will see that if Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman were accused of specific crimes or offenses committed while in my legation, and had left it, according to this great writer, who, next to my own countryman, Mr. Wheaton, is generally regarded as the highest authority of modern times on matters of international law, I "could not consent to their extradition or to their being put in judgment," except in their respective countries.

Says Wheaton, (part iii, ch. 1, sec. 15,) in speaking of the immunities of a minister: "This immunity extends not only to the person of the minister but to his family and suite, secretaries of legation and other secretaries, his servants, movable effects, and the house in which he resides. (Section 16:) The wife and family, servants, and suite of the minister, participate in the inviolability attached to his public character. * * * In respect to criminal offenses committed by his domestics, although in strictness the minister has a right to try and punish them, the modern usage merely authorizes him to arrest and send them for trial to their own country."

Vattel, and all authorities on international law, so far as I have been able to consult them, agree substantially with those I have quoted; and the law being thus clearly and explicitly laid down, I would ask you whether you would have me respect or violate it? Of course you will say respect it. How, then, shall I send these members of my legation from my house, even though they be accused, without a direct and palpable violation of my duty as a minister?

Your honor adds that after the representations made, you lay aside the question whether or not these persons belong to the legation, and leave it to my sense of justice to expel them from my house after your narrative of facts, and the information that both Bliss and Masterman are important members of a combination which by agreement with the enemy was to have broken out shortly in the country, for the overthrow of its government and the destruction of the army that combats for its existence. That neither Masterman nor Bliss are members of such a combination of course I cannot prove, for to prove a negative is generally impossible. But if it shall be proved on full investigation that they are members of such a combination, I shall be more astonished than I ever was before. Ever since the evacuation of the city, Mr. Masterman, who is much addicted to scientific studies and investigations, has lived the life of a recluse, and had scarcely any communication with any one outside the precincts of the legation; while if Mr. Bliss, who has been all the while so intimate, so frank, so confidential on all matters with me that I supposed I knew every thought, and hope, and aspiration of his existence, has, as is alleged, been engaged in a great conspiracy all this time against the government, he is such an actor as would do infinite credit to his own dramas. He should at once drop the pen, and assume the sock and buskin.

Your honor will permit me to observe that the assumption that a person is guilty because he is accused, is in direct opposition to the principles of the common law. It is a maxim of this universal law that every man is innocent till he is "proved" guilty; but you appear to take the ground that as soon as a man is accused he is necessarily guilty, and you ask me to treat Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman as being so before a trial or before an examination, and before a particle of proof of their guilt has been given me. I must be governed by the laws of my own country, and according to them I must have the proofs of the offenses charged against a man before I can treat him as being guilty. You, however, adduce no proof, nor do you give me a particle of the evidence on which your charges are founded, and ask me to treat them as if guilty of high crimes.

The law of nations clearly prescribes the course to be followed when persons, members of a legation, are found to be engaged in any unlawful acts. It says that the government which it has offended may ask that they shall be sent to their own country to be tried, when the minister will be bound to comply with the request. Therefore if the charges and proofs against Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman shall be furnished me, with request that they should be sent to their respective countries to be tried, I shall then have no alternative but to comply, and at the first opportunity send them away—the one to the United States, the other to the custody of the English minister in Buenos Ayres. This course, it is hoped, will be satisfactory to the government of Paraguay, as it will remove persons obnoxious to it from the country, and will subject them to trial according to the laws of their own countries; and as there is little doubt that an American gunboat will soon be in these waters, there will probably be but little delay in carrying it into effect.

You will admit that I had good reason to be surprised at the statement in your last note that a combination had been formed which, by agreement with the enemy, was to have broken out shortly in the country, for the overthrow of its government and the extermination of the army which combats for its existence. That something of a dangerous character had been discovered I had previously supposed from having learned that certain energetic and unusual measures had recently been taken by the government. But of its form or extent, or of the persons implicated in it, I had not the most remote idea. Such conspirations not unfrequently happen during long periods of war, but I did not suppose there were men enough in Paraguay to make such a combination at all formidable who would have the folly to attempt it. There may have been men bad enough to attempt it, but I did not suppose there were any so foolish as to engage in a combination that could not offer any other issue than their own ruin. Your note of the 16th, however, convinces me that something of the kind has been attempted. But I cherish the hope that it will be found, after full investigation, that it is not so extensive as may have been apprehended; and I am very anxious to know, as I now confidently believe, that it will appear to be confined to a circle with which no person who has ever lived in this legation had any relations, connections, or intimacy, and I am fully persuaded that such a result of the investigation is the one that is most desired by his excellency Marshal Lopez.

Having thus reviewed at length the contents of your note of the 16th, I regret to find that my views of my duty differ as widely as ever from those expressed by you, and that, consequently, I see little prospect of being able to be personally useful by longer remaining here. For reasons your honor can well appreciate, I should have preferred to await at least the solution of the question of the passage of the American gunboat above the blockading squadron. Of course, if I remain, it will come sooner or later, if it takes the whole American navy to force its way. I apprehend, however, that rather than provoke a war with the United States the gunboat will be permitted to pass unmolested, and you will readily believe that I have no desire to save the allies from another such humiliation as they were subjected to at the time of my last arrival in Paraguay.

I improve this occasion to tender to your honor assurances of high regard and consideration.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, July 19, 1868.

Your excellency not having chosen to send away, up to sunset to day, the accused individuals, George Masterman and Porter C. Bliss, nor reply to my note demanding these criminals, and being pressed by the requirements of justice, I for the third time request their expulsion or delivery, begging you to take into consideration the urgency of the case and the grave character of their crime, in view of the situation of the country, informing you that the persons in your service who are sent outside of the plaza to procure provisions are accused of being conductors of communications of the enemy to the refugees of your hotel, and their replies.

As I fear I shall molest you, and not being so pressed in this matter, it may be that I shall not solicit the appearance of those persons before the tribunal, thus offering you a new proof of high consideration and respect; and not doubting that you will take the necessary measures for the internal service of your house to put an end to such a grave abuse of its just immunities, I improve this occasion, &c., &c.,

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
United States Minister.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, July 20, 1868.

SIR: Since closing my note in answer to yours of the 16th instant, I have had the honor to receive your note of yesterday, in which, after again requesting me to send Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman from my house, you state that the persons in my service who have been accustomed to bring provisions from beyond the limits of the town are accused of having conveyed communications between the enemy and the persons sheltered in my house. You add that, in order not to molest me, you do not solicit their appearance before the tribunals, thus giving another proof of high consideration and respect for myself, not doubting that I shall take the necessary measures to put a stop to such abuse of the legal immunities.

For these expressions of a desire not to molest me, you will please accept my sincere thanks. I have advised the only servant I have, who is accustomed to go beyond the city limits, that he must not bring or carry any note, message, or communication of any kind, to or from any other person than myself or Mrs. Washburn. This servant tells me that he has never carried any messages or notes of any kind except the requests of persons living in the legation to the occupants of the houses where they had before resided, to send them books, clothes, and such other things as might be necessary for their use and convenience. Even that service I have now prohibited him from doing, and should he be found to disobey me I trust I may be informed of it, that I may instantly discharge him from my service. Respecting the case of Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman, I beg to refer you to my other note of this date, in reply to yours of the 16th.

I avail myself of this occasion to express my distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

LUQUE, July 21, 1868.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your two notes, in which, under date of yesterday, you acknowledge receipt of mine of the 16th and 19th instant, and refuse to permit that the criminals accused of high treason to the country, in combination with the enemy, George Masterman and Porter Cornelius Bliss, appear before the tribunals.

In anticipation of the occasion of forwarding my formal answer, I notify you that, by agreement of the traitors with the enemy, the latter was to execute certain movements on or before the 24th instant; and as it appears probable that these criminals may escape from your house, if they should not be previously imprisoned, I have the honor to say to you that my government would view with the greatest pain an occurrence of so much importance, which would once more surprise the good faith and confidence which Mr. Washburn pleases to manifest towards these criminals, thinking it his duty to discuss and delay up to the present time the apprehension of individuals so dangerous to the national cause, without having been sufficient all the moderation and courtesy with which this ministry has treated so grave a question. I beg of you the honor of the speediest possible answer, and I improve this occasion to renew the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, July 22, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, in which you advise me that the treasonable combination with the enemy was to have made certain movements on the 24th of this month, and it was apprehended that the persons in my house, accused of being engaged in it, would seek to escape from it if they were not previously made prisoners, and you add that your government will view with great regret that they should escape and thus abuse my confidence again, and in conclusion you ask an immediate reply.

To the apparent haste in which you seem to have been I may probably attribute the fact that you make no mention of the reasons given by me in my note of the 20th why I could treat no one as criminal till I had the proofs of his guilt. Nor do you, probably for the same motive take into consideration the reasons I gave why in conformity to the law of nations I could not surrender for trial by the authorities of the country these two members of my legation. But as you say that the combination of treason was to have broken out on the 24th, and that it appeared probable that these persons would then attempt to escape from my house, it appears that further security is desired that they will not do so.

Though not participating in your opinion in regard to the criminality of these individuals, and being entirely ignorant of the nature and extent of the combination to which you allude, I am nevertheless disposed to do all in my power, and all that is consistent with my duty and respect for the law of nations, to facilitate the government in all measures of prevention or security. I will, therefore, undertake to hold Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman close prisoners in this legation, till I can send them out of the country, or till such time as the government may not object to their being set at liberty.

I take this occasion to renew assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, July 23, 1868.

I have the honor to request of you the immediate delivery of a sealed package of communications, which the ex-minister of foreign affairs, José Berges, delivered to you in his residence at Salinares, when, on the afternoon following the arrival of Berges from San Fernando to Asuncion, you visited him in that house, where you personally took charge of the said packet in order to keep it, as in fact, on arriving at your legation at nightfall, you went with it to your office.

This packet being, Mr. Minister, of great importance to my government, you will allow me to request its delivery to the officer who bears the present communication.

I improve this occasion to salute your excellency with distinguished consideration.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, July 23, 1868.

SIR: The note of your excellency of this date has this moment been received. In it I am requested to deliver to the bearer a sealed package of communications that was delivered to me by Señor Don José Berges at his house in the Salinares the day after his return from San Fernando. In answer to this I have the honor to advise you that I did not know of Señor Berges's return till several days afterwards; and that when I did hear of it I learned also he was very sick at his quinta, and called, according to my diary, the 22d of June upon him, as I was going to take a paseo, and found him in bed in his house. I do not remember how long that was after the return of Señor Berges, but I think it was a week or more, but he never gave me any package or communication, or letter or message of any kind. We talked about the condition of the war and of other things of a casual nature, and the only thing that I remember is that he said the Brazilians could not hold out much longer; that their credit was exhausted, and several provinces were already in revolt. On taking my leave he begged me to come and see him often, which I promised to do; but I never called but once afterwards, and that was with Mrs. Washburn, according to my diary, on the 3d of July, when I found him still in bed. His talk then was very similar to what it had been on the previous occasion, but neither then nor at any time has he ever given me any package or communication whatever. You must, therefore, be entirely misinformed in regard to the package concerning which you inquire. I have never received anything of the kind, nor have I received from him any communication, either verbal or by letter, since his return from San Fernando.

I avail myself of this occasion to tender assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, July 23, 1868.

Before having had time to reply to the note of your excellency bearing date 20th instant, as I had offered in mine of the 21st, I have received the reply which you have given to this last, and I proceed to reply to both.

First of all, I must explain the apparent haste, of which you accuse me with so little politeness in your reply of yesterday. Since my haste was not apparent, but real, and moved by the friendly interest of preventing a complication by a new abuse of your confidence, by the criminals whom you protect, I have considered that confidence real and noble, and not apparent, as you classify my haste, and that is the explanation of my conduct in respect to that note.

I have not forgotten in it, as you think, that you had just given me your reasons, declaring that you would not give up Masterman and Bliss for their trial by the authorities of the country, considering them as members of your legation. I only wished to point out to you a traitorous possibility, hastening to forewarn your excessive confidence towards the criminals of your house, while I proposed to offer to you a detailed reply upon the points on which you appear to base your resistance in your note of the 20th.

I have not permitted myself to request of you to keep as close prisoners in your legation Porter Cornelius Bliss and George F. Masterman, and it belongs exclusively to you to do what is most befitting the internal service of your house.

I have fulfilled a duty which I judged to be one of courtesy. It is now my duty to express to you that from your own house correspondences from the enemy's generals are received and replied to, treating of the details of the plot; and when you insist withal in the terms employed, and do not wish to believe in an ingratitude, I am obliged to fear that the same conduct is still observed in your house, in which they have been before shut up as well as now, I suppose, since they have not appeared on the street.

It is not I, Mr. Minister, who have said to you that the complot had been combined to break out to-morrow, but I thank you for the intelligence.

I should have much to say concerning the account which you have received from Bliss, respecting his contract with the government, and its fulfillment on each side, but that is not the question of the moment, and your excellency knows that my government makes no question of interest, nor can it recognize you as its judge in the matter.

Your excellency says that, in fact, the only person formally recognized in an official note, as a member of the legation, is Porter Cornelius Bliss, referring to the note from the department of the 23d of February; but I cannot attribute this assertion, except to some painful mistake on the part of your excellency, since I have before me that note, and I find nothing which authorizes me to believe so. On the contrary, the third paragraph of that note expressly and virtually disclaims the quality of members of your legation in the citizens Bliss and Manlove; and if the condition of not appearing upon the street was imposed upon them, it was assimilating them to the refugees in your hotel, without its appearing that they were considered in any other capacity.

In corroboration of this assertion I will remind you that in my note of the 29th of March last I had the honor to say to you that the said Bliss and Manlove could not go out of the legation, and that only on that condition were they tolerated in the house of your excellency.

Besides, as you know, the specialty of the case, the circumstances of the country, and the residence of your excellency in a purely military post, showed the necessity of the express consent of the government, in order that individuals proposed for members of that legation might be recognized in that capacity.

For the rest, if I have reminded you that Porter Cornelius Bliss has not lived up to the conditions recommended in the note of the 23d of February, it was only to remind you that more than the three months of which you spoke in your note of the 14th instant, and that that recommendation had not been so scrupulously fulfilled. If there were any words badly translated in the notes exchanged at that time, the responsibility of the error falls upon you for not having rectified it at the time.

I will not trespass on you by undertaking the task of persuading you still that your confidence has been abused by the criminals demanded.

since my official declarations have for you less importance than their own statements.

As little do I wish to weary you with a long series of transcriptions from international law to satisfy your scruples, for fear that you might accuse me of not wishing it to be enforced in favor of your "protégés," Porter Cornelius Bliss and George F. Masterman, and also because I do not consider this to be the place.

Nor shall I give you more specified details concerning the accusations against the said criminals, since I am notified beforehand that you will not permit them to be tried by the authorities of this country, but Porter Cornelius Bliss only in the United States, and George F. Masterman in England, as members of the American legation.

Nevertheless, I will observe that your excellency appears completely to confound the condition of the country in full and exterminating war, with an absolute blockade and a horrible and atrocious crime, with a normal and not very pressing situation, and an ordinary crime of less danger and less immediate consequence. Could you, who are so familiar with the great authors, cite me a case analogous to that which you sustain? Does it not seem to you that if the immunities of a minister were to reach such an extreme as that to which you pretend to carry yours, there would be no nation in the world which would wish to accept an embassy?

Since the national justice does not seek the suffering of any man, but the investigation and chastisement of the crime, in order to put an end to the fatal development of a plot as wicked as inhuman, does it not seem to you probable that when the republic shall be saved the government will excuse itself from sending its attorneys, (fiscales,) one to the United States and another to England, to substantiate an accusation, and call for the chastisement of Porter Cornelius Bliss and George F. Masterman, who, without any character whatever, and begging their bread, have arrived at the shores of this country to constitute themselves later the agents of the enemy and instruments of commotion and intestine revolt, and who had not appeared before the tribunal, because, after having become criminals, they had obtained access to the legation of a friendly power, in order to continue thence with impunity so iniquitous a work?

Does your excellency think that the minister who shelters such criminals under his flag and his immunities is in the perfect exercise of international-law privileges? The exercise of that law thus understood, for the safeguard of such individuals, can it be considered as an act of obliging friendship?

Let your excellency add to this that Porter Cornelius Bliss has signed in a secret committee of reciprocal obligation, swearing the treacherous assassination of the President of the republic.

I cannot but declare categorically to you that this ministry does not recognize, nor has it ever recognized, Porter Cornelius Bliss, American citizen, and George F. Masterman, British subject, as members of your legation, and consequently I cannot accept a discussion with your excellency upon that basis. I regret, Mr. Minister, that my friendly representations in previous notes have not been able to avoid the present statement, and I am under the unavoidable obligation of again requesting the expulsion of these criminals from your hotel before sunset on the 25th instant, in doing which you will not only act with justice, but according to the law of nations.

I also regret to see that your excellency has so little hope of being personally useful by remaining longer in the country. I thought that the representative of a friendly nation would take pleasure in seeing frustrated a great conspiracy formed to facilitate the triumph of the enemies of my country, whose cause has merited the sympathetic interest of the government of the American Union.

I will not conclude without thanking your excellency for the mention you have made concerning the American fleet forcing a passage, as well as for your opinion that, rather than provoke a war with the United States, the gunboat will be allowed to pass without molestation, and, above all, the security given that your excellency has no desire to spare the allies another humiliation such as that experienced upon the occasion of your last arrival in this country.

I improve this occasion, &c.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, July 25, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 23d, in which, after discussing some points of courtesy, you proceed to give your reasons why Porter C. Bliss and George F. Masterman should not be regarded as members of this legation, and should be expelled from it by me. As regards the questions of courtesy, I have no wish to enter upon them at this time. If the danger is so imminent as you allege, it is better to leave all discussion on points of courtesy until more quiet times, when on review of what is past it will doubtless be easy to explain, justify, or excuse anything that may have appeared hasty or inconsiderate at the time. I therefore come to the more serious matter of your note.

In this you tell me that from my house correspondence from the enemy's generals are received and replied to, treating of the details of a plot, and expressing a fear that the same conduct is still continued. You then add that it is not you who have said to me that the complot had been combined to break out on the 24th instant, and that you thank me for the information. Certainly your note of the 21st gave me the first information that I had that anything particular was to be attempted on that day. From that note I make the following quotation: "Mientras pueda dar á Y. E. la debida contestacion vengo á prevenir á V. E. que por la combinacion de la traicion con el enemigo, este debia ejetuar ciertos movimientos para el dia 24 del corriente." This is all the information I have had on this point, and in my reply on the 22d I say that you advise me that the treasonable combination with the enemy was to have made certain movements on the 24th, thus giving in an almost literal translation of your own words the "noticia" for which you thank me; certainly it appears to me that the thanks are due from me to you, rather than from you to me. The first knowledge I had of the matter was contained in your note of the 21st.

Respecting the question whether Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman are or are not rightfully and legally members of this legation, I waive all discussion at present; I have assumed, as I believe correctly, that they are; and if now I were to recede from that position, it would appear weak, and would be a confession that I had acted illegally in sending them away, for which act I should be arraigned and censured by my government. I may be in error in my judgment, but holding the opinions that I do, I have no other course to pursue than give them the protection of my legation until I can send them to their respective countries to be tried. If the government of Paraguay should feel itself justified in taking them away by force, all nations of the civilized world will be called upon to pronounce upon the legality of the act. I may be condemned for error of judgment, but I shall certainly be commended for insisting to the last on the rights of legation.

In thus insisting on the rights of legation, I trust you will believe that it is from no desire to shield criminals. If the parties to whom I have given shelter and hospitality have, in the mean time, been engaged in a plot or conspiracy against this government, there is no person in the country, save those whose lives were threatened—and, for anything I know, I may have been included in the number—who has so much reason as I have to desire that justice should be done, or the criminals punished. And it is due to myself and to my government that I should give all aid in my power, that I can legally and consistently do, to aid in the discovery of the criminals; and if you have any questions to ask respecting any suspected person, and I can give you any information that might be of use in ascertaining the truth, I shall be most happy in a friendly and unofficial way to do so.

I regret to observe that you remark your official declarations have less weight with me than the statements of the accused parties. I do not assume the character of a judge; I only say that being, as I consider, members of my legation, they are not liable to be tried by the tribunals of Paraguay.

The government, however, if convinced that they are not members of this legation, may pursue them as criminals and fugitives, and the writers on international law have prescribed how such characters may be lawfully and properly taken from the house of a foreign minister. It will not be for me to complain that any criminal is taken by force from my legation; but the responsibility of the act will then be upon the government of Paraguay, and not on the minister who had surrendered them, believing that he ought not to do so.

To the specific charge made against Mr. Bliss I will not allude, lest again you should thank me for information that I had only derived from you. I can only say in regard to him, that if the charge be substantiated there is no person in the world who will have so good reason as myself to demand his punishment. And I have full confidence that my own government will administer firm and inflexible justice. Does the government of Paraguay doubt it?

To the remarks of your honor that you regretted that I had so little hope of being longer useful by remaining in the country, and that you thought that the representative of a friendly nation would take pleasure in seeing frustrated a great conspiracy formed to facilitate the triumph of the enemy, I would reply that I fully agree with you. As I said before, I have more reason than almost any other person to desire that the whole affair should be thoroughly investigated, and the guilty parties punished. When I wrote my note of the 14th instant I had no idea of the accusations that would afterwards be brought against the persons to whom I had given shelter and hospitality. But when I was asked to deliver up or send from my house two persons whom I had considered as members of my legation, I thought that if the government insisted on that, and my legation privileges were to be denied, I ought not longer to remain in the country.

There are other points in your note to which I may hereafter have occasion to allude, but as they do not affect the immediate question I will not now discuss them. But, as I have said, I am not only willing, but anxious to lend any assistance in my power to discover the truth in regard to the combination of which you have made mention. I therefore will here add, what I more properly might have said in my note of the 23d, in answer to yours, asking the delivery of a certain package. As to the package I have nothing more to say, as I never saw nor heard of it. But as you say on the day after the return of Señor Berges from San Fernando I visited him at his quinta, and brought away such package, which on my return at nightfall I deposited in my office, I will add a few words to what I said yesterday.

As I said in my note of the 23d, I did not see Señor Berges for several days after his return. But I find in my diary the following, which I literally transcribe, notwithstanding my bad Spanish in which I keep my journal, for the sake of learning the language:

A la tarde fui a visitar Berges en su quinta. Le encontré muy enfermo en cama. Despues pasé hasta la casa de la Señora presidenta á quien encontré en buena salud pero triste; volvi por la casa de Leite adonde encontré Vasconcellos enfermo con chuchu. El mandó por me algunos billetes para Leite. Nada de nuevo de abajo.

Translation.—That evening I visited Berges at his country seat. I found him sick in bed. Then I called at the house of the President's lady, who was well, but looked sad. I returned by way of Leite's, where I met Vasconcellos, suffering from influenza. He sent some letters to Leite by me. No news from below.

I had been requested by Mr. and Mrs. Pereira to pass by their former residence and bring them certain things that they needed, among which was some money, Paraguayan currency. To oblige them I took with me the saddle-bags [alforjas] of my friend Traunefeld, that I had borrowed some days before. On returning at nightfall I put the saddle-bags into my office; and the next morning, after Señor Pereira had counted the money, he delivered it to me to keep; and the larger part of it is now in my possession.

You will admit that this is not a very dignified nor elevated matter to put into a diplomatic correspondence, nevertheless I give all the particulars, hoping that I may thus be useful in arriving at the truth, and that the information will be received in the same spirit in which it is offered.

It is with profound regret that I find myself compelled to differ with the government of Paraguay in regard to the case of Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman; but if any man has reason to respect firmness it is his excellency Marshal Lopez, who, after having maintained a struggle almost unparalleled in history for national independence, and having endured years of toil and sacrifice to defend his country and maintain a principle, cannot but regard in another the same firmness, and the same adherence to conviction and duty, with respect and approval.

That the plot of which you speak has been detected and frustrated, I would ask you to convey my most cordial and earnest felicitations to his excellency Marshal Lopez. I well remember what a thrill of horror ran through the civilized world when the great and good Abraham Lincoln fell before a foul assassin, and the universal execration that the deed provoked. That any person should be found in Paraguay engaged in a similar plot is to me horrible beyond expression. Will you also felicitate his excellency the President for the returning of his birthday, and express my regret that I was unable yesterday, owing to the pressing duty of preparing this letter, to visit his excellency the vice-president at Luque and formally offer my congratulations.

I improve this occasion to tender to your highness assurances of high regard and distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, July 26, 1868.

SIR: I have just received the inclosed communication from Mr. P. C. Bliss, which, at his request, I forward to your honor. It treats of a matter that occurred before my return to Paraguay, and of which I never heard till the day before yesterday, when he told me he would write this statement. Whether it will be of any use to the government I am unable to say. Hoping, however, that it may be, I comply with Mr. Bliss's request, and forward it immediately.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

Hon. GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Washburn.

ASUNCION, July 24, 1868.

SIR: When I have learned at various times within the last few days that I was accused of a grave charge; that I was designated as a member of a combination formed by agreement with the enemy for the overthrow of the government of this republic, and afterwards guilty of high treason, I have expressed the most unqualified amazement that charges of such a nature should be made against a person whose whole career in Paraguay forms an eloquent contrast to such imputations, and I have most sincerely and unqualifiedly denied that there exists the least foundation for such charges. To-day, however, when I have seen the charges made in a more specific form, stating that I have set my name to a secret compact as a member of a committee having for its object the assassination of the President of the republic, the mode of stating this charge has been for me a ray of light, explaining how such an idea could have arisen, and affording me the eagerly desired opportunity not only of clearing up a mystery, but also of completely exculpating myself by making known an antecedent of my career which places in evidence the strength and sincerity of my attachment to the glorious cause of the liberties of the Spanish American republics, menaced by Brazil, and so heroically defended by the republic of Paraguay, under the guidance of the first warrior of South America.

I have belonged to a small circle composed of five individuals, who, nearly two years ago, proposed to form themselves into a committee, or rather into an intimate society, not with the object of overthrowing the government of the republic, but for the precisely opposite purpose—that is, to co-operate with the noble efforts of the government in its grand crusade against the slaveholding empire, and against the success of its enormous ambition. It was an association of five friends, enthusiastic for the great cause of the American republics against Brazilian aggression, whose first proposition was mutually to swear an eternal hatred against the common enemy of all republics, and whose only object was to seek the most efficacious means of putting into action our combined talents for that purpose. Unforeseen circumstances prevented that project from being carried out, and it was abandoned directly after being conceived. But such as it was, it was the only association of any kind whatever to which I have belonged in the republic of Paraguay, and has undoubtedly been the occasion that erroneous information or suspicions of persons foreign to it have misrepresented it to such a degree that what was but the effect of indiscreet zeal has appeared under colors as opposite to the truth as heaven to hell.

To explain this circumstance, in what relates to myself, requires that I begin from some time previous, and beg your attention to the following statement :

You excellency knows that, during the year 1864, I edited in Buenos Ayres an English monthly review called the "River Plate Magazine," principally devoted to historical investigations. In the articles of current politics I made myself a subject of remark, as the only writer in Buenos Ayres who uniformly sustained the legal government of Montevideo against Brazilian aggression. I wrote several biographical articles upon the chieftains of the Spanish American war of independence, such as Bolivar and San Martin. In preparing them, I learned that a secret patriotic association called the "Society of Lautaro" had played an important part in that movement, having extended itself to all the new republics. I obtained information concerning this society from the mouths of General Tomas Guido and General Anonio Diaz, as well as others, who had belonged to it, and at last I had what I considered to be the good fortune to obtain a copy of its regulations, and from the autograph manuscript of a deceased general, in No. 12 of the magazine, I published a part of it, accompanied by a historical sketch in reference to it.

When, at the beginning of the year 1865, I came to Paraguay, impelled by a desire of becoming better acquainted with a country in which I took so much interest, especially at so interesting a moment, I casually brought with me this manuscript, which afterwards played a part in the subject of which I now treat.

I omit entering upon proofs of the cordial support which I have uniformly given to the Paraguayan cause, and of the constant efforts I have made to keep up the public spirit of natives and foreigners in this struggle. The facts are too notorious to require such proof. I will, however, say that one of the first ideas which engaged my attention was that of working upon the sentiment of the Pacific republics in favor of the cause of the balance of power in the Rio de la Plata, as represented by Paraguay; and as early as April, 1865, I made suggestions to the ministry of foreign affairs, with a tendency to be employed myself for that purpose. In August and September, 1866, after the great Paraguayan victories over the enemy, and the revelation of the iniquitous designs of the enemy by the publication of the "secret treaty," and particularly after learning the state of opinion in the Pacific republics, as manifested by the celebrated protest of the quadruple alliance, my interest in the same project was quickened. It was at that time that I made a formal proposition to be employed in an agency in the service of the government, proceeding to Bolivia, and thence to Europe. The 22d of September, (date of the battle of Curupayti,) the Bolivians, Drs. Roca and Peña, arrived here, and I soon became intimate with them, consulting them respecting my ideas, and indoctrinating them into principles and antecedents of the present crusade against Brazil. I presented them to several members of the government, and to my friend, Dr. Carreras, who participated in many of my ideas. As the result, Dr. Roca commenced that series of patriotic manifestations by which his name has become so prominent in the republic. Those were days of patriotic effervescence over the whole republic, and, in particular, they were for me days of congratulation, since the government had honored me by ordering my drama of the "Triple Alliance" to be magnificently represented at the festivals of the approaching anniversary of the second presidency. Moved by a desire to repay so much honor, but undoubtedly badly advised as to the opportuneness of such a step, I took an active part in promoting a combination among a few friends, in order to guide our common efforts in favor of the national and American cause. It was agreed to form a small circle of five individuals, who were to organize for that object, under the name of "Hesperian Society," and the manuscript to which I have alluded was consulted as being likely to afford some useful ideas in the preparation of the regulations. After one or two previous consultations, the only meeting at all formal took place in my room, in Calla Pasode la Patria, No. 8. Those present were Drs. Roca, Pena, and Carreras, the Oriental citizen Don Antonio Tomé, and myself. The occasion was the evening of the 12th of October, 1866, anniversary of the first armed aggression of Brazil in the Oriental Republic, and also a native festival of Paraguay, which had been celebrated that day by the departure of the committee which went to carry the national album to his excellency Marshal Lopez.

A formula was agreed upon, expressing that the object of the society was to promote, by all means within our power and by common accord, a sort of South American crusade against Brazil, against its ambitious designs and its slaveholding propaganda, contracting a mutual compromise of eternal hatred towards the empire, which we regard as the common enemy of all republics. This formula, drawn up in several copies, (upon blue letter-paper,) was to have been signed by all, each one preserving a copy, but the signing was never effected, and two or three of the copies remained in my possession. The preparation of the regulations was left for a future occasion, which never arrived; and it was then proposed to send memoirs, prepared by two of the individuals, to his excellency Marshal Lopez, proposing the sending of a commission to the Pacific republics, where they (in case of the mission falling to the lot of one or more of us) were to initiate other associations for the same object among influential men hostile to Brazil.

These memorials, written by Drs. Carreras and Roca, were sent to their destination. A letter was also approved of, written by Dr. Roca to President Malgarejo, of Bolivia, exhorting him to become a champion of the American cause against Brazil, and promising, in that case, to lay aside the political enmity which he had against him.

I will add that we did not propose to establish such an association formally, without previously soliciting the approbation and support of members of the national government. All that was done was merely provisional, and finding inconveniences in its realization, no second meeting was held, nor was even the record of the first signed—that is, each one continuing to act individually in favor of the common object. In December occurred some differences of opinion between the persons who had formed part of the projected circle, concerning the convenience of a certain manifestation on the part of the foreign residents towards Marshal Lopez, and there was even a rupture of social relations between some of us, which, in part, subsists till the present time.

Such is the simple statement of a fact which, I doubt not, has, after so long a time, originated a suspicion that it was of an entirely different character. The truth of my statement can be proved by the testimony of the other persons mentioned, the only ones who, so far as I know, have had any knowledge of it. Such was the only combination to which I have belonged, in thought, word, or deed, and I am absolutely ignorant of any combination whatever for a contrary purpose, or for a repugnant and atrocious object, as well as of who may be its authors. I have never been sounded by any person for such a purpose, since my patriotic principles are very notorious in this republic, and who would have dared to make me the depositary of so horrid a secret? If such a circumstance had come to the knowledge of any one of us, I have the profoundest conviction that he would have hastened to denounce its criminal authors to the just vengeance of a country wounded in its most sensible fiber, and, for my part, I am most anxious that all the infernal plot which is said to have been lately formed may be discovered.

Having had the misfortune to attract the hatred of a considerable part of the foreign population by the conduct which, along with Doctor Roca, I observed in December, 1866, receiving for it the explicit approbation of the official newspaper, it would be very singular that I should afterwards enter, with my personal enemies, into an intrigue to undo all the titles which I had so carefully endeavored to obtain, to the confidence of the government of which I have always been an ardent partisan.

I forgot to say in its proper place that, after having abandoned the idea of the society above mentioned, I had no hesitation in employing the information contained in my manuscript of the “Society of Lantaro” as an element for the preparation of an entire act of a second drama, which I presented to the government, and which has not been published. Would not such conduct have been the maddest caprice on the part of a person who had an understanding with the enemy?

Not doubting that the preceding facts may be a ray of light for the supreme government of the republic in its investigations to clear up the present grave accusations, and to distinguish the innocent from the guilty, in an affair in which, by means of incorrect information, two series of facts of a totally opposite nature, as well in object as in date and in authors, have evidently been confounded. I beg your excellency will communicate this rapid statement of facts to the supreme government of the republic, and assure that government that I am most anxious to give it all the assistance in my power to clear up the truth in what relates to myself and to the other persons whose imprudent but patriotic reunion has drawn upon us such unfounded suspicions.

I have the honor to be, Mr. Minister, your attentive and humble servant,

PORTER CORNELIUS BLISS.

HON. CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
United States Minister Resident in Paraguay.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, July 31, 1868.

I have had the honor to receive your note of the 23d instant, in reply to that which I addressed you, bearing the same date, requesting the delivery of a sealed package of communications, which was delivered to you by the ex-Minister Berges. You state that neither in the two visits which you made to Berges, nor upon any other occasion, did he ever give you any package or communication of any kind, and that therefore I must be very ill-informed in that respect, since you have never received anything of that class, nor have you received from him any communication, either verbal or by letter, since his return from San Fernando. I have also received two other later notes, of the 25th and 26th instant, the first being in reply to my other note of the 23d, concerning the question which relates to Porter Cornelius Bliss and George F. Masterman, whom you consider as members of your legation, setting forth that, as to the question whether they are or are not justly and legally such, you waive the point, but that as you consider them as members of your legation, they are not subject to be judged by the tribunals of Paraguay; that if the government is nevertheless convinced that they are not members of the legation, it may prosecute them as criminals and fugitives, and that the writers upon international law have fully prescribed how such individuals may properly and legally be taken from the house of a foreign minister, but that the responsibility in this case will be upon the government of Paraguay, and not upon you. At the same time you make a fuller statement respecting the package of papers asked for in my note of the 23d, giving an extract from an entry in your diary. The last note of your excellency is accompanied by a communication from Porter Cornelius Bliss, who, you say, requested it to be forwarded; the said communication containing some revelations which suppose the existence, at a former time, of a secret committee composed of himself and other foreigners, the form and text of this communication appearing to be intended as a justification of his pretended innocence.

I shall reply to these notes together, as being coherent parts of the principal subject.

Although there are some points in these notes which I have read not without surprise, and which deserve to be immediately replied to, yet, not to lose precious time, I leave them aside to treat of the principal topics.

I would also have entered into further considerations concerning the question of Bliss and Masterman, but as you decline all discussion as to whether they are or are not justly and legally considered by you as members of your legation, I also ought, after what I have already said upon the subject, to abridge my reply. Nevertheless, I will observe that this act of your excellency is not in harmony with the benevolent manifestations which you have made in favor of justice, since it being in your hands, and a matter of the strictest duty to send away those individuals who ought to appear before the proper tribunal, you preferred to shield them with the title of members of your legation, without having proved, or being able to prove, that quality which has been officially disclaimed by my government.

You do not choose to give all the assistance which you might legally afford towards the investigation of the grave crime of high treason; and the fact of acceding in respect to some, and refusing in respect to others, to accede to the request to dismiss from your hotel the criminal refugees, as in the case of Bliss and Masterman, to which you interpose difficulties, although you have superabundant means to give them a decided protection, which circumstance assumes a more pronounced character, by referring to the fact in your note of the 20th instant, respecting your servant, you have stated your intention to dismiss him instantly from your hotel in case of being informed that he has not complied with your orders not to bring or carry any note, message, or communication of any kind, or from any person beside yourself and Madame Washburn. And the fact is so much the more characteristic, since you, in the exercise of your discretionary powers, might give up to the justice of the country your servants accused of crimes, and might renounce all privileges of that nature, respecting persons of your suite, with the exception of those who have been appointed by your government as secretaries of legation, &c.

The more I have sought in your notes for a plausible motive for your firm determination of not granting my request concerning those criminals, the more I have found that your refusal is based only upon these points: 1. That you think to have correctly denominated them as justly and legally members of the legation. 2. That if you were now to recede from that position, it would appear weak, and would be a confession of having acted illegally in dismissing them, for which reason you would be accused and censured by your government.

I ought to express to your excellency that I have in this respect a different opinion, based upon reason and justice. Is it not evident that this government has not recognized your protégés as members of the American legation, and that this fact is proved by official documents? Or how many times must the government make known to you its resolution? But even if you believed in a tacit recognition after your last attempt, was not the official declaration sufficient, which was made to you later, that this ministry has never recognized nor recognizes them as members of your legation, to modify your opinion and respect the justice of my petition?

There is not, then, the exactness which you invoke in your behalf that they are legally members of your legation; and it is out of my power to understand how, by receding from that position on the strength of a maturer reflection, you will appear weak, or how it would be a confession of having acted illegally in dismissing them, since the mission of a public minister is based upon political morality, and the exercise of his functions requires a respect for law, reason, and justice, preferring the general interests of nations to private interests; and it is starting from this principle that I am far from believing that you would be accused, or even censured, by your government, whose enlightenment, love for justice, and respect for international law are beyond all question; and my government takes pleasure in recognizing this fact.

You will allow me to make the following quotation from Vattel, who, speaking of a foreign minister, says:

He ought not to avail himself of his independence to oppose the laws and usages, but rather ought to conform to them so far as they concern him, although the magistrate has no power to compel him to do so. He is particularly bound to observe religiously the universal rules of justice.

But what most particularly draws attention is that the persons sheltered in your legation proved to be really the principal members of the plot, and that there still remain in it two individuals who are as criminal, as appears from documents of the case, as the other refugees whom you, at my request, dismissed from your house, and who have already appeared before the competent tribunal.

It is to be regretted that such individuals still remain in your house, protected by the American flag, since you cannot but admit upon your own conviction, that far from being members of your legation, they are improperly housed in it, and as you know and have declared that your hotel ought not to serve as an asylum to criminals, I again demand of you the fulfillment of this duty, urgently required by justice and law.

When you say in your note that the government can do what it chooses in the matter, upon its own responsibility, I ought to observe that you may tranquilize yourself concerning this point, and at the same time manifest that—

The question of the right of asylum is already resolved by public law and modern practice. If the inviolability of the foreign public minister extends to his residence, his hotel can no longer, as formerly, serve as an asylum for individuals, guilty of crimes, to evade the competent jurisdiction. It is now admitted that when a criminal has taken refuge in the hotel of an ambassador, the state may, in case of his extradition being refused, order him to be taken out by force.—Modern European Law of Nations, vol. 3.

According to this principle of international law, your insistence in your refusal is destitute of all foundation, and can only give rise to the formation of other judgments.

The pretext is specious upon which you base your refusal. How could the recognition of Bliss, in the character desired, be hoped for, simply on account of having been presented for the second time along with Manlove, in the list of your suite, having been already refused by this ministry upon your first request? Besides, it is evident that you have recognized this, when, in your note of the 4th of April last, with which you send the list referred to, bearing date of February 24, containing the names of the persons of your legation, you make this statement:

I have duly advised all the persons who have not been accepted and recognized as attached to this legation, and consequently with a right to all its privileges and immunities, that if they go outside of the limits of the legation it will be at their own risk and peril, and if in doing so they should be arrested by the police, I shall not have to interfere in their favor.

This sentence sufficiently demonstrates that you have recognized that Bliss and Manlove have not been accepted as attached to your legation.

I ought to mention here the form in which you communicated to this ministry the said list of the persons of your legation, in which you inserted, for the first time, the name of George F. Masterman, and for the second time, those of Bliss and Manlove. It came along with your note, already referred to, of the 4th of April, as a sort of satisfaction to mine of March 31, saying that you had written a similar note on the 24th of February, which you had endeavored to send to the ex-minister Berges.

By what has been set forth, it will be seen that you did not, on the 4th of April last, consider as members of your legation Bliss and Manlove, nor Masterman; not only because you did not send your note of February 24, but, above all, because they had not been recognized in the proposed quality, to augment the number of persons belonging to your legation. Besides, when Manlove, who was in the same case with Bliss, was arrested by the police, you did not consider him as a member of your legation, because you recognized the non-existence of any right to invoke, which fact comes in to corroborate, in the strongest manner, the reasoning and the right which I have alleged in my request respecting these individuals, whom you now pretend to include legally among the persons of your legation.

As to the other statement of your excellency, that Bliss has gone into the streets without being molested by the police, you ought to persuade yourself that he was confounded by the policemen with those who are really members of the legation; but this error of fact cannot confer any right in the sense of the pretense and argument of your excellency upon the matter.

With these explanations of my previous observations, the question is entirely cleared up, and I cannot hesitate a moment in thinking that you will immediately proceed to expel these two criminals, who have abused, to an extreme degree, the confidence of your excellency and the hospitality which has been generously given them in my country.

You have made several quotations from Vattel upon this matter, and must know that this celebrated author says in his work :

The ambassador's house ought to be exempted from all insult, and under the especial protection of the law of nations; to insult it is to become culpable to the state and to all nations.

But the immunity and exemption of the house has only been established in favor of the minister and his servants, as is evidently seen by the very reasons upon which it is founded. Could the minister avail himself of them to convert his house into an asylum whither the enemies of the prince and of the state might shelter themselves, as well as malefactors of all classes, and thus evade the penalties which they have merited? Such conduct would be contrary to all the duties of the ambassador, to the spirit which ought to animate him, and to the legitimate motive which caused him to be admitted. No one will dare to deny it; but we will go further, and establish as a positive fact, that the sovereign is not bound to suffer an abuse so pernicious to his state and so prejudicial to society; * * * and in the case of a criminal, whose detention or punishment is very important to the state, the consideration of a privilege, which was never conceded for the purpose of being converted into the prejudice and ruin of states, cannot detain the action of the prince.

Bello says, in his Principles of the Law of Nations:

The minister, moreover, ought not to abuse this immunity by giving asylum to the enemies of the government, or to malefactors. If he should do so, the sovereign of the country would have a right to examine how far he ought to respect the asylum, and, in matters concerning crimes of state, could give orders for the minister's house to be surrounded by guards, to insist upon the delivery of the criminal, and even could take him out by force.

I did not intend to trouble you with citations of this kind, but, in the interest of supporting the reason of my demands, I have had to recur to them, being very much surprised that hitherto my just and necessary requests for the expulsion of these two great criminals from your legation have not been complied with, as well as concerning the delivery of the package of communications which you took charge of; but I cherish the hope that you will not choose to make any further delay, which could but be a grievance to my government, since you understand the serious nature of the case, and know so well the ulterior results which such a resolution may bring about in this question, by sheltering criminals, who, as I have officially informed you, are accused, with full proofs, of being important members of the combination of high treason; there being, besides, the precedent of the conduct properly observed by you respecting other criminals, giving credit to my official statement, and forming a favorable judgment respecting the national courts of justice.

As you say in your note of the 25th instant: "But if any man has reason to respect firmness and strict adhesion to duty, it is his excellency Marshal Lopez. After having maintained a struggle for national independence almost unparalleled in history, and having supported years of labors, perils, and sacrifices for the defense of his country and the maintenance of a principle, he cannot but regard with respect and approbation in another the same firmness and the same adhesion to conviction and duty." I ought to express to you my thanks, and manifest at the same time that you may rest secure that his excellency the marshal President, firm and persistent with the principles of sound policy, and of his noble sentiments, will never fail to appreciate good actions, and attribute due consideration and respect to really meritorious acts, which involve a respect for justice and law, as he has never approved of actions or proceedings which depart from such holy principles.

I also thank you for your expression of sympathy and compliment towards his excellency the marshal President of the republic, and it will be my duty to transmit to his excellency, as you desire, your cordial congratulation for the discovery and frustration of the plot, as well as your congratulation upon his birthday.

I think it my duty to consign in this place the notable circumstance to be observed in the fact that you, in your note of the 25th, which I had not received when I made my trip to the capital, offered to aid in the discovery of the criminals, and that if I had any queries to make concerning any suspected person, or if you could give any information of consequence for the confirmation of the truth, you would be most happy to do so, in a friendly and confidential manner. You had thus written precisely at the time when I had resolved upon an entirely friendly step in the interest of putting upon a better footing your relations with this ministry, in virtue of our official notes exchanged; but, unfortunately, neither your spontaneous offers, nor the official step which I took, have produced the results which I had hoped for.

Being obliged to take especial measures in consequence of your conduct, so little in conformity with the principles of universal practice and mutual convenience in official intercourse, I made you a visit at your house on the 25th, in the afternoon, which if in fact, and I regret to say so, it was entirely without result, at the least it will imply always a positive testimony of distinguished consideration towards your excellency; my government exhausting in this manner all the means counselled by friendship, consideration, and respect for the friendly nation of the United States of America and its government.

You will remember that I then said that I had left my post to come and visit you, and inform you in a friendly manner that I considered the ground you had taken in your official correspondence as very serious, and that I desired that I might not be obliged to say in it things which I wished to avoid for your own honor, Mr. Minister, and that I should be obliged to do so to prove officially the reasons which the government has for being exigent with you in the pending questions.

I also said that I knew that you had received from Berges papers with certain precautions and declarations, and labelled them with your own hand, and that I attributed only to forgetfulness what you said in your note concerning this matter, adding that I should infinitely regret to be obliged to make use of the declarations of the criminals in official notes, since that would carry this ministry upon a ground which it has not wished to enter upon with you, Mr. Minister.

You said in reply that in your note of the same day you had stated all you had to say upon the matter, and on your inquiring if I had received it, I replied that it had not yet reached me. You then replied, saying that the truth was that you had not received any paper from Berges; that what had happened was, that upon that same occasion, the 22d of June, you had gone from Berges's house to that of Doña Juana P. C. de Lopez, and from them to that of Vasconcellos, who sent some saddle-bags, some paper money to Leite Pereira, and some other things for his lady, who, at that time, were refugees in your legation. You brought me, of your own accord, your diary, for me to read the entry containing this statement, and also brought the saddle-bags referred to, stating that you had brought them in person, and had them in your office, but that you had received absolutely nothing from Berges; that he had never been at all confidential with you, but, on the contrary, preserved towards you a constant reserve; that you had stated the same thing once to his excellency the marshal President in Paso Pucú; that for the same reason you wondered that you should be thought upon confidential terms with him; that some time later you made him another visit with Madame Washburn, but that she remained in the parlor, and you alone went in where Berges was in bed; that on the two occasions that you visited him, it was for a very short space of time, and that your conversation was only what you had already mentioned in your official note; that nothing further occurred, nor had you forgotten anything; that what you had stated is the truth.

In reference to the question about Bliss and Masterman, you said that you held an opinion different from that of the ministry, and for that reason should leave the government to act as it might judge proper, again referring to your note of the same date, and regretting that I had not received it. In relation to this point, I replied that I referred you to what I have already said in my notes upon the subject. You continued, stating that you understood the grave nature of the case, and that if you assumed the ground you had officially taken, it was from a sense of your duty to act so that your government would approve of your conduct, and in the manner that appeared to yourself most proper, especially after having declared that Bliss and Masterman are members of your legation; that far from wishing to shelter criminals, you had already sent away others, and that if you had not done so (in this case) it was only for the reasons stated, but that government could do what may appear to it most proper in this respect, assuming the responsibility. In reply to which I manifested to you, Mr. Minister, that you should convince yourself that the government does not need other people's advice, and that it would do what was just and convenient; that these affairs having arrived at the delicate and important state in which they now are, it could not but be expected of you, Mr. Minister, who has always manifested your sympathy in favor of Paraguay, that you would act in a manner to prove well your sincerity and sentiments of right and justice in this grave business. You replied that no one could make any charges against you in this matter; that it might be that criminal acts had been committed which you had not understood, or which had not come to your knowledge, but that you were tranquil. Then I said that you, Mr. Minister, ought to understand that we are in possession even of your confidential communications with the criminals from a very early period; that we did not wish to state this in notes, at least not in all its fullness, unless, unfortunately, we should be obliged to do so. Your reply was to inquire who were these persons, and I continued the conversation in the same strain, without specifying persons. You repeatedly said that you were tranquil; that you remembered nothing, and that if anything had come to your knowledge, you would not have kept silence. You repeated that it was not true that you had ever received such a package from Berges, since you had received nothing from him. You added that you were surprised to learn that Berges was accused of high treason; that you had supposed him to be a good citizen, but that you must declare that he has never communicated anything to you concerning the crime attributed to him, nor had you conversed with him of anything beyond what you had already manifested.

You also alluded to the manner of Leite Pereira's coming to your house, saying that you had only admitted him until he should be demanded by the authorities; that you had expressed to Carreras and other persons in the legation the same thing, and that Leite Pereira had done badly in acting as he did.

After this digression, I again called the attention of your excellency, more than once, to the importance of those papers which Berges gave you, and that, in order to be able to reply to your note about them, I had made you this visit, in order to see if in my reply it would be enough to appeal in a friendly manner to your memory, or if it would be necessary to aid it in a more convincing manner. You replied, losing your serenity, that it was false; that there was no such thing; that whoever had so stated had stated a falsehood, a lie to the government; that if there should be any such calumnies as that referring to papers of Berges, you would answer them well; that if there are bad men who wish to lie, it could not be helped; that, concerning this or anything else relating to the matter in question, you had no reason for reserve, and, on the contrary, would aid in clearing up the truth; thanking me for my friendly step, and turning your eyes towards many objects, trunks and boxes closed and sealed up, which there were in your parlor, you said that you had taken charge of them to serve various persons, but that you were ignorant of their contents.

On taking leave, I said that I retired with regret that a friendly step had been without result; and that doubtless also his excellency the marshal President would regret it, since his orders were to guard always towards you, Mr. Minister, all the consideration possible. You replied that you also regretted it, but that you could do nothing more in the matter, requesting me to thank his excellency, and to say to him that you much desired to be useful to him, and that you were disposed to do all that may be possible with the best good-will, and that you would do anything to serve him compatible with your duty.

This is essentially what passed in our conference; and although it produced no satisfactory result, I nevertheless hoped that, in consideration of the grave nature of the case, I might have had the good fortune to avoid for you the consequent painful results; but I see with regret that you have not yet been pleased to give the matter due consideration, and have placed yourself in a very especial situation.

In your note of the 23d instant, demanding the sealed package given you by the ex-minister, Berges, you say that he never gave you any package of communications, letter, or message of any kind, adding that you had talked about the state of the war, and other casual matters; that the only thing which you remember that he said was that the Brazilians could not hold out much longer; that their credit was exhausted; and that several provinces were in revolution; that on taking leave he requested you to come and see him afterwards, which you promised to do; but that you only went once more, accompanied by Madame Washburn, according to your diary, on the 3d of July, when you found him still in bed; that his conversation on that occasion was very similar to that of the previous occasion; but that neither then nor upon any other occasion did he ever give you a package or communication of any kind; that I must then be very ill-informed respecting the package referred to.

In your other note of the 25th, after speaking of the question of Bliss and Masterman, you add that as you had said you were not merely desirous but anxious to lend whatever assistance might be in your power to discover the truth respecting the combination which I had mentioned, that for this reason you would add what you might more properly have said in your note of the 23d, in reply to mine soliciting the delivery of a certain package; that as to this matter you had no more to say; but that, as I had stated that on the day after the return of Berges from San Fernando you visited him in his quinta and brought away that package, you would add that, as stated in your note of the 23d, you did not see him for several days after his arrival; and you then insert the entry from your diary, by which it appears that the same afternoon of your visit to Berges you went also to the house of Leite Pereira, where you found Vasconcellos; and that he sent by you some paper money for Leite himself, adding that you had been requested by Leite and his wife to go to their old residence, to bring several things which they needed, among which were some money and Paraguayan notes; and that on your return, about dark, you placed the saddle-bags in your office; stating, in conclusion, that although this matter is not very decorous for a diplomatic correspondence, you nevertheless gave all these details, hoping that they might be of use in arriving at the truth.

These are the points embraced in your two notes referred to concerning the very grave matter of the package of communications delivered to you by the ex-minister, Berges.

When I visited you, the 25th of this month, for the purpose of making the friendly suggestions referred to, I was animated by the best disposition towards you; and I hoped that, if not by my words, at least through regard to your own convenience, you would have given to my government a motive of gratitude, and also a proof of the sincerity of the desires and anxiety manifested by you to give whatever aid might be in your power to discover the truth, and to aid in the discovery of the criminals, offering to reply to questions concerning any suspected person, according to your expression; but the result of that conference has defrauded my most legitimate hopes, and has obliged me to transfer to my notes certain declarations of the criminals, which, as I said to your excellency, I much desired to avoid.

When the crime of high treason on the part of the ex-minister Berges had been discovered and investigated, he declared before the tribunal that he has had the following communications with the Marquis of Caxias: One original letter from Caxais himself, dated in Tuyucué, whose date he does not remember; that this letter was delivered to him through the American legation, and that his answer was sent by the same channel, the draught of which he says is to be found in the original (package?) That afterwards, at the time of the arrival of the gunboat Wasp, another letter came from the same marquis, dated the beginning of June, which Berges did not receive until the beginning of July, after returning from the army to the capital, on the occasion of the first visit of your excellency, who carried it to him personally. That with the letter was included a project of a reply and a proclamation, stating that these documents were sent to him and submitted to his consideration, since, having already forced the first fortifications and being about to take Humaita, he believed the end of the war to be near. That this letter was not replied to, since Berges could not write, on account of an impediment in his hand, for which reason you aided him to double or fold up this letter and its accompanying documents, as well as the previous one and the reply to it, putting them all in a wrapper, which was closed with a wafer, and was labelled by you with the inscription, "Papeles de Berges;" you took charge of and carried them to keep in the legation, offering to serve Berges in every way as minister and as friend.

And Berges himself adds, in his second declaration, that it was, in fact, at the time of the first visit which you made him at his house in Salinares, about the middle of the afternoon, that you personally carried him the second letter written by Caxias to him, when you said: "These papers came by the gunboat Wasp, and I received them under cover to me; it would seem that they are of importance." That Berges took them and said, "Let us see," reading them thereupon in your presence; and that, after a short time, you observed to him that the papers were long, and that therefore you would retire, as you had something to do; that to this he replied, "I shall claim a little more of your time; you might take a walk for a little while in the quinta." That you said: "Your quinta is very sorry at present; rather give me a book to read." That he then said to your excellency, "There are some," pointing to a few books upon a small table, "such as the Count of Monte Christo, La Garota, a work by Ascasubi, &c." That you got up to take one of them, he does not know exactly which, and read awhile, until Berges interrupted you, saying, "I am going to deposit these papers in your custody;" to which you replied, "Vaya! they are then from Caxias;" and he replied in the affirmative. You said to him, "These are delicate matters; I would prefer to take charge of jewelry or other things which you may wish to deposit in the legation, and I would do it without asking the so-much per cent. (without saying how much) which I ask from other persons; but these papers may involve me in a compromise with my own government for abetting correspondence with the enemy's camp; for the rest I have no fear." Berges then replied, "How can a thing be known which has passed between us? I will fold them up with the previous communication, (which you knew of,) and give them to you now to carry away." That you, after thinking a moment, said, "I will take them, but if anything should happen, I will burn them, and say that I have received nothing." That Berges then got up and took from a secret place in a red writing-desk, where he kept it, the first letter and the reply to it, and set about folding it up with the second one and the accompanying papers, as he had said in his before-mentioned previous declaration, the form of the package being quadrangular, about the size of a sheet folded in three; and having been closed with a wafer by Berges himself, you labelled it with the inscription already mentioned, "Papeles de Berges," and put it in the inside pocket of your coat, over your breast, taking leave of him afterwards, and starting off in the direction of Trinidad. That about a week afterwards you visited him a second time, along with your lady, who remained in the parlor; and you went into Berges's sleeping-room, he being in bed; on which occasion it was that you made him in more detail the offer of your services as minister and as friend.

These are, Mr. Minister, the foundations which this ministry has had for soliciting of your excellency the delivery of the package mentioned by the ex-minister Berges.

And I will conclude, stating to you that my government, which has never avoided the responsibility of its acts of whatever character, will not fear to assume it now before the enlightened government of the United States and the civilized world, by making use of the means prescribed by the writers upon international law, to take possession of the criminals, Porter Cornelius Bliss and George F. Masterman; but it costs me much, Mr. Minister, to persuade myself that you will continue to refuse to accede to the solicitation of the national courts of justice; and I would fain hope that you, weighing my considerations, will at last not refuse to hear them, and will give up the criminals to appear in judgment, not as members of the legation of a friendly power, but as men who have abusively gained access to it to shield themselves by it from punishment.

Your excellency inquires if my government doubts that that of the United States would administer full and inflexible justice, and I take pleasure in stating here that I have not the remotest shadow of doubt of it; but I will in my turn inquire of your excellency, if the American government can be in full possession of the case, as the national court of justice is, would it send the record of its trial for a new substantiation of the case? Could it do so? Would the firm and inflexible administration of American justice be sufficiently timely?

I request of your excellency to consider the state of the country and the character of the case at issue.

I improve this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, August 3, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 31st of July, on the evening of the 1st instant. In this note you discuss at great length the various points on which I have been so unfortunate as to differ with your government on questions that have arisen during the last month.

In this note you, after a long discussion on the points of difference as to whether or not Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman are rightfully members of this legation, give me the most startling information in regard to the declaration of the ex-minister of foreign affairs, José Berges. This notice has caused me so much surprise and astonishment, and is of so serious and grave a nature, that I trust you will pardon me if I first reply to that part of your note, leaving the other question to another day.

And, first, you will permit me to observe that I deeply regret that in a case of so serious a nature you should assume for facts what at best must be doubtful, and reiterate positively, as if on your own knowledge, what I, on my own better knowledge, as positively have denied. When a minister is told virtually that his words are not believed, that they are known to be false, he would certainly be excused if he declined any further correspondence. But, as I have already promised to give any aid in my power to clear up the terrible mystery in which I am surrounded, I shall pass over this matter of form, believing that what I have to say will be of service in eliciting the truth.

You express regret that in the personal interview held with me on the 25th ultimo, you were unable to elicit such facts as would render it unnecessary to include in an official note your subsequent statements. But that you were seeking impossibilities, I think I shall be able to convince you. Your statement of what Señor Berges has said before the tribunal, has led me to reflect and call to mind every incident and circumstance that I can remember which can throw any light on his strange conduct. Regarding the package which you say again and again that he delivered to me, I say again and again I never saw, nor heard of till I received your note of the 23d ultimo. But when to this he has added that it was through means of this legation that he carried on his treasonable correspondence with the enemy, I have endeavored to discover or imagine how it was possible for him to do so. I will therefore relate in detail, as far as my memory, with the assistance of my journal, will permit, everything in relation to the transmission of my dispatches.

On the 28th of April last I sent away my last dispatches for Washington, to be forwarded below, and thence passed by flag of truce through the military lines. Whether I sent letters for other persons or not I do not remember, but I presume I did, though I do not recollect for whom. I have sometimes sent letters for the Portuguese vice-consul, Señor Vasconcellos, but I do not recollect whether on that occasion I did or not. A few days after sending away this package of dispatches, that is, on the 6th of May, a clerk and translator in the Foreign Office, Gaspar Lopez, came to my house, bringing a small bag of dispatches. On opening it I found it contained two or three dispatches from Washington, two or three private letters from the United States, and an official and also a private letter from Captain Kirkland, commanding the United States steamer Wasp, who advised me that he had come up to take me and my family away. There also came at the same time a package of letters addressed to me, with the name of the English secretary of legation at Buenos Ayres, G. F. Gould, on the corner. On tearing off the outer wrapper of this package, I found it was addressed to the Portuguese vice-consul, Vasconcellos, and was accompanied by a note to me from the Portuguese chargé d'affaires in Montevideo, the Baron de Sousa. A copy of this note I inclose herewith. As my own letters contained no news from below, and I supposed that those for Vasconcellos would have a great deal, I went out in the afternoon of the same day to his chacara to deliver the package and learn the news it contained. He did not open it in my presence, but he afterwards brought out one or two private letters, which he read to Leite Pereira and myself, when, for the first time, I learned of the revolution in Montevideo, and the death of ex-President Berro and of Flores. This news, I suppose, was made known to the government soon after, as the next number of the Semenario contained the same. I ought to remark that the tone of these letters was very favorable to this country, representing the allies to be in a desperate condition, and the writer as convinced that they could never conquer Paraguay. This package also contained a letter for Dr. Carreras, which I brought in and delivered to him. It was read to me afterwards, and contained the same news as that of Vasconcellos, and was equally friendly to Paraguay.

This is the only correspondence that has ever passed through my hands for many months from any person whatsoever from beyond the enemy's lines, and if Señor Berges tells the truth, (which I have reason to doubt, as on another point he states what I know to be false,) the communication he says he received from Caxias through this legation must have been in that package from the Baron de Sousa. At the time, you will remember that Berges was not here, and a few days after I went to San Fernando to see his excellency Marshal Lopez, in order to make such arrangements as would induce the commander of the Wasp to come up to that point. I had not been recalled by my government, though a gunboat had been sent to take me and my family away, and until a successor should arrive to take my place I was disposed to remain in Paraguay. I had written as early as January to be recalled, and insisted that another minister should come to succeed me, as it would look like the abandonment of a brave and gallant people if the only accredited foreign minister were to be withdrawn. Whether this letter ever reached Washington I have great reason to doubt, as, ever since my visit to the camp of the Marquis de Caxias, he seems to have done everything he dared do to stop my communications and supplies. I venture the assertion that if he has been engaged in a plot with traitors in Paraguay, I am almost the last person he would wish to know anything about it. I flatter myself that he considers me, whatever you may do, a friend to Paraguay, and such a friend as Brazilian gold is powerless to seduce.

From San Fernando I wrote to Captain Kirkland, telling him that the allies had no right to prevent him from passing their blockade, and that for other reasons I could not avail myself of the presence of the Wasp unless he would come higher up the river. Afterwards, I returned to this place, and on the 30th of May I received another letter from Captain Kirkland, in which he informed me that the Marquis de Caxias refused to allow him to pass his squadron, but offering to furnish me facilities to go by land from Pilar or Tayi to Curupayti. This offer of Caxias I took as an insult to me and my government, and so advised Captain Kirkland, telling him to force the blockade and let the Brazilians fire upon him if they chose to do so. It seems, however, that he did not feel authorized under his instructions to take such violent measures, and on the 10th of June he wrote me that he should start that day for Montevideo in order to get such instructions as would require him to pass the blockade or fight the whole Brazilian squadron. I then believed that he would be back within a month, but now nearly two months have passed and I hear nothing of him. It may be that the admiral does not wish to take the responsibility of commencing a war on Brazil without orders from the government, and that, instead of sending back Captain Kirkland with orders to force the blockade, he has sent to Washington for instructions. Was it not for the delay, this would be the course I would prefer, for I have no doubt the orders would be that the entire squadron should come at once to Paraguay without as much as asking permission of the Brazilians. The delay, however, is what I deplore. While my government is debating whether to make war on Brazil, by reason of my representations and situation, the government of Paraguay refuses to credit my positive statements as against those of an accused, convicted, and confessed traitor.

Neither of these last letters from Captain Kirkland to me were accompanied with any letter to anybody else, and I sent no letter from anybody else with my letters to him. I expected him to come up here to take away my family, and therefore I did not send away a single letter except my own official letters to Captain Kirkland himself.

I cannot find words to express my surprise at the account which you give me of the declaration of ex-Minister Berges. It is all false from beginning to end, and that I believe I shall easily convince you, and that he has evidently ascribed to me a part which was performed by another person. I do not imagine he is a person of the ingenuity to make up out of nothing his story about the package which he says he delivered to me, but that he should try to screen some one else by imputing to me the acts of one of his accomplices is quite possible. I do not suppose he would do that out of malice to me, for I have no reason to think that he ever cherished any such feelings towards me. Yet he might think to screen another by ascribing his acts to me, and at the same time imagine that my official character would prevent inquiry into my own acts. Yet, whatever his object or motives, the whole declaration is, as far as it relates to me, a monstrous fiction.

You express regret that it should have become necessary to put this declaration in an official note. I also would have preferred to have been privately advised, and given my explanations in an unofficial form. But, notwithstanding this, I am glad at last to know what has been the ground of the action of your government towards me which has hitherto been entirely incomprehensible. Had I been advised earlier of this declaration of Berges, very much of this long and unpleasant correspondence would have been avoided. But I have been groping in the dark, without the least idea of what the government knew or suspected. I seemed to have lost its confidence, but I knew not for what reason. But this declaration of Berges, though entirely false, explains all. After a man who has held such high positions as he has occupied, has accused me of knowing of his treachery and aiding in it, it is not at all strange that the government should regard me and all near me with suspicion. But, now I know what his declaration is, I shall be able to show, by a careful reference to dates and other well-known or easily ascertained facts, that it is all false from beginning to end.

I will now examine his statement somewhat in detail. First, he says he received a letter from the Marquis de Caxias, the date of which he does not remember, and that he received it through this legation. The date is important, as if it passed through my hands it must have been in that package from the Baron de Sousa to Vasconcellos, or must have come as early as December last, when the Italian consul came through the military lines, for between the arrival of the Italian consul and the arrival of the Wasp I received nothing whatever from below. But as Berges says it was the second letter that came by the Wasp, the first must have come several months before. He also says that his answer was sent by the same channel. Of that I can only say that if he did send through this legation, it must have been under the cover of somebody else. I remember of his asking me on one occasion, when I was about sending off my dispatches, to include some letters for him. But I refused to do it, giving as a reason that it would be an abuse of the faith and confidence of the allies to do so; that I could only send correspondence with their assistance, and to take advantage of that to send the letters of their enemies, would be such an abuse that; should it be discovered, they would be justified in refusing to allow any more of my correspondence to pass either way. Therefore, if he sent anything through this legation, it must have been by getting some one else not connected with the government to give it to me as a letter to his family. But, if he did impose upon me in that way, it must have been as long ago as the middle of January last, for between that time and the departure of Berges for Paso Pucu I sent no correspondence away.

It appears from the note of your honor that Berges made two declarations, and that the two are very inconsistent with each other. In the first he says that the second letter from Caxias, which was brought by the Wasp, was dated the beginning of June, but that he did not receive it till the beginning of July, when I delivered it to him personally at his house. If that letter, dated near the beginning of June, passed through my hands, it must have come with the last letter to Captain Kirkland, which was dated the 10th of June, at Curupayti, and which I did not receive till the 23d, as appears both from my diary and the verbal note of your honor, which you were kind enough to send me with the letter. The 23d was the day after my first visit to Berges, so that I could not by any possibility have had any such letter at that time in my possession, as no communication reached me from the 1st to the 23d of June, the day after my first visit.

In his second declaration you add that Berges says that it was at the time of my first visit to him after his return from San Fernando that I delivered this second letter from Caxias, and then he pretends to relate very minutely everything that took place on that occasion. That visit took place on the 22d of June. How long that was after his return I do not know. I only know that several days before I had heard of his return, and that he was at his house in the Salinares, very infirm. I thought it a duty of courtesy to visit him, and as I was passing by to go to the Trinidad and back by way of the house of Vasconcellos, I called for a few minutes to see him. He was lying in his east room, apparently very feeble. He was, or pretended to be so, paralyzed in his limbs, that he could hardly move in his bed. I expressed regret at finding him so, and we talked on general subjects, and nobody could have talked more loyally than he did on that occasion. But he did not rise from his bed; in fact, he appeared unable to do it; and after asking him if I could do anything to alleviate him, and inviting him to visit me when he got better, and promising to visit him again shortly, I took my leave, not having been, according to the best of my recollection, more than fifteen minutes in the house.

Such is the true and exact account of that visit. All that Berges says in his declaration about my giving him a letter from Caxias and waiting for him to read it, my taking up a book to pass the time, the conversation that passed, the taking of papers from a secret place in a writing-desk, the folding and labelling of the papers, all, every word is false—false as false can be.

I apprehend, however, as I have already said, that he has not the ingenuity to make up such a tissue of lies out of nothing, but that what passed between him and somebody else he has declared to be the transactions between himself and me. How that mysterious letter from Caxias was brought I do not know. I can think of no other way than that it came in that package of the Baron de Sousa. But if it came in that way, you can divine as well as I can by whom it was delivered.

It does not appear from the declaration of Berges that, at my second visit to him on the 3d of July, anything passed but expressions of courtesy. On that occasion, as on the former, I expressed sympathy for his sufferings and a desire to be of service to him. But I had no idea that he was then a traitor, plotting with the enemy against his own government; and at this time, as on my former visit, our brief conversation was carried on with doors and windows open, and servants passing to and fro at their pleasure. On neither occasion did Berges leave his bed.

If you will carefully scrutinize the dates of the occurrences that happened about this time I think you will find everything to corroborate, not only what I have stated, but my theory or explanation of the strange declaration of Berges. In your notes of the 23d you positively state that on the day after his arrival from San Fernando he delivered to me a certain package at his house in the Sa'inares. In his later declaration he says that it was at the time of my first visit, not specifying the day. That visit, however, was many days (I do not know how many) after his return, and I think (though it is only a speculation) that on closer investigation it will be found that the incidents about the package, that Berges alleges to have taken place between him and me, actually took place between him and one of his accomplices, before I had seen him or even knew of his return.

There is one other thing in Berges's declaration which, though not of much importance, will nevertheless serve as proof of its entire falsity. He says that I told him I would prefer to receive jewels or other things to keep for him in my legation rather than the papers which he wished to deliver me, and that I offered to take such things from him without charging the same per cent. or commission that I charged others. That this is a pure and malicious invention is evident from this fact, that though I have received since the order of evacuation money and other valuables from a great many people, I have never charged nor thought of charging a single person one penny for it. Many things left with me about the time of the evacuation have since been taken away, but I have never asked nor received from any one any commission, percentage, or compensation. How, then, could I make allusion to such a thing to Señor Berges?

From this statement you will see that if I have in any way been the means of conveying intelligence to and fro between the enemies and traitors to Paraguay, I have myself been the victim of the most damnable treachery and ingratitude. But I yet cherish the hope that of those who have abused my confidence the number will be found the smallest possible. I cannot yet bring myself to acknowledge that I am of a nature so credulous, and so unfit to be a minister, as to have in my house for near five months persons with whom I was on the most intimate terms, and all whose thoughts I ought to have known, and yet who were at the same time engaged in a plot against the government, without my suspecting it. I yet cherish the hope that a full investigation will clear this legation of having given shelter to such parties. But, if there be any who have thus abused my confidence and hospitality, it is not for me to ask for their pardon, but rather to demand their summary punishment.

As I have before said, I do not think it strange that, after the declaration of Berges, the government should have regarded me, and those around me, with suspicion. But I do think it was not showing me the respect to which my position and my long-known character and friendship for Paraguay was entitled, to accept without question as true the charges and accusations of a confessed traitor in the face of my positive denial. This matter, however, I shall leave to the sense of justice of the government of Paraguay.

After this long and explicit statement of all that I know or even suspect in regard to the treason of Berges and his accomplices, I trust that your government will believe that this legation is not so dangerous a place as it may have at one time been suspected. I have not in this note taken into consideration the case of Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman, as I was anxious to clear up the other matter as soon as possible, and with your permission I will delay any further discussion on that point until I shall again hear from your honor.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, August 6, 1868.

I had the honor to receive the note of your excellency of the 3d instant, in which, referring to mine of the 31st of July last, you say that after a long discussion concerning the points of difference as to whether or not Messrs. Bliss and Masterman are legally members of the legation, I gave you the most surprising information concerning the declaration of the ex-minister of foreign affairs, José Berges; that this note has caused you so much surprise and astonishment, and was of a character so serious and grave, that you confided that I would pardon you for first replying to that part of my note, leaving the other questions for another occasion—concluding in what relates to these that you have not taken into consideration in your note the case of Bliss and Masterman, as you were desirous of clearing up the other matter as soon as possible, and, with my permission, would delay all ulterior discussion on this point until you should hear from me again.

Respecting the grave matter of ex-Minister Berges, you observe that you profoundly regret that in a case of so serious a character I should take for facts what at best must be doubtful, and reiterate positively as if on my own knowledge what you on your own better knowledge have positively denied; that when a minister is virtually told that his words are not believed—that they are known to be false—certainly he would be excused if he should decline all further correspondence; but that, since you have promised to make known all that may be in your power to clear up of the terrible mystery by which you were surrounded, you would pass over this question of form, hoping that what you had to say might be useful to ascertain the truth.

Alluding to the declaration of Berges, you then say that it has led you to reflect and to call to mind all the incidents and circumstances which you could remember, and which can throw any light upon his strange conduct. You then go on to detail, with the aid of your diary, all that relates to the transmission of your dispatches, saying that on the 28th of April last you sent your last dispatches to Washington, passing them by flag of truce through the military lines; that you do not remember whether or not you sent any letters for other persons, but you presumed that you did, although you do not remember for whom; that you have sometimes sent letters for the Portuguese vice-consul, Vasconcellos, but that you did not remember if upon this occasion you did so.

That, on May 6, you received along with your communications from Washington a package of letters directed to you, with the name of the English secretary of legation in Buenos Ayres, G. F. Gould, on the margin; that on opening it you found that it was directed to the vice-consul of Portugal, accompanied by a note from the Portuguese chargé d'affaires in Montevideo, the Baron de Sousa, of which you send me a copy. That the said package also contained a letter for Dr. Carreras, which you brought and delivered to him, and which contained the same news as that of Vasconcellos—equally friendly towards Paraguay. That this is the only correspondence which has passed through your hands for many months from any person beyond the enemy's lines, and that if Berges speaks the truth, the communication which he says he received from Caxias by means of your legation, it must have been in that package from the Baron de Sousa.

That none of the last letters from the captain commanding the Wasp to you were accompanied by any letter for any other individual, nor had you sent with yours to him any letter for any one else.

That you cannot find words to express your surprise at the account given you of the declaration of ex-Minister Berges; that all is false from beginning to end, and that you believed that I would easily convince myself of this. And you continue to treat of the matter at length—impugning the declarations of Berges—concluding that all which he has said in it about the delivery of a letter from Caxias, of your waiting for him to read it, of your taking up a book to read, and all the rest, every word false, as false as false can be; that you presumed, nevertheless, that he had not the ingenuity to have made up from nothing this tissue of lies, but that what really passed between him and some other individual he has declared to be the transaction between himself and yourself, reiterating that you cannot conceive any other method for the letter of Caxias to come, if it were not included in the above-mentioned package from the Baron de Sousa.

Your excellency adds, that if by any means you have been the channel for conveying intelligence between the enemy and the traitors, you have yourself been the victim of the most infamous perfidy and ingratitude, saying finally that you did not consider it strange that, after the declaration of Berges, the government should have regarded you and all around you with suspicion, but that you considered that it was not showing you the respect demanded by your position, your character, and your friendship, long recognized, towards Paraguay; but that, nevertheless, you would leave this matter to the sentiment of justice of the government of Paraguay, trusting that after your long and explicit statement of all you knew or even suspected concerning the treason of Berges and his accomplices, I would believe that your legation is not so dangerous a place as I had at one time suspected.

In reply to this note of your excellency's, I must say in the first place that it is not the fault of this ministry that it has had to register in its official correspondence the declaration of the culprits, after all that I officially stated to you in the friendly visit which I made you on the 25th ultimo, and which is substantially contained in my note of the 31st. You will allow me to remark again that at the time I made you a verbal statement of all which I have since written down with regret, and that I then deplored the necessity of having to consign in notes that which you now also deplore. I had a greater interest then than any one that this should not happen, but at that time you expressed yourself very differently, and I do not wish to attribute this to any doubt of my word.

I do not think your judgment correct when you attribute to my government convictions which it has not manifested, since, without stating any opinion upon so grave a matter, I limited myself to make known to you the things which were communicated to this ministry by the proper tribunal, to support the demands required of me in the name of the national courts of justice, in the name of the preservation of the country and of its government; and you ought to persuade yourself that in fact it was very difficult for this ministry to reconcile the sentiments of friendly interest which had always been expressed in official notes by the representative of the friendly nation of the United States with the proceedings which the traitors attribute to your excellency.

I regret that you have interpreted in a sense different from the true one the significance of the just representations addressed by this ministry to the chief of the American legation upon the subjects which, in discharging its duty, it has had to treat of, and whose importance and urgency are notorious. You say that proper consideration has not been manifested to your position and character, and this ministry believes itself to have abounded in such respect as it has never done towards any minister, and that if there were any reason for complaint it would belong to this government to make it, since all that has been said to you, Mr. Minister, in demand of the criminals whom you shelter, has not been enough; and nothing more could have been said in the initiatory steps of a trial which, by its monstrosity, was scarcely creditable. I ought also to observe to you that even to-day I ought not, perhaps, to continue to make mention of the information supplied by the tribunal, for fear that something which I may say will appear to you inconsistent, not having in my power the originals of the processes; but I wish to run the risk rather than fail to give you all the light which the tribunals communicate, thus satisfying your desires, Mr. Minister, in order that you may understand the grave nature of the matter, and in order to dissipate by all the means in my power the darkness in which you say that you were groping.

I cannot doubt, Mr. Minister, that it will be very painful for you to learn that the persons whose honorable character and purity of sentiment you so much vaunted in your note of the 13th of July now appear before the tribunal, not only as fully acquainted with your sentiments, tendencies, and intentions, but also as having been supported by you in a directly contrary sense, as you may judge by their own words as communicated to me by the court of justice.

Dr. Antonio de las Carreras has, in a solemn declaration, said the following:

That, as to the terms of these conversations about the revolution, reference was made in the early period of his stay in the legation to the project of the revolution, to the means which were counted upon, and the probabilities of the result, and afterwards to the stupidity of the allies in their manner of conducting the operations relating to it, viz., to appear upon the Tebicuari with twelve thousand men, which was not done within the time agreed upon: to the failure or cessation of the probabilities of the success of the project; and, finally, when the imprisonment of some of the persons compromised became known, to consider the affair as discovered and its consequences as palpable.

That, speaking of the plan in general, Mr. Washburn always thought the idea a good one, and as to the details he also thought them good, provided the Brazilians (as Mr. Washburn always said, using but rarely the word allies) should pass the Tebicuari; that is to say, that in Mr. Washburn's opinion Marshal Lopez and the national cause were lost, and that he believed the success of the revolution easy, since when Humaita should be cut off—there not being elsewhere sufficient forces to resist a column of twelve thousand men—and the forces in the capital and other points depending upon persons who were compromised in the revolution, the pronunciamiento would be easy, since there could be no resistance, and consequently the submission of the rest of the country.

That as to the part which Mr. Washburn has taken in revolution he [the deponent] knows by what Washburn himself said to him that he [Mr. Washburn] had undertaken to forward the correspondence of the revolutionary committee to the enemy, under the seal of the consulate of Portugal, in order thus to save himself from the responsibility; telling him also that he had fulfilled his part by always sending the correspondence every time that he has had occasion to send his own to his government by flag of truce, except the last time, when he only sent a letter to the commander of the Wasp, ordering him to come up to San Fernando. That Washburn also told him that he had offered his house to Berges as an asylum for all the parties compromised in the revolution, and that he notified Berges himself of the occasions when there would be sent a flag of truce, in order that he, as well as the other members of the committee, might prepare their communications for the enemy, the deponent being one of those who had written to Caxias more times than those previously declared.

That, besides what has been said, they conversed upon the assurances which Berges and Benigno gave of counting upon the forces in the capital by bribery or other means, which project Mr. Washburn approved as a sure mode of success, avoiding the effusion of blood.

As to the time agreed upon, that in the first place it was to be when the squadron should pass above Humaita, which event had been announced by correspondence several months before, (five or six,) and after its passage the movement was announced for two or three occasions, until at last the time was fixed at about the middle of July. All which gave rise to some sarcastic expressions from Mr. Washburn; as, for example, "They are brutes;" * * * "They are more Brazilian than the Brazilians themselves;" * * * "Caxias is nothing but a good military organizer, but, for the rest, is a complete nullity;" manifesting the little confidence he had in Caxias's promises, and regretting that the time should be lost by such stupidity on the part of the Brazilians.

That, suspecting by the imprisonments that the government had got hold of the thread of the affair, Mr. Washburn said that he lamented the fate of many persons compromised, such as Berges, Bedoya, Benigno, the deponent, Rodriguez, Bliss, and others, and that he considered the end of the war postponed, since, the revolution having failed and the Brazilians not making any movement, affairs would return to their previous state; that he offered to the deponent, to Rodriguez, and to Bliss, to make a stand for the right of asylum in their behalf, knowing them to be compromised in the affair of the revolution, which, says the deponent, he himself, and Rodriguez, did not wish to accept.

That the reason why the deponent and Rodriguez did not wish to accept the asylum in which, at the last moment, Mr. Washburn wished to uphold them against the demands of the government was, precisely, because they held an opinion different from that of the minister, which opinion he (the deponent) says he made known from the day when Leite Pereira presented himself in the legation, on the occasion of consulting them (the deponent and Rodriguez) as to whether he had a right to resist the delivery of a refugee in case of being demanded as a criminal by the government; to which they replied that they thought he had no such right, citing some authors of note, such as Vattel, Martens, Wheaton, Pinheiro, Ferreira, &c., and that notwithstanding this opinion of the deponent and Rodriguez, when they had to leave on the demand of a court of justice, Mr. Washburn said to them, "If you wish to remain here I will resist;" to which, as already stated, they did not agree, having resolved to defend themselves before the authorities, making head against the charges that might be against them; that Mr. Washburn then said to them, "I hope that you will not say anything to compromise me;" to which both replied that there was no occasion to fear that, and that he might rest easy in that respect; adding the deponent, that by this was understood that they were not to betray anything relating to the revolution, and that the minister would besides hold his ground, as there was no written proof against him.

That when Mr. Washburn returned from San Fernando he said to the deponent that he had been informed that Berges was very ill, with the half of his body paralyzed, which induced him to believe, as Washburn himself said, that the revolution was not discovered.

By these detailed statements, and others relating to this grave affair, I ought to hope that you, Mr. Minister, will doubtless see with pain that far from being but a small number who declare in this sense, they comprise all those persons who have given rise to correspondence from this ministry to obtain their departure from their asylum.

It has never been my intention to seek impossibilities, as you attribute to me for my friendly visit of the 25th ultimo, whose object and tendencies were most cordial and benevolent; and as you assure me that you intended to convince me of it in your note, I have eagerly sought in it the foundation for such conviction; but I have only been able to find reiterated exception, along with some incidental circumstances relating to your correspondence with the exterior (of the military lines.)

When your excellency says that you flatter yourself that whatever may be my opinion, the Marquis de Caxias considers you as a friend of Paraguay, and such a friend as Brazilian gold is impotent to seduce, I ought to declare in my turn that whatever may be my opinion, I have never failed to recognize the friendly acts which you have performed before now in behalf of my country; and as to what Caxias may think, I can say nothing of the matter, and that I think I ought to call your attention to my correspondence with you, since, in my opinion, I have used no expression tending to depreciate you, nor emitted any opinion which can be interpreted in the sense attributed by your note, nor yet the gratuitous interpretation of your words being false, since I have not said to your excellency that your assertions were false, and that they deserved no credit. It has been precisely with a proper respect for you, Mr. Minister, and giving credence to your official words, that my government has proceeded in this grave affair with all possible circumspection and decorum, probably to the detriment of the urgency which the case demanded.

And your complaint is so much the more to be regretted when you blame my government for refusing to give credit to your positive statements as against those of an accused, convicted, and confessed traitor, while your government was debating whether or not it would make war on Brazil on account of your representations and your situation. It is beyond my power to comprehend the reason which you have for consigning in an official note an accusation as gratuitous as grave against my government, for the simple fact of having used its right in a demand which interests in a lively manner its legitimate defence, and when the country is in a state of open war in defense of its independence, which is menaced with destruction by the empire of Brazil and its allies, and also menaced by an internal conspiracy by agreement with them.

It is true that you, when requested to give up the package of communications which Berges says he delivered into your own hands, have stated verbally and in writing the falsity of the "assumed" fact, but the ex-minister Berges affirms and ratifies it in his sworn declarations, at the same time that you say, respecting him, that you do not suppose that he would do so through malice towards you, since you had no reason to believe that he ever cherished such sentiments towards you.

My government could not regard with indifference that statement, of so important a nature, concerning the package of communications referred to, and it could not give any ground for complaint by making use of it in official communications, much more after what has passed. I repeat that there is no reason for making such a complaint as is contained in your note.

I will ingenuously confess that I have not sufficient light on the subject to be able to interpret properly, in view of what has passed, what you say to the effect that, if you had been earlier informed of the declaration of Berges, much of this long and disagreeable correspondence might have been avoided, for even now, with a full knowledge of the facts, you oblige me to maintain this same correspondence indefinitely upon this subject, and, what is more, upon the demand made for the criminals, Bliss and Masterman, whom you retain there against all justice.

In your note of the 25th of July, in giving explanation, you have had recourse to your diary, where you had recorded even the circumstance that, visiting Señora Doña Junana Carrillo de Lopez, you found her well, but "sad." I will observe that that same diary now appears deficient, when you do not remember whether or not you sent with your correspondence of the 28th of April any letters for other persons; and supposing you to have sent such, you do not remember for whom. With your permission, I will consign here some declarations which are not foreign to the case.

Antonio de las Carreras declares—

That, on the 28th of April, he sent a letter to Caxias, under cover to D. Juan Francisco Gowland, in Buenos Ayres; that under this cover he sent a letter to Don Juan Jacinto Berges, in which was contained the said letter for Caxias; that the deponent delivered this letter to Mr. Washburn, in person, to be sent on that occasion, and that in fact the minister did send it with his correspondence, under his own seal; that when he wrote this letter the deponent said to Mr. Washburn, "I am going to improve the opportunity to write my correspondence for below;" to which the minister replied, "All right, and that he should hand in the letters the next day, as he was then going to close up his own;" the deponent stating here that although he did not expressly say to Mr. Washburn that he was going to write to Caxias, he [Mr. Washburn] so understood it to be so—that is to say, that if he did not express that idea, the minister could not be ignorant of it; but that he did not expressly state it "because" Mr. Washburn was not ignorant of it, since Mr. Washburn always knew of the correspondence exchanged between the enemy and the revolutionists; that the contents of the letter written to Caxias was an account of the situation of the country, and of the change wrought in the circumstances by the retreat of Marshal Lopez to the line of the Tebicuari, which to a certain degree confused the previous plans of the revolutionists, and the consequent necessity of remedying this by a bold operation as soon as possible, demanding of him in that respect to send the column offered, and to move up the squadron without loss of time.

That by the gunboat Wasp he received the last letter of Caxias, which was delivered to him by Mr. Washburn, who then received a package of letters for Vasconcellos, and having gone personally to take it to him in his chaera in Trinidad. Vasconcellos there opened the package, and found in it a roll of letters for the deponent, which he delivered to the same conductor, (Washburn,) to be conveyed to the deponent at the legation; that in the roll came a letter for Anavitarte, another for Tomé, and three for the deponent, one of which was that from the Marquis of Caxias, dated the 16th or the 18th of March, and the others were, one from his brother Eduardo, and another from Bargas, the letter of Caxias coming in that of the latter.

This statement harmonizes with that of Vasconcellos, who says, "that he lately received by the gunboat Wasp a large letter for Carreras, which might contain about four sheets of letter paper, which came to him in the package from the Baron de Sousa, and the Minister Washburn carried it to him in his chacra at Trinidad, and, opening it in his presence, he found the said letter for Carreras, and gave it him to be delivered at the legation, as the minister did immediately upon his return," thus resulting that correspondences have been carried on with impunity between the revolutionary conspirators and the enemy in arms against the republic. I leave to the just appreciation of your excellency this fact, and pass on.

You mention in your note that, on one occasion, when you were about to send your letters, Berges requested you to include some for him; that you refused to do so, giving for reason that it would be an abuse of the faith and confidence of the allies. I recognize in your excellency the principle of strict neutrality, which you observed in this case, by your refusal to allow Berges to send letters of the ministry which he occupied; but I ought to protest to your excellency my surprise at seeing by your own declaration, Mr. Minister, that this principle, justly observed as towards the allies, has not been so well kept in favor of the Paraguayan government and people, and that the flags of truce, afforded to the minister of a friendly nation for his official correspondence with his government and colleagues, have come to be the guaranteed safe conduct to carry on the correspondences of the enemy, and stir up treason under the guise of family letters, as you style those which you received and sent away under your seal.

"How that mysterious letter of Caxias was brought," says your excellency, "I do not know," adding that you cannot conceive any means but that it may have come in the package from the Baron de Sousa. On this point you will allow me to transcribe the following declarations, in addition to those which have been previously inserted from Carreras. Berges declares anew:

That Mr. Washburn, having received among his communications brought by the gunboat Wasp the last letter of the Marquis de Caxias, (directed to the deponent,) and he being in this encampment, he did not deliver it at the time of his (Mr. Washburn's) visit to the same point, but awaited his return to the capital to carry it to him personally, as he did at his house at Salinares, as he has already declared before the tribunals, a circumstance which reveals the motive of Mr. Washburn's knowledge (circunstancia que revela el motivo del conocimiento) of the correspondence of the deponent with the enemy's general.

That his reply to the first letter of Caxias went by the same channel, viz: by Mr. Washburn, to whom the deponent delivered it, (on an occasion when he had come to visit him in the ministry,) with the address to one Señor Brito, successor of Octaviano, in Buenos Ayres, not doubting, says the deponent, that Mr. Washburn knew that there was contained in it the reply to Caxias, since he already understood these communications, although they did not then speak with so much frankness and confidence on the subject of the treason to overthrow the government as at a later time, when Mr. Washburn had gone to reside in the country-house at Trinidad.

Carreras declares as follows upon this point:

That he has the most profound conviction, and would be willing to put his hands in the fire to assure that there exist in the office of the American minister, and probably in an iron safe there, the papers brought from the house of Berges, as he has previously declared.

You observe that it does not appear from the declaration of Berges that anything but expressions of courtesy passed upon your second visit of July 3. That upon that occasion, as upon the previous one, you expressed sympathy for his sufferings and desired to be of some use to him. Certainly the deponent has stated nothing very special concerning the visit of that day, except your offer as minister and as friend, understanding by this an offer of asylum for any unlooked-for event. Notwithstanding, he has, in his declarations, made a series of revelations of importance, which I shall allow myself to transcribe so far as they relate to your excellency with the object already mentioned. He says:

That at the time of the severe illness of his excellency the marshal in Paso Pucú, in 1866, the American minister called upon him, or wrote to him, daily, to learn his excellency's state of health; that for this reason their relations became very frequent, and began by indicating to him the necessity of coming to terms with the allies, indicating as a person very proper for this object General Bartolomé Mitre, since he could speak with him with more frankness than with the other chieftains. That he (Mr. Washburn) went so far as to say that the motive of the war was nothing but the question of limits; that Paraguay had not the means of peopling the great deserts of her territory without calling in European colonization, which was very unlikely to come to these missions or retired places until the republics of La Plata were settled up; that the line from the Apa to the Igatimé, which was claimed by Brazil, ought to be ceded to that empire; and the Misiones beyond the Parana, as well as a part of the Chaco, to the Argentine Republic.

That when Mr. Washburn paid his visit to the Marquis de Caxias to treat with him about peace arrangements, he carried neither the spirit nor the desire of laboring in favor of the interests of Paraguay, and, on the contrary, cherished the conviction that Paraguay would be conquered and subjugated by the allied forces; that (he said) they had great resources, being in contact with all the world, and that Paraguay, however she might rely upon the abnegation and valor of her sons, who deserved to enjoy greater liberty, could never be victorious on account of the lack of resources, and that it was pitiful that this race of brave men should disappear from the face of the earth; that if Washburn left the capital ill-disposed to treat with the enemy's general, he returned from that camp with even worse dispositions, which that general had succeeded in producing.

That it is the deponent's opinion that when Mr. Washburn made such efforts to return to this country it was all a farce, in order to deceive the Paraguayan government, and that his real desire was to labor in behalf of the allies, by agreement with his colleague in Rio Janeiro, the general who is the American minister at that court. In addition to the conversations which the deponent has had with Washburn, who always endeavored to discourage him, there are the revelations which the English minister, Mathews, made to his government, and which certainly place Washburn in a tight place, (dejan colgado a Washburn.) To which should be added that here he has never been willing to give credit to the papers of the country when they gave news of the brilliant feats of arms and partial episodes of the war, saying that they were not only incredible but ridiculously fabulous, and that these exaggerations could pass current only among the Paraguayans, who were for the most part a rustic and ignorant herd. He would never credit any news favorable to Paraguay in all the course of the war; even at the time of the defeat of the enemy at Curupayti he pretended that it was simply a retreat of the enemy, referring to information given him by Mr. Cochelet, who had received it from the French agent, who was present at that combat.

That, in fine, the spirit of Mr. Washburn is completely hostile to Paraguay and to its government, and that he constantly sought for some occasion of controversy in order to get away from the country, which the deponent has been able to elude by calming down, by means of his personal friendship, Mr. Washburn's constant tendency to produce a breach.

That no one is ignorant of the hostility which the ex-consul of France, Mr. Cochelet, always manifested, delighting in creating obstacles of every kind for the government of the republic, and Cochelet was an intimate friend of Washburn's, who lamented that he had been replaced by a man so null, so informal, and of so little credit as Mr. Cuverville; that he also regretted that the Italian consul, Mr. Chaperon, should be so much under the influence of Cuverville, who carried him always in tow; that he also regretted that there was no agent of the English government in Asuncion, since a concert of the four might have made a fine opposition to the evacuation of the capital, and would have put the Paraguayan government to its trumps (hubieran puesto en prensa) before they would have abandoned their posts.

That, in the opinion of the deponent, Mr. Washburn has received money from the government of Brazil, and desired to get some out of the Paraguayan government, to make his market with friend and foe, and since he has not succeeded in this, his constant and daily views have been to work against the interests of the country, endeavoring to produce discouragement among its sons.

That after the return of Mr. Washburn from the enemy's camp, on the occasion of having gone there for the peace arrangements referred to, in one of the visits which he made to the deponent in the office of his ministry, he asked for a map, and pointed out the ease with which Caxias could extend his line of circumvallation so as to leave Paso Pucú and Humaita blockaded by land, adding, "When Humaita is taken, all is over."

That to this the deponent replied, "We should still have the line of the Tebicuari, that of the Paray in Villetta, the Cordillera, and, finally, the war of resources such as Juarez waged against Maximilian," and that Washburn replied, "Juarez deserved the sympathy of all the world, and, above all, that of the American government, and you have not; he received supplies from all parts, which you are destitute of." That the deponent again insisted on the advantages of the line of the Cordillera, saying, "that we should there be in contact with the agricultural departments, the most productive of the country, and that it is on the Upper Paraguay that we have the greatest abundance of cattle, to which he added the nature of the ground, which would afford a defensive position at every step," and Washburn, picking up his hat, said, laughingly, "You are very brave," (es V. muy guapo,) and withdrew.

That he frequently came to the ministry to ask news from the army, its state, and that of the war; and as the deponent generally replied that there was nothing of importance, he used generally to say something calculated to discourage us, as, for example, "that he knew there was much desertion in the Paraguayan army; that Caxias had received great reinforcements; that more iron-clads had arrived from Europe to the Rio de la Plata; that the war was very popular in Brazil; that public spirit in the Argentine Republic had arisen; that the allies could get all the money they wanted; that the national cause had no sympathy in Europe, where the enemy's press drowned the voices of our few agents beyond the sea." That the deponent asked where he got such items of information, and Washburn replied, jokingly, "The birds have told me," and that the deponent some time afterwards made use of this expression, asking him, "What do the birds say?" To which Washburn sometimes replied, "The birds are dumb at present, but they will have much to say about our bad situation." That since Mr. Washburn went to live at Trinidad his visits became less frequent to the ministry, but his relations were more frank. That the object of his visits was to ask for news from the army, and when the deponent said to him that he knew of nothing decisive, but only partial engagements, he, Washburn, would reply furiously against the allies, with the following or similar expressions: "They are unworthy to conquer; they lose the best opportunity of subjugating Paraguay, now that you are ready to support them, or rather to do all; Brazil ought to be struck from the catalogue of nations for the nullity of its rulers and generals." That he could not understand why they did not improve the rise of the river to bring up a force in their iron-clads and other vessels to land in the neighborhood of the city; that he also marvelled and lamented that the movement by land against Caapucu by the pass of the Tebicuari should have failed; that sometimes he thought Caxias distrusted the persons who had written to him; and, after all, said he, these are old men's proceedings, men who are incompetent to undertake anything of consequence.

That several visits passed after this fashion, Washburn always deploring the inactivity of the allies, until one day he came to the ministry smiling and in good humor, saying to the deponent, "So then, at last, they have made the movement by the Tebicuari, for I have learned that the allies have taken two 'partidos' on the coast of the Tebicuari (Guazuca and San Juan) without any resistance from the Paraguayans; we now look for the movement of the fleet, and you (the revolutionists) ought not to go to sleep, but get ready to formally second the movement."

That on this same occasion he inquired of the deponent if Caxias had not written to the committee or to Don Benigno to inform them of this movement, and when he replied in the negative, Washburn doubted what he said, remarking, "You have no confidence in me: you always make use of Paraguayan distrust, although you have been in North America, where you ought to have learned something of our frank and sincere habits." To which the deponent replied that his information was, that there had only been a scouting party to bring in cattle; and the minister replied, "Incursions into an enemy's country always begin in that manner, by sending small bodies to explore the ground and calculate the resistance which may be made;" and that although the deponent endeavored to show that this was not the movement waited for by the revolutionists, the minister was so blinded with this idea, that he continued to expect the prompt appearance on the Tebicuari of the principal body of the allied force which was announced.

That on another occasion, after the minister had gone to his country residence, he had another conversation with the deponent in the ministry, and said to him that by a strange coincidence all interests were placed outside of the country; that he (Washburn) remained here to support the insurgent Paraguayans, doing without the most necessary things, such as sugar, brandy, coffee, wine, macaroni, and even clothing, and that he had nothing to drink but the cane of the country; that the deponent replied, "As I have been told, you do not fare so badly at Yvyray, and, besides, with money and yerba you can buy a turkey," alluding to the fact that Washburn frequently asked the deponent for yerba, and received it in tercios from the treasury to buy fowls and eggs, and that the expression a turkey was one of the minister's ways of expressing himself, the deponent here adding that this is a genuine Yankee expression.

That in one of his visits to the deponent, in his house in Salinares, after returning from his last visit to the army, the minister said to him, "Don't you see how this is?" (alluding to the fact that the line of the Tebicuari was already fortified without having giving time to the revolutionists.) "I shall perhaps be obliged to leave the country temporarily, to accompany my wife, but there [out of the country] I can be more useful to you [the revolutionist] by laboring in your behalf, [in favor of the revolution, as was understood, says the deponent, since the minister did not wish to use openly the words revolution or conspiracy;] and I hope to be back within a year;" that the deponent replied, "When you are out of the country endeavor to be sent to Chile as minister, as you yourself told me you had written to Mr. Seward, proposing that exchange;" to which he replied, "By no means would I do such an act of baseness, being compromised with you to support the movement," (revolution.)

That Mr. Washburn said to the deponent, after returning from the enemy's camp, that he was going to write to Mr. Seward, and say to him that the government of Marshal Lopez was losing much of its popularity through the events of the war, and that even its best friends were falling off from it; which, according to the deponent's opinion, Mr. Washburn intended to write, in order to prepare his government for the revolutionary movement agreed upon.

That, in referring to this incident, deponent wishes to make known how far Mr. Washburn was then opposed to this republic and its government, after his conversation with the enemy's general, under pretext of a peace arrangement.

That at the same time he also said that the war ought to be terminated; that the Argentine government, in case of the triumph of the allies, which he regarded as sure, would necessarily take all the missions up to Tebicuari, and the country would be left about as big as my hand, (opening his hand at the word;) and Brazil would take the rest of the country for the expenses of the war, adding that Brazil spent a million a day; adding that Paraguay having to pay this immense debt, it would fall to Brazil, and form part of that empire, and would thus be better off than when a colony; that the deponent objected that it was not possible that Brazil should spend a million a day, since even North America in the great civil war had not spent more; to which Washburn replied that that was at the beginning, but that later the expenses had amounted to three millions a day; adding, "Above all, they steal a great deal in Brazil, so as to make up the million a day, and they will show for it the accounts of the Great Captain."

I thank your excellency for having had the kindness to make known to me the note of the Baron de Sousa, chargé d'affaires of Portugal, and for all which you have been pleased to set forth in your long communication, in fulfillment of the desire which you have manifested of clearing up the facts relative to the treason of Berges and his accomplices.

I confidently hope that with these new items of information, taken textually from the declarations of the criminals, you will become convinced of the grave nature of the affair which forms the subject of our correspondence, and that, taking into consideration my previous note of July 31, will also admit the reasons alleged by this ministry to show that Porter Cornelius Bliss and George F. Masterman are not members of the legation of the United States of America, but treacherous criminals, who, like others, have attempted to abuse your good faith, and that, as such, they will be expelled, to appear in satisfaction of the requirements of justice, fulfilling in this manner also your excellency's desires, that if there have been persons who have thus abused your confidence and hospitality, it did not become you to ask for their pardon, but rather to demand their summary punishment.

I embrace this occasion to renew to your excellency the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benítez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, August 11, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note bearing date of the 6th instant, but not received by me till the evening of the 7th.

In this note you advise me that ex-Minister Berges has made another declaration, giving at great length conversations with me, from which he inferred I knew long ago of his treason, and his reasons for believing I never had been a friend of Paraguay, but rather a friend to him and his fellow-conspirators. I am likewise informed that Dr. Carreras has also made a declaration, in which he acknowledges that he was in correspondence with the Marquis de Caxias, and that he sent his letters through this Legation, and that I was at the time aware of the fact. You also take occasion to protest that in your previous note you had no intention to express any doubt as to the truth of my words, but had limited yourself to giving the declarations of criminals.

Regarding this last matter, the correspondence itself will show whether or not I had reason to complain. But you will remember that after I had distinctly, and in language as clear as I could use, declared that I had never received any package, or letter, or communication of any kind from Berges, you repeatedly expressed in your note of the 31st ultimo your regret that, in spite of all your friendly efforts, I still refused to deliver up—not the package that he said he delivered to me, but the package which he did deliver, thus assuming, as it appears to me, that, in spite of my absolute denial, he had done so, and you knew it. But I have no wish to discuss technical or verbal questions. Your disclaimer, that it was not your intention to question the truth of my statements, I shall accept as satisfactory.

You then state that it is not your fault that you have been obliged to put in your official correspondence the declarations of criminals, as you had in a friendly manner, in the personal interview of the 25th of July, informed me of all that you afterwards wrote in your official notes. To this I must object to this extent: You told me that you knew all; that you knew I had received such a package from Berges; and that you also knew of my relations with the traitors. I told you that you could not know of things which did not exist. But you did not tell me of any specific declaration of anybody, and I had no more idea of what you were alluding to, or of what might be the purport of your next note, than I now have of the questions to be discussed this evening by the Parliament of England. As I knew of no such package, and as I had never heard the words conspiracy, combination, collusion, or correspondence with the enemy, and did not believe there were any persons in the country so utterly reckless and foolish as to engage in any such desperate enterprise, I think I was justified in saying that in coming to me for information you were seeking after impossibilities. You were looking for proof where it did not exist.

The report of the declaration of Dr. Carreras, as given to me in your note, is so full of news, and contains so many statements of occurrences and circumstances that I never heard of or suspected before, that it seems to be unnecessary to examine them in detail. I will therefore give, to the best of my recollection, all that I know of him or his doings in this country.

A long time ago—I think nearly a year—at a time when, owing to certain rumors, it was believed that the war was not going on favorably to the cause of Paraguay, Dr. Carreras came to my house, and in the course of conversation expressed his apprehension that if the allies were to succeed he would be in very great danger; that he was very obnoxious to them by reason of the active part he had taken against them, as head of the government of Montevideo, at the commencement of the war. I told him that, in such emergency, whenever he felt the danger to be nigh, if he came to my house, I would give him all the protection that my legation and flag could afford. Nothing more was ever said on that subject till we received the news that a part of the enemy's squadron had passed Humaita. The next day Rodriguez Larreta came to my house, and said that Carreras was then inclined to except my offer of months before, and that if it was agreeable to me, he would accompany him. I told him to act according to his own pleasure, and that I should do all in my power to aid and protect all persons who might be obnoxious to the enemy. The next day, if I recollect aright, they both came in, and I gave them shelter. We all believed that their residence here would be but a temporary affair—a few days more or less. Yet, when the iron-clads came up the next day, and returned after making such a sorry exhibition of themselves, it appeared that though they had passed Humaita, the enemy were afraid to take the chances of a general and decisive battle. Then both Carreras and Rodriguez expressed their fears that they were an incumbrance in our family; but we told them to be easy on that score; the town having been evacuated, we wanted company, and as they were both men of education and intelligence, we preferred that they should remain with us. One important object in this was that we might learn Spanish. They remained, therefore, but never was a word, or hint, or expression made in my hearing or to my knowledge, by either of them, in regard to any conspiracy, revolution, or political combination against the government. On the contrary, when I went down to San Fernando, Dr. Carreras requested me particularly to advise his excellency Marshal Lopez of the pecuniary loss he was subjected to by remaining, and to say that he came here as the determined enemy of Brazil and her policy, and that he had not changed his opinions since he had been here, and that if he could get away, it was his purpose to go to the Pacific States, to enlist them in behalf of the cause of Paraguay. These representations I made to his excellency, but as I saw he was not disposed to give a favorable answer, I so reported to Carreras on my return. But though he seemed to be disappointed, he never intimated to me any knowledge of a conspiracy, or gave me the least intimation that he had ever had any communication with Caxias.

A few days previous to receiving information of the arrival of the Wasp at Curupayti, I had sent away my last despatches for Washington—that is, on the 28th of April. You express regret that I should not have noted in my diary the names of the persons for whom I sent letters. I also regret it. But such is the fact, and it is now too late to remedy it. The declaration of Carreras, however, calls to mind one circumstance that I had previously forgotten. It is, that he sent letters at that time under cover to John F. Gowland. That, I believe, is correct. He did send his letters thus addressed, thinking, or pretending to think, that being thus directed, there would be less danger that they would fall into the hands of the enemy than if directed to members of his own family. He professed to fear lest his letters would be intercepted or opened on the other side, and therefore sent them to a friend in Buenos Ayres, to avoid suspicion. I had known Mr. Gowland as the most enthusiastic friend of Paraguay I had ever met in Buenos Ayres or Montevideo, and as Carreras said his letters were only family letters, I could not imagine that any Paraguayan interest could be prejudiced by sending them. I may have been wrong in sending letters for anybody without first knowing their contents, but, as the minister of foreign affairs had already asked me to do the same thing for him, I could not suppose that the government would object to my sending family letters from persons holding no official position. If Berges, as minister, could ask me to send his letters at a time when I believed him a loyal man and a patriot, can't his government complain with justice that I sent family letters for other persons? But why ask questions of this kind? The government does not complain that I did not send the letters of Berges, but that I did. I, on the contrary, say that I never did send a letter for him under flag of truce, and I never could send any in any other way since my return from Paso Pucu, in March, 1867, at which time I presumed Berges was still loyal; and in sending through his letters and other correspondence I supposed I was doing a favor to the government.

After my return from San Fernando nothing occurred to vary the monotony until, on the 16th of June, Leite Pereira and his wife appeared here, to the surprise and regret of all, and asked permission to stay. I could not turn them away without exposing myself to the charge of inhospitality, and though in my judgment his coming here was an unwise step, yet, if he preferred to remain, and see if the government had anything against him, he might do so. This resolution of mine was approved by both Carreras and Rodriguez, and they both agreed, with me, that it was not a wise step for Pereira to take. We knew, or at least I knew, nothing of the relations of Pereira with the government, except what he then told me. And I remember well that on the day of his arrival Rodriguez told me he had told Pereira that if the government had anything against him—if he was in any way implicated in any transaction that might compromise him—he ought to confess all and everything to me confidentially before taking up his residence in my legation, and exposing me, my family, and all the other inmates of my house to the annoyance and pain that, if there were anything serious against him, would result from his coming here. But Pereira always said there was and could be nothing against him, except that he had spent all his own money, and all he could borrow, to relieve the necessities of destitute foreigners, trusting that they or their friends or their governments would repay him after the war. He always protested, however, that he had no security nor assurance from any government that a single shilling would ever be repaid to him.

When, on the 27th of June, you requested me to deliver up the said Leite Pereira, you will recollect I declined to do so, and in my note of the next day I took the ground that I was under no obligations either to deliver up or send from my legation any person who was not specifically accused of some grave offence against the government or laws. I have ever since strictly adhered to this position, and when I received your note of the 11th of July, repeating your request that he and all the others not belonging to the legation should be sent away from it, but making no specific charge against him or any one else, I told them all that they might go or stay; that I should turn no one into the streets till some charge was made. Pereira was of opinion, in which Carreras, Rodriguez, and myself concurred, that he had better go voluntarily, as, if the government had nothing against him, he would have nothing to fear, and if it had, it would certainly get possession of him, either by making a specific charge or by taking him away by force. The next day Carreras and Rodriguez were called for in still more urgent terms; but as no specific charge was made against them, I told them, as I had told Pereira the day before, that they could go or stay, as to them should appear the better course. They both said that the government had not, and could not have, any specific charge against them; that they had done nothing during their residence in Paraguay that could compromise either themselves or anybody else; and that, if every act of their lives were known to the government, not a thing could be discovered hostile to it. They, therefore, said that if I would promise to remain in Paraguay till the close of the war they would not leave the legation, as, if I refused to send them away till direct charge was alleged to them, which charge, they said, it was impossible to make, they did not believe that the government would take them by force. But I told them I could not promise to remain in Paraguay till the end of the war; I was every day expecting the American gunboat, that would probably bring me instructions to return immediately to the United States, and also very likely bring a successor to take my place as minister. Under those circumstances I could not promise to remain in Paraguay to the end of the war. They both said, then, it would be better for them to go away voluntarily, as a few days or weeks, more or less, would make little difference, and if the fortune of war were to be finally adverse to Paraguay, they would at last be exposed to fall into the hands of the enemy, from whom they expected little mercy. Carreras particularly dwelt upon the dangers to which he would be exposed if ever he fell into the enemies' hands, and, I thought, did not, when he left, appear quite satisfied with my course. He seemed to think that I ought to have promised to stay till the end of the war. He may have felt a deep resentment towards me on that account; but it is hard for me to believe that from such motive he would fabricate a series of such monstrous falsehoods as appear in his declaration, and try to implicate me as knowing of a conspiracy of whose existence I had not the most remote idea. But I can think of no other motive that could have induced him to make a declaration so false and so wicked. In fact, the more I know of this affair, the greater is the mystery in which I am involved. I can make nothing of it except that, directly under my eyes, there was a horrible conspiracy being formed, of which I knew or suspected nothing, and that the parties to it, after having abused my confidence and hospitality, have sought to divert the world's indignation from themselves by implicating in their crimes the minister of a great, a powerful, and an honorable nation. I may be wrong in my suspicions. God knows I would not wrongfully or unjustly accuse or suspect anybody; but that there has been treachery, ingratitude, and villainy practiced upon me in some quarter is but too evident. All, however, will some day be made clear, and the guilty parties must hold a place in the history of infamy never before paralleled.

As this statement of mine is entirely inconsistent with, and directly contradicts, everything in the declaration of Carreras, it is not necessary to deny in detail the numerous falsehoods which it contains. The two statements are directly at variance. There is no possibility of harmonizing or mixing the two. One or the other is a string of monstrous falsehoods, and I leave it to the government of Paraguay to pronounce which it will accept as the true one.

There is one point, however, in this declaration of Carreras on which I would be glad to have further information. It is that where he says he has

The most profound conviction that there exists in the office of this legation—probably in an iron safe there—the papers brought from the house of Berges, as he has previously declared

Of course, I cannot know, for a certainty that among the multiplicity of sealed papers, trunks, and boxes that have been left in my house within the last six months, that none of them contain the papers referred to. Yet I do not believe it. But if there be such papers here, and the person who left them or sent them will send me a written order for their delivery, and give such a description of the package that I may know it, I shall be most happy to deliver it. But I have no knowledge of any such papers.

The statement of Vasconcellos, that there was a letter for Carreras in the package sent by the Baron de Sousa, and that I brought it in from his chacra and delivered it, contains, so far as I can see, but two errors; and as these are not important, his declaration may be considered as truthful in comparison with the others. He says he opened the package of Baron de Sousa in my presence, and that the letter which he delivered to me for Carreras was a large one. Neither of these statements is correct. He took the package inside to open it, while I sat outside, and brought out some of his own letters, which he read, and afterwards gave me not a large, but a very small, letter for Carreras, which I brought in and delivered. But I do not mention this to correct the misstatements of Vasconcellos; I allude to it only to protest against the complaint made by you, that I have thus been a channel of communication between the conspirators and the enemy. I had received a package from the Baron de Sousa, Portuguese chargé d'affaires in Montevideo, for the Portuguese vice-consul in Asuncion. Was it not my duty to deliver it? I knew nothing, suspected nothing, of its contents, and I did as I had always done when letters had come to my care from beyond the lines—that is, I delivered it, asking no questions. When Berges was minister, I have received documents and communications for the Foreign Office that had been sent to me, and I promptly delivered them. What else could I do? If there were treasonable letters in his correspondence, was it my fault? If a gunboat should come to-morrow, and bring more correspondence for your ministry, shall I not instantly deliver it? Or shall I say that because one minister has been proved a traitor, and lest there be more treason in the letters sent to my care, I will believe nothing? I think that on further reflection you will admit that, in regard to the delivery of that package, I did only what in duty and courtesy I was bound to do.

But dismissing the declarations of Carreras and Vasconcellos, I pass to that of Berges; and I will remark that, were it not for the gravity of the subject, it would afford me much amusement to expose its contradictions and absurdities. I shall show from the declaration itself that it contains as many falsehoods and contradictions as it has sentences; that my best and most friendly acts towards Paraguay have been studiously and maliciously perverted, and that, so far from his bearing no malice towards me, he has for a long time been treasuring up the most innocent and harmless expressions, to misquote and misrepresent them, with all the devilish malignity of an inquisitor. What his original motive was I do not know. Whether it was that he had heard I had spoken to his excellency the President of his reserve and want of frankness with me, or whether he hated me from a consciousness that I would not be a party to his conspiracy, or whatever was his motive, it now appears that my charitable judgment that he had not acted from malice towards me was a great mistake.

I regret that Berges has not yet given the date of his first treason, and told us when, from a patriot, he turned traitor. Without the knowledge of that fact, it is scarcely possible to make anything intelligible from the whole of his long, confused, and contradictory declaration. At one time he represents himself as talking to me like a loyal man and a patriot; then he talks of the plans of himself and his fellow revolutionists; and then again is acting the part of a patriot and friend of his country, changing thus his character as readily as a harlequin in a pantomime.

I will now proceed to examine in detail this jargon of contradictions, this medley of patriotism and treason.

And first I will take up his statement that when I made my second visit to him at his house in the Salinares I expressed my sympathy for him in his sickness, and my desire to be of service to him, he understood by that that I would give him asylum in my legation in any unlooked-for event. He afterwards speaks of that, not as an asylum against the enemy, but against the government of Paraguay. This is a self-evident absurdity. If there were to be a revolution, or "pronunciamiento," and it were to be successful, there would be no need of asylum for any of the parties engaged in it; and if it were unsuccessful, was he so stupid, or I so ignorant, as to suppose that the conspirators could escape the punishment of their treason by taking refuge in my legation? How, then, could he understand a simple expression of courtesy to mean an offer absurd and ridiculous in its very terms? It is impossible.

I next pass to his very grave accusation—that when his excellency Marshal Lopez was sick at Paso Pucu, in 1866, I often went or sent to inquire after his health. He also says that I spoke to him, about that time, of the necessity of making terms of peace with the allies, indicating General Bartolomé Mitre as a proper person to negotiate with; to which he adds that I made various remarks on the questions involved in the war, and the terms that Paraguay ought to make with the enemy. Of any such conversation I have not the faintest recollection. Yet that the whole statement is so absurd as to prove its falsity you will see by reference to dates.

It was not till the 8th of November, 1866, that I arrived at this place on my return from the United States. To get here I had spent a year and two months, during which I had been exposed to almost every inconvenience and annoyance imaginable. I had been rudely treated in Buenos Ayres by the Brazilian minister, Octaviano; I had had my letter from the Argentine minister of foreign affairs, Elizalde, repudiated by General Mitre, though he had previously promised to respect it; I had been rudely told by Admiral Tamandare that I should not pass through his lines; and, what was worst and most mortifying of all, I received no support or sympathy from any representative high in the confidence of my own government except from my late colleague in Buenos Ayres, the brave and noble old soldier, (Heaven rest his soul!) General Ashboth. Yet I forced my way through, greatly to the disgust of both Mitre and Tamandare. I had not seen Mitre for four months before, or since I had written him a strong protest against my detention and against his duplicity and bad faith towards me. And yet Berges says that I had no sooner got here than I proposed Mitre as the proper person with whom to negotiate terms of peace. The mere statement of the facts is a sufficient refutation of this clause of his declaration.

The next allegation of Berges is, that when I went to visit the Marquis de Caxias, to treat about peace, I had neither the spirit nor the desire of laboring for the interests of Paraguay, and in proof of it he then reports me as saying the very things in regard to Paraguay and its people that their best friends might and naturally would have said under the circumstances. He adds that if I was badly affected when I left to treat with the enemy's general, I was still worse after my return. As he gives no reason for this opinion, I am led to infer that he judged me to be friendly to Caxias from the tone of my letter to him after my return from his encampment. From his captiousness and his complaints of my lack of zeal in behalf of Paraguay at that time, I conclude that he was then acting the patriot and not the traitor.

The next count in the declaration of Berges being only an expression of opinion that all my efforts to return to Paraguay were but a farce to deceive this government, and that my real desire was to serve the allies. I will pass it by with the simple remark that, should it ever meet the eye of the Marquis de Caxias, it will doubtless cause a grim sardonic smile, and that Admiral Tamandare will be surprised to learn that when the Shamokin forced the blockade, against all his protests and objections, it was doing so in the interest of himself and his allies.

To the charge that I never gave credit to the papers of the country when they published news of brilliant feats of arms, I have to say that I freely admit that I have thought some of the reports of victories in the Semanario were a little exaggerated. But this opinion I never expressed where I supposed it could dampen the spirit or hopes of the people. In conversing with the minister of foreign affairs I saw no reason why I should not express my real opinions. My object was always to endeavor to learn as much as possible of the actual situation, and to judge from that whether I could devise any means by which a peace, honorable and advantageous to Paraguay, could be effected.

But though there is a grain of truth in what Berges says of my not giving credence to all that was published in the Semanario, it seems he could not state even that without mixing it up with several palpable self-evident falsehoods. He says that I even discredited the news of the defeat of the allies at Curupayti, and that I said it was simply a retreat, and that I gave as my authority the late French consul here, M. Cochelet, who had received the information from the French agent, who was present at the combat. At the time the battle of Curupayti was fought I had not arrived in the country. I was still in Buenos Ayres, and I remember well that the Buenos Ayres papers spoke of it as a most terrible and disastrous defeat for the allies. It was six weeks after that before I arrived here, and yet Berges represents that after my arrival I tried to make it appear that it was no defeat at all.

The next point that Berges makes is, that I was constantly seeking for some occasion of controversy, and in order to get away from the country. I was not aware before that a foreign minister must get up a controversy or have a breach with the government to which he is accredited in order to leave the country. I had supposed that he had only to ask for his passports, and the government was not only bound to give them, but to furnish him with the means of going away. The exact contrary of what Berges says is the truth. I have indeed long been desirous of returning to the United States, but thought it my duty to remain, though much against my interest, either till the war was ended or my successor should arrive. But Berges says that by means of his personal friendship he was able to quiet me, and prevent me from having a breach with the government. I say, however, that previous to his leaving for Paso Puen, in February, there was scarcely a wave or ruffle of discord between me and the government of Paraguay. Personally I had always been treated with marked kindness by both government and people, and it is impossible for him or anybody else to show the occasion that I tried to make a breach of our friendly relations.

Respecting the allegation that I was an intimate friend of M. Cochelet, and my opinions and remarks upon his successor and the Italian consul, I have only to say that though I have expressed the opinion to others that the latter ought not to have left their posts to which they were appointed for one not known to their respective governments, I do not see that such being my opinion why I should not express it.

Berges's opinion that I have received money from the Brazilian government, and that because I have not succeeded in doing the same with that of Paraguay, I have therefore tried to work against it, is perhaps worth as much as that of any other man who knows nothing of the matter. I would ask, however, if it is quite just and proper to put such a statement in an official note when not a particle of evidence is, or can be, adduced to support it.

There are several conversations reported in this declaration of Berges of which I had no recollection. When I was in the camp of Caxias he told me that General Osorio would soon be at Itapua with 10,000 troops, and after my return I remember looking over the map with Berges in his office, and asking him concerning the forces that Marshal Lopez would have to oppose him, if he should attempt to march with that force directly on the capital. Berges remarked that if such a thing were attempted by Osorio not a man of his whole army would escape alive. When at Paso Pucu a short time before I had discussed the same thing with his excellency Marshal Lopez. I talked with Berges on various occasions of the prospects of the war, and the dangers to be averted, and supposed that all I said would be taken as the word of a friend, taking it for granted that if I said anything of sufficient importance to merit it, he would communicate it to his excellency at Paso Pucu. Many of his statements, however, such as that the war was popular in Brazil, that the public spirit in the Argentine Republic was aroused, that the allies could get all the money they required—which he alleges that I made at different times—cannot be true, as I had no information on which to base such opinions, and the little information I did have was entirely to the contrary. Many rumors used to be afloat—some false, and some that afterwards proved true. Whenever speaking of these rumors, if for any reason I did not wish to give the name of my informant, I sometimes said, if asked how I had obtained my information, that the birds had whispered it to me; and I remember that some days before I heard of the passage of the iron-clads by Humaita, he told me we should soon have important news from below, and when I asked him his reasons for thinking so, he replied with the same expression—"that the birds had told him." That led me afterwards to suppose that the news of the passage was known by him at the time, and several days before it was publicly announced.

The next point in this strange declaration of Berges to which I will call your attention, is that where he says I showed great indignation towards the allies because of their inaction. I think that every loyal Paraguayan was angry with them for the same reason. It was known, or at least it was constantly asserted in the Seminario, that the Paraguayan army was only anxious to be attacked—that the legions of Marshal Lopez were confident that if attacked in force at any point they would give the enemy another Curupayti; they were anxious to close in with their foes, and decide the contest by honorable and hard fighting. The allies, however, with their large army and immense squadron, always kept at a safe distance, and in my indignation at their mode of warfare, I remember to have said to Berges it was cowardly, it was barbarous; that if they could conquer Paraguay by fair fighting, it would be legitimate warfare; but if they attempted to exhaust and starve out the people by means of superior numbers and resources, it was infamous, and deserved the execration of all civilized nations. I wrote repeatedly to my government in the same strain, saying that other nations ought not to allow such a brave and gallant people as the Paraguayans had shown themselves to be thus exterminated. But the heart of Berges, it seems, was so full of treason, and his eyes so jaundiced by corruption, that in expressions of this sort he could only see allusions to his own treacherous plans.

The next statement of Berges is entire fiction, and therefore I can only oppose to it my positive and absolute denial. I had never heard of any combination or conspiracy in the country, nor of any committee of conspirators, nor did I ever suspect, till so advised by you, that Caxias was in correspondence with any person in Paraguay. The name of Don Benigno was never mentioned to me by Berges, unless it was casually and in connection with some matter of no importance whatever. Indeed, Berges and all his fellow-accomplices did me the greatest compliment in their power; they never directly nor indirectly confided to me anything of their plans, and, until so advised by you, I had no idea of the conspiracy that was on foot. I had always supposed that only by hard fighting could this war be brought to an end, and had never believed, since the efforts of my government at mediation had failed, that any other solution was possible.

I pass over several other of the statements of Berges in regard to conversations held with me, with this remark, that I remember nothing of them. I only know that I never entertained any such ideas or opinions as he attributes to me. Very likely I said to him that, notwithstanding I remained here, much to my own personal loss, and was exposed with my family to many inconveniences and discomforts, I was, nevertheless, disposed to remain to the end of the war. But it was that I might be of service to the Paraguayan nation and people, and not to the insurgents and traitors, as he represents. In fact, I never suspected there were any such in the country. All knowledge I have of their existence has come to me within the last month. Of one thing Berges, notwithstanding he has been in the United States, seems to have been entirely oblivious or ignorant, and that is, that a minister of the United States, who should be known to have taken part in a revolution against the government to which he was accredited, would, whether it were successful or not, be thenceforward ruined and disgraced in his own country. His public career would be ended, and he would be held infamous, both by his government and countrymen. I observe that Berges declares that I did not like to use the word revolution in my conversation with him. That is true, and for the very good reason that I never had occasion to use it, as I never suspected that any such thing was in contemplation. His other statements, that I did not wish to leave the country because of my desire to be of service to the people here, will be both true and intelligible if, instead of insurgents and revolutionists, are used the words Paraguayans and patriots:

Regarding the assertion that after my return from the enemy's camp, nearly a year and a half ago, I said to Berges that I should write to my own government that the cause of President Lopez was losing ground, and prepare it for the revolutionary movement that was to follow, I would be glad to know if I made this statement to him in the character of a loyal man or a traitor? In other conversations, held subsequent to that time, he assumes the character of loyalty. I will say, however, that all my dispatches have been of the same general tone and tendency, and they will show to my government that every charge thus alleged by Berges, as that I have never been in reality a friend to Paraguay, is utterly, basely, and scandalously false. All the testimony of all the conspirators united, if it were to this effect, would be utterly disproved by the dispatches that I have sent from time to time to Washington. Unless I am greatly mistaken, the effect of my representations to my government will soon be perceptible in the allied squadron. The allies will soon be compelled to allow an American gunboat to pass their blockade or detain it by force, and a forcible detention will be war with the great republic. Such a war, commenced under such circumstances, when taken in connection with this correspondence, will certainly be an anomaly and curiosity in history.

From one of the statements in the declaration of Berges, I am led to infer that this conspiracy, of which he seems to have been the master spirit, has been a long time smouldering. He says that his reply to the first letter of Caxias was sent by me. As I never sent any letters for him when I sent my correspondence under flag of truce, to be sent forward by the favor or courtesy of the enemy, this letter must have gone as long as a year ago last March, either when I went through to the camp of the Marquis de Caxias, or shortly after, when the commander of the American gunboat Wasp came through to bring me my dispatches. Those were the only two occasions I ever had of sending anything for this government without abusing the confidence of the allies, and on both occasions I sent numerous letters from the ministry of foreign affairs. If there was among them a letter for Señor Brito I was not aware of it, and it must have been under cover to some one else. If that letter passed through at the time of my last visit to Paso Pucu, it must have accompanied the copy of Berges's long official letter to me of the 24th of March, 1867. If at that time he could send forward so elaborate a defence of Paraguay and her cause, and at the same time send a treasonable letter offering to betray that very cause, you must admit that conduct so infamous would merit universal execration, and that whatever declaration he might make when caught in the snares of his own plot, while it might be true, should be presumed to be false.

The last count in Berges's declaration purports to be a report of conversation held with me a long time ago, soon after my return from the camp of Caxias. What he says that I told him in regard to the expenses of Brazil, I am inclined to think is in the main part true. But even this he could not tell without adding a transparent falsehood. He states that I said the Brazilians, to make up the million a day that they were spending, would show "las cuentas del gran capitán," (the yarns of the grand captain.) What the meaning of this expression was I did not know when I first saw it in your note, and was obliged to ask my translator, Mr. Bliss, to explain it. Thanks to Berges, however, I have now learned its meaning, and in a way I shall not soon forget it.

There are other points in your note which I ought perhaps to allude to, but this letter is already run to such great length that I will bring it to a close. Had these declarations come from men of low, or even ordinary, position, you will admit that the only proper and dignified course for me would have been to have indignantly denied them. But when men who have held high positions, like Berges and Carreras, make such charges, it is due to myself, and is due to the government of Paraguay, that I should lend my assistance in exposing their falsity and arriving at the truth. It is fortunate for me that I had not left the country previous to the discovery of this plot. Though my dispatches to my government would have completely disproved the declarations of the conspirators, and though I have no doubt that the letters which they have sent below will show that I was entirely ignorant of their plans, and that they had not dared to confide them to me, yet the impression would still have prevailed among many people that I had been a party to the not only wicked but inexpressibly stupid plot. I make no complaint that these declarations have been included in an official correspondence, though had you informed me unofficially of their nature I would have given you in the same manner all the information that I have been able to give in this correspondence. But even then all the information I could have given would only have amounted to this: That if there was a conspiracy against the government I have never known it or even suspected it.

Having thus declared so explicitly that I had never known anything about the conspiracy till advised of it by you, and that the conspirators never confided to me any of their plans, the correspondence for my part on this matter must here close. If the government accepts my words as true, it must admit that I can give no information. I have no information now on the subject except what I have obtained from your notes, and of course I can give none. If, therefore, the government accepts my statements in good faith as true, it must be willing to drop the correspondence here. But if it does not thus accept them, then respect to my own character and the dignity of my office would forbid me to continue it. Under these circumstances it appears to me that in justice to itself and to me the government of Paraguay should adopt one of two courses: It should accept my statement as true, and drop the correspondence, or, refusing so to accept it, should accede to my request in my letter of the 14th of July, and send me my passports, and provide me with the means of leaving the country.

I observe that this correspondence is being published in the Semario. I observe, however, that one of my letters, that of July 22, has not appeared. Will you pardon me for calling your attention to this matter.

This note is already so long that I must again crave your indulgence for postponing the consideration of the case of Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman. As soon as I can prepare the letter, however, I will give my reasons at length why I have not sent them from my legation.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew the assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs.

Señor Benitez to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

LUQUE, August 11, 1868.

I have the honor to inclose to you the accompanying letter which the criminal José Berges has requested his judges to send to you on account of having declared that, besides the papers before mentioned, you had received in deposit the others to which the same letter alludes.

Berges considers this direct communication with you necessary, in order to fully satisfy the demands of justice, as he says he desires.

I improve this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

GUMESINDO BENITEZ.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Señor Berges to Mr. Washburn.

SAN FERNANDO, August 5, 1868.

SIR: Events most unexpected by me decide me to address you this letter from the camp, to request you to have the goodness to deliver to the bearer three sealed packages which I deposited with you in my quinta at Salinares, at the beginning of July ultimo, at the time of the first visit which I received from you a few days after my arrival at the capital. The first is labelled by your own hand with the title, Papers of Berges, and is the largest, being that which contains the correspondence which I have exchanged with the Marquis de Caxias; the second is labelled, Private Correspondence of Berges, and contains the letter exchanged with various persons in the Rio de la Plata; and the third is a small roll with the label, Papers of my brother Miguel.

On this occasion I take pleasure in saluting you, and in renewing the assurances with which I am your most attentive and sure servant,

JOSÉ BERGES.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, August 12, 1868.

SIR: I have just received the note of your honor dated yesterday together with a paper signed by José Berges, in which I am requested to deliver, not one, as formerly represented in his declarations, but three packages, which he says he delivered to me at his house in one of the first days of July, at the time of my visit to him a few days after his return from San Fernando. Not having ever received any package, letter, or communication from him, as I have repeatedly advised you, I am unable to see the object in sending me this paper. In my note of yesterday I said if any person had ever sent or brought any such papers to my house, and would send a written order for them, and a description so that I could know which they were, I would be happy to deliver them. But I did not promise impossibilities, or to deliver papers I had never received, whoever might send for them, or however minutely they might be described.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Benitez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, August 13, 1868.

SIR: Excusing myself for the delay in answering that part of your note of the 31st ultimo, relating to the case of Mr. Bliss and Mr. Master-man, which I have deferred in order to answer the part of it which seemed to me of more pressing importance, and also to answer your subsequent very long note of the 6th instant, I will now proceed to give my reasons why I have not dismissed those two persons from my legation, and why I ought not to do so.

At the conclusion of your note of the 31st ultimo, you say that you have not the remotest doubt that full and inflexible justice would be done by the American government, and then ask if it can be in full possession of the case, as is the national court of justice; if it would send the record of its trial for a new substantiation, if it could do so, and would its administration of justice be sufficiently timely?

To these questions I will remark that there would undoubtedly be considerable inconvenience in sending these persons for trial to the United States; but that does not affect the law in the case in the least. Whenever an embassy is received from one government by another, the latter accepts it under the conditions imposed by the law of nations. This law is of such importance that its rigid observance is indispensable for the peace of the world. It is only under the protection of this law that nations can negotiate with each other, as to carry on their negotiations it is necessary, especially in time of war, that there should be some persons who should enjoy entire security and immunities from the local laws. This code, universally recognized as binding on all nations, has been of the greatest advantage to them all; but it also has its disadvantages. Under it the nations that receive foreign embassies are required to concede to them certain privileges which are not conceded to any other persons. They resign the sovereignty over the premises occupied by the ambassador, and by the fiction of extra territoriality his legation is considered as the territory of his own government. Except under very extraordinary circumstances his house cannot be entered by the police, and no member of his legation can be cited before the local tribunals; and if they commit any offence against the laws of the country, all writers on international law declare that the minister shall either punish them himself or send them to his own country to be tried. These privileges and immunities, doubtless, frequently cause serious inconveniences to the local administration. But, is it not better to submit to such inconveniences rather than have the law abrogated? I have known such instances of inconvenience in my own country; one of which I will mention. In the year 1856, an important witness of a homicide in the city of Washington, that excited great public attention, was an attaché of the Swedish legation. His testimony was very much desired by the tribunals, but he was never cited formally as a witness; and to the request that he would appear and testify voluntarily, he replied that he would not do so, and my government had no power to compel him.

Your honor asks, in your note of the 23d July, if it does not appear to me that if the immunities of a minister should reach to the extent claimed by me, that there would be no nation in the world which would be willing to accept an embassy? To this I will reply that all nations do, and are glad to, receive embassies on these very terms. What have I claimed? Simply this—that George F. Masterman, who came to my house at my solicitation as medical attendant of my family nearly eleven months ago, and has lived in my house ever since, and had his name given in as a member of the legation more than four months ago, to which no objection was made for three months afterwards, is to all intents and purposes a member of this legation, and entitled to all its privileges. I likewise claim that Porter C. Bliss, who also came to my house at my solicitation, to serve as translator, and to assist me in any other way that I might require, and whose name was given in at the time as a member of my legation, and no objection being then made to his remaining in it, but only to the capacity in which I had classified him, is also a member of this embassy.

You, on various occasions, speak of them as refugees who have sought asylum in my house. They did not seek asylum here. I sought them, and engaged them to come here because I needed their services. At the time they came there was no charge or accusation against either of them. How, then, can they be considered refugees? They were not refugees, and this is not a question of the right of asylum, but of the rights of legation.

You, however, allege that they have never been recognized by your government, but that, having refused to recognize them, I therefore have no right to claim them as exempt from the local jurisdiction. But this refusal was not made till after they had been claimed as criminals, and months after they had been tacitly acknowledged as belonging to the embassy. Such refusal was quite too late to affect the case.

The doctrine advanced by you, that a foreign minister cannot claim legation privileges for his servants, secretaries, and other members of his household, till the government to which he is accredited specially recognizes them by name, is something entirely new to me; something that I do not find in any writer on international law. If a minister gives in a list of his suite, and no answer is made, no objection is taken by the government, then it tacitly acknowledges that all included in that list are members of the legation, and it cannot afterwards plead its own failure to acknowledge the minister's letter as a justification of its refusal so to recognize them.

That this is correct reasoning you must admit, if you will apply it to my own case. Though I have given two lists of the members of my legation, you have never recognized a single person now in it, unless it be Mr. Bliss, and Baltazar, the colored servant left with me by Dr. Carreras. But you have never recognized either my wife or child, or my private secretary, who has been in my service for more than a year and a half, or the servant girl that we brought with us into the country. According to your reasoning and logic, however, you have only to say that any one or all of them is accused, and that the government refuses to recognize them as belonging to my legation, and I have no remedy but to send them away. Such is the inevitable conclusion to be drawn from the premises and logic of your honor.

To the question whether or not the punishment that my government would administer would be timely, I reply I do not see why not. You cannot suppose that these two individuals, closely shut up as they are in this legation, and having no communication with any person outside of it, can be dangerous. If not, why will not their punishment, if proved guilty, be as timely some months hence as now? If they can give any evidence which is necessary to ascertain the truth in regard to other accused parties, they have both expressed their willingness to do it; and should the government choose to send a notary to my house to examine them, I will give him every facility for doing so. I will also say that Mr. Bliss has declared, in relation to the paper which you in your note of the 23d of July say that he "in a secret committee of mutual obligations" has signed to commit an infamous crime, that if any such paper signed by him shall be produced at this legation he will instantly leave it. To this I will add that while I shall still insist on my rights of legation, I will undertake that he keep his promise to me.

In my former notes to you I have called your attention to this maxim of law, that "every man is to be considered innocent until he is proved guilty." Yet you, disregarding this principle, continue to speak of these two members of my legation as criminals and refugees, without ever having given me any proof of their guilt. You have also complained that I should not receive your official statement of their criminality in preference to their own protestations of innocence.

I have not allowed myself to question the sincerity of your belief in their criminality, but as you do not pretend to speak from your own knowledge I may yet doubt the truthfulness of your informants. Certainly you will not allege that the witnesses against them are persons who have enjoyed higher honors, or had previously been more respected than Berges and Carreras, whose declarations I know to contain almost as many falsehoods as sentences. If declarations so false have been made by them, with the object of connecting me with an infamous plot, is it not possible that equally false declarations have been made for the purpose of implicating others? I, acting according to the laws of my own country, must presume them innocent till I have a proof to the contrary. From your own personal knowledge of these gentlemen, you must be aware that they are, from education and habit, the very last people that conspirators and complotters would take into their counsels. Mr. Bliss, you are aware, is a man of extraordinary literary acquirements, and his whole taste and ambition is in literary pursuits; and Mr. Masterman is a man whose tastes and desires lead him to pass his whole time in scientific investigations. Neither one of them has any of the detestable gaucho characteristics that would lead them to take part in a revolution; and as I have known them both long and intimately, I am bound to take their solemn assertions, not only of innocence, but of entire ignorance of any plot or conspiracy, in preference to the declaration of any or many confessed conspirators or traitors.

But with me this is not a question of guilt or innocence. It is a question of the rights of legation. Months ago I gave in their names as belonging to my diplomatic suite, and the government by not objecting to them as members of my legation tacitly acknowledged them as such; it acknowledged them as much as it has acknowledged any one in my house, and has now just as much right to claim any one else of my family or household as to claim either of them.

I will add another consideration. Both of these men are so indispensably necessary to me that even if they did not belong to my legation, and the safety of the state were not endangered by their remaining here, I should ask it as a courtesy that they might be allowed to stay for the present. Without the aid of Mr. Bliss I could hardly have carried on the heavy correspondence I have had during the last month; and were Mr. Masterman to leave me, it would be, under the circumstances—when the aid of no other physician can be obtained—at the risk of exposing the lives of my wife and child and other members of my family; and I am sure that the government has no wish to expose me to any such calamity.

The position taken by you that until a government expressly recognizes the members of a legation they cannot claim its privileges, but are liable to be arrested like any other persons by the police, would, or might, at least, render his right of extra-territoriality virtually a nullity. The government might thus compel him to dismiss all his servants; it might prohibit his own subjects to enter his service, and thus leave him without any servant or assistant in any capacity, except such as it might suit its own purposes that he should have. I have never asked either you or your predecessor to recognize the members of my legation by name, or, in other words, I have not asked the privilege of employing them. I am to be the judge of the persons necessary to the discharge of my official duties and the health and comfort of my family, and not the government of Paraguay. Should a minister on entering a country take with him in his suite known criminals, or persons obnoxious or dangerous from their political opinions, a government might undoubtedly object to concede to them legation immunities, and could insist that they should leave the country. But it would have no right to molest them, and would be bound to protect them in every way until they had ample time for their departure. In no case has a government a right to inflict any other penalty on a person attached to a foreign legation than to send him to his own country to be punished. If, however, the ground assumed by you is correct—that no person can claim legation privileges until he has been expressly recognized by the government, but may be cited before the local tribunals—then if I comply with your request of to-day, I may be called upon to send away the other members of my household tomorrow, as you have never recognized them as belonging to my legation.

If all are not in the same category, and some are and some are not entitled to legation privileges, will you please advise me which of the names in the list appended to this letter are recognized as belonging to my legation.

In your note of the 31st ultimo you observe that it is the more strange that I should still decline to send Mr. Bliss and Mr. Masterman from my house, since I shall then have superabundant means to give them protection. What those superabundant means are you do not advise me, nor do I understand what means will be left me to protect them when once in the hands of the local tribunals. Will you have the kindness to give me further information on this point?

In my note of July 14, you will recollect that from the tone and tenor of your preceding notes, and from the fact that you had finally called for two persons whom I had always considered members of my legation, I said it appeared that I had lost the respect and confidence of this government, and that, therefore, as it did not seem that I could be longer useful either to my own government or that of Paraguay, or to any individuals in the country, I requested passports for myself and for the members of my legation. To this you replied on the 16th, assuring me in the strongest terms that I still retained the esteem and confidence of your government, and expressing the hope that such assurances would lead me to reconsider my previous resolution. Such expressions I accepted as satisfactory, particularly when in the same note you again requested the dismissal of Messrs. Bliss and Masterman from my house, but said you would waive all further discussion on that matter, leaving it to my own sense of justice. I then believed that the demand would not be further pressed; but while preparing my note of the 20th ultimo, giving my reasons for the course I had felt it my duty to pursue, I was surprised and pained on receiving your note of the 19th, which was closely followed by those of the 21st and 23d, to observe a tone and tenor of an entirely different character.

This sudden change I have attributed to the strange and false declarations of Berges concerning me, and, if I am right in this surmise, I cannot wonder that, false as the declarations are, the government should have changed from confidence and regard to distrust and suspicion. But if the government has accepted my words in preference to those of a convicted traitor, I cherish the hope that it will resume the position taken in your note of July 16, and leave me to pursue the only course that in my opinion will be approved by my government, by public opinion, and by the family of nations.

I avail myself of this occasion to give assurance of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor GUMESINDO BENITEZ,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Señor Caminos to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

MINISTRY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS,

Luque, August 28, 1868.

Having been intrusted with the department of foreign affairs, the undersigned, minister secretary in the department of war and the navy, has found a note of your excellency dated the 13th instant, not yet replied to, and in the interval of preparing a reply in the terms required by the occasion, I hasten to request of your excellency a specific list of the individuals of your legation for whom your excellency requests passports, in order to be able to make them out in conformity with your desire.

I embrace this opportunity to tender to your excellency assurances of distinguished consideration.

LUIS CAMINOS.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Asuncion, August 29, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, in which I am requested to give you a list of the persons of this legation for whom I desire passports. Besides myself, Mrs. Washburn, and infant child, the following is the list of the persons belonging to my legation for whom passports are requested: Carlos Meincke, private secretary; Porter C. Bliss, translator; George F. Masterman, medical attendant; Kate Leahy, George Hamilton, Baltazar Carreras, servants.

I avail myself of this occasion to offer the assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor LUIS CAMINOS,
Acting Minister of Foreign Relations.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Asuncion, September 2, 1868.

SIR: On the 11th ultimo I had the honor to address a note to your predecessor, Honorable Gumesindo Benitez, in which, after a statement of facts which it is unnecessary here to recapitulate, I remarked that it appeared to me that the government of Paraguay ought either to accept my statement in good faith as true and drop the correspondence to which it related, or else send me my passports and provide me with the means of leaving the country, as I had requested in my note on the 14th of July. From that time to this I have received no other answer than your note of the 28th ultimo, in which your honor requests me to furnish you with a list of the members of my legation for whom I desire passports. The only inference from this is that the government accepts the first of the alternatives presented by me, and does not accept my statement as truthful. I am, therefore, greatly surprised that the passports have not been given me, as I furnished the list as requested on the day that I received your note. I therefore have occasion to repeat the request made in my note of July 14, that passports may be furnished me and the members of my legation, and such facilities for leaving the country be provided as comport with the character of an accredited minister, with as little delay as circumstances will permit.

I take this occasion to render assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor LUIS CAMINOS,

Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Asuncion, September 2, 1868.

SIR: I have this moment received a note from Commander Kirkland, commanding the United States ship Wasp, dated the 29th ultimo, Paraguay River, between the Tibicuari and Herradura, in which he advises me that he has come by order of our government to take me and my suite and convey us to such point on the river below the allied squadron as I may select, and requests me to inform him at what point on the river it will be convenient for me to embark.

I have accordingly written him a note which I inclose with this, advising him that I am still in this city, and that it will be most convenient for me to embark at this port, and which I beg your honor to forward as soon as possible. Commander Kirkland expresses the hope that he may be detained as little time as possible, and as the United States have now for the second time forced the blockade of the allies, against all their threats and protests, and is, besides, the only power that has done so, or ever shown any interest in Paraguay during the war, or any desire to see fair play between the belligerents, I am confident that the government of Paraguay will grant him every facility for carrying out his orders. For this second vindication of the rights of nations as against the unlawful pretensions of the allies, will you have the goodness to express my congratulations to his excellency Marshal Lopez.

I take this occasion to renew assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor LUIS CAMINOS,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Señor Caminos to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Luque, September 4, 1868.

SIR: I have received your note dated 29th ultimo, with the list of individuals, including your excellency, for whom you ask passports; and before replying to it I must give an answer to the one of the 13th ultimo, in which you state the motives for which you have not dismissed from the legation Messrs. Bliss and Masterman.

I am obliged to take into consideration some of those motives in order to follow you closely, but I shall not touch them all for fear that you should again complain of the length of my reply. I may be excused from any justification for giving you the trouble of having a great deal to read, since it is due to you that the matter, which was of easy solution on the ground of justice and right, has assumed so complicated a character.

My government, anxious to show its consideration and regard for your excellency, had moreover invited you to come to a verbal understanding, with a view of avoiding these long and unsatisfactory communications, a step which you cannot ignore, although you have not chosen to appreciate it as it deserved.

You were influenced in this by the same motive that induced you to give shelter in your residence to Messrs. Bliss and Masterman. Time will explain all. You have been sufficiently consequent as to extend your protection to these gentlemen in direct opposition to the dictates of a sound judgment, and to disregard any preferential consideration due not only to the justice and right of the case, but also to the peculiar conditions of the country.

In your note containing an explanation of your motives I have failed to meet those I expected, and which might somehow have justified your action in this matter. Far from this, that note is couched in dilatory terms; and I, therefore, consider myself free from the obligation of touching all the points it contains, or to allude more particularly to the profound erudition on the law of nations therein displayed by you.

The case of Bliss and Masterman does not admit of much digression. It is a very simple question. They have sought the asylum of the American legation when called upon by the courts of law to answer the grave charge of being accomplices in a revolutionary complot.

You have replied to the request of this department that they should be given up, stating that you consider them as members of the legation, without, however, justifying this assertion, but merely entering upon charges and arguments that can have but little weight in presence of the motives adduced by this department, more particularly in its note of the 31st of July.

This department certainly said then that if the immunities of a minister extended as far as you pretended, no nation in the world would receive a foreign mission; to which you replied that all nations do receive missions on those terms, and that you have only used a common right in refusing to give up Bliss and Masterman.

It is strange that the minister of a great and honorable nation, so familiar with international law, should allow himself to be so blinded by his anxiety to shield two criminals. I, for my part, must protest against similar assertions, and maintain that no nation can be desirous, as you state, to receive foreign missions that are disposed to protect criminals, by alleging that they belong to them.

I must first call your attention to the above-mentioned note of the 31st of July, referring to every part of its context, and then, by way of compliment, I will remark again that if you, in your note of the 13th ultimo, bring as a proof of Bliss being a member of your legation because you had requested him to go to your house, and had given him the character of being a member of said legation, and that the government had made no objection to his residing in your house, but only to the character under which you had classified him, I must repeat once more that from the beginning Bliss, as well as Manlove, have never been recognized by this government as members of your legation; and that they have only been allowed to reside with you in the same way as other individuals who at the time of the evacuation of the capital took up their abode in your house. No other interpretation can be given to what was stated on this head to your excellency by this department in its note of 23d February last.

You certainly stated in your note of 4th of April, by way of explanation, that you had written an answer to said note of the 23d February, under date of the following day, the 24th, but that you did not send it, as circumstances seemed to render it unnecessary, in your opinion, to occupy the attention of the government with purely personal matters of the legation, and adding that you wrote a note, and tried to forward to Berges a note similar to the one you inclosed. In this note you sent the following as the list of persons belonging to the legation, viz: Charles Meincke, German; Porter Cornelius Bliss, American; James Manlove, ditto; Concepcion Cazal, Paraguayan; Ana Bella Cazal, ditto; Dolores Caballero, ditto; Basilio Jara, ditto; Melchora Jara, ditto; and two washerwomen.

This note, dated the 24th February, was addressed to ex-Minister Berges, and contained an acknowledgment of the receipt of that of the 23d.

This department has not answered the note of 4th of April, and it could much less reply to the one sent as a mere inclosure, and as an explanation that there had been no want of courtesy or forgetfulness in not replying to the note in which the government announced its removal to Luque. On the other hand, Berges being absent from the Foreign Office at the time, obliged you to communicate directly with the chief clerk; and before this department could take into consideration the note of the 23d, it would have been requisite to have addressed it in the proper form. Moreover, you have not stated whether said note was to have been considered as still subsisting, or given any other explanation, whereas changes might have occurred in the very personnel of the legation between February and April. For all this, the note which you declare to have written on the 23d February, but to have sent only on the 4th April, addressed to an absent minister, besides the circumstances already adverted to, was in itself inefficient and defective; and I may add that when said note was received, the Paraguayan women, Concepcion Cazal and Dolores Caballero, were no longer at the legation; and they have stated that they never asked that their names should appear in the list of the personnel of the legation, or knew that they thus figured. I allude to this circumstance only to show to you that if you have been pleased to put their names in that list, no care has been taken to erase their names from it when they ceased to reside in your legation.

From this simple statement it may be clearly seen that you can have no just ground for insisting in considering Porter C. Bliss a member of your legation, as well as George F. Masterman, whom you consider as such from the mere fact of having put down his name in the list contained in the note of 24th February, to which no objection has been made till three months later.

The practical deduction to be drawn from your notes and pretensions, as far as I can see, is that an individual is to be considered a member of a mission from the mere fact of his being proposed as such to the government by the head of the mission. Acting upon this conclusion, you propose Bliss and Manlove in the list of your domestic servants, and on the day following the receipt of a note from the government refusing to recognize them as members of your legation, and therefore denying to them the privileges that they would enjoy as such by the right of nations, you again inscribed the names of these two individuals on the list, and moreover add to the personnel of the legation Masterman and another.

But if Bliss belongs to the mission as well as Masterman, how is it that they have not enjoyed nor do enjoy the privileges to which they are entitled? This is inexplicable. And why is it that the name of Manlove being alongside those of Bliss and Masterman in your note of 24th February, he has been left on one side, when, according to the principle laid down by you, they must all (or none) be considered as members of the mission? But the precedent of Manlove is a proof that you have only afterwards been pleased to grant to these two criminals the character of members of the legation.

With regard to what you say that Masterman is to be considered in that character in all and for all, because no objection was raised against him before the lapse of three months, I may remark that according to your own doctrine Masterman was from the very first day invested with that character, because if the following day this department had refused to acknowledge him, as was done in the case of Bliss, his name would have immediately appeared in a new list of your excellency's.

I have thus shown clearly how inexact you are in considering said individuals as members of the legation. It is of little consequence to the question whether they have sought your house, or whether you have sought them to bring them to your residence, but I do not agree with you in looking upon them as refugees, because this would be a denial of a truth too clear and distinct. What are they doing there? Why are they in your house, when they have been indicted and are called upon by a court of law to answer the charges deposed against them?

It is clear they are not there because of their innocence or because they belong to the legation, but under the special protection of your excellency. You state that during several months they have been tacitly recognized as belonging to the mission, and that the refusal came too late from this department to be available. I must repeat that only by following your practice could the justice of this statement be admitted, since the express objection made by my government on your proposing Bliss as a member of the legation has not been considered by you as having any weight whatever. Since the objection made to Bliss on the day following his nomination has been considered too late by you, what wonder is it if the objection in the case of Masterman, which according to your excellency was sent in after the lapse of three months, should also be considered as much too late?

I beg you to reflect upon the mysterious note of the 24th of February, and endeavor to convince me that it meant to convey a legitimate presentation of the personnel of your legation, and that at a most solemn crisis of the republic, assailed as it is to the death by an invading enemy.

As you will understand from what precedes, I am very far from wishing to maintain that a foreign minister cannot claim the privileges of the legation for his servants, secretary, or other members of his family until the government recognizes them individually by name. I agree with your remark that if a minister sends a list of his suite (in due form) and receives no answer, no objection is made by government, which tacitly recognizes the persons included in said list as members of the legation. This is a just interpretation, and is what has happened with regard to the following individuals: Charles Meincke, German; George Hamilton, English; Katharine Leahy, English; Basilio Jara, Paraguayan; and Melchora Jara, Paraguayan, who were tacitly consented to; when, on their names appearing jointly with those of Bliss and Manlove in your note of the 22d February, exception was taken only to the two latter, who were simply allowed to remain in your dwelling with the special condition that if they went out of the legation the policemen would be prevented from carrying out in such a case the orders given to allow no person not invested with official character to go about the streets; and on the same condition Ana Bella Cazal proposed in the above-mentioned list was also permitted to remain at the legation.

I must remind you once more that in your note of 4th April you alluded to individuals whom this department has not recognized as members of your legation. To whom else could you refer? At all events Bliss was one of them.

However much you may labor to give a forced interpretation to the motives brought forward in opposition to your views on this matter, you will never be able to justify your deductions. It is curious to hear it asserted that this department has only recognized Bliss and Balthazar, the colored servant whom you state was left by Doctor Carreras, but it is still more curious that neither your wife, nor son, nor private secretary, nor the servant you brought with you, have ever been recognized. If you have not chosen to put in the list of the personnel of your legation Mrs. Washburn and your son, this department is not to blame. I nevertheless cannot but admit the important position occupied by the family of the chief of the mission.

You may rest assured that my government has sufficient conscience of its own dignity and duties not to commit itself by sending a notary to your house to examine the criminals, Bliss and Masterman, when they have never been nor are members of the legation, but the government will not hesitate in making them appear before a tribunal, because they are in all and for all merely refugees in your hotel.

You wish to apply in the case of Bliss and Masterman the principle of right that a person must be considered innocent until he is proved to be guilty, and you state that this principle is ignored when they are spoken of as criminals and refugees, whilst no proof of their culpability is forthcoming. I might have wondered greatly at your pretensions and language if in the following line you did not furnish me with the proper key, by saying that you doubted still of the veracity of the informants. Upon the criminality of the above individuals, and alluding to the depositions of Berges and Carreras, you state that you know they contain as many falsehoods as sentences, and that if these false depositions have been given by them with a view of making you appear mixed up in a shameful machination, it may have been done with a design of implicating others.

If you do not choose to credit my words, and can still doubt the veracity of those who have deposed that Bliss and Masterman took a leading part in the complot, I cannot offer to gratify you by showing to you the authentic documents which establish the reality of the fact, and you may act in accordance with the laws of your own country as you may think proper. But I would like to ask you, when is a person to be considered guilty? I understand that the principle of right invoked by you is one universally accepted, but also that the sworn depositions of witnesses are a sufficient proof in cases of more or less gravity. This suggestion may not be thrown away upon you to prove to you that, as this is what has happened with regard to your own protégés as well as to others included in the same accusation, you must not wonder if no attention can be paid to your reference to the above maxim to which you have repeatedly alluded.

With regard to your recommendation of the profession and standing of each of them, I can only say to you that they are almost identical with those which you were pleased to make in favor of Carreras when you were asked to dismiss him from your legation, and now it appears that you have not had much trouble in applying against him the words least honorable to any man.

You are right in thinking that my government has no desire to expose either you or your family to any calamity, and it is well known that during your long stay in the country you have been treated with every consideration, as you yourself have confessed in your correspondence. I cannot, however, conceive how your own convenience is incompatible with the expulsion of those individuals, whereas their stay there must give rise to appreciations less satisfactory from the fact of their being implicated in a vast conspiracy, the depositions with regard to which extend even to yourself.

Since the government of every nation has the right to admit or refuse a foreign minister according to circumstances, in compliance with which right he must be duly presented to the territorial sovereign, it follows as an indispensable consequence that the chief of a mission is bound duly to report the persons that belong to his household and those that may leave him subsequently, both in order to accept or refuse the former and to take note of the latter who may still enjoy the privileges attached to their previous position. And while on this point I beg to remind you that the list you inclosed in the note dated 24th of February comprised among others the names of Concepcion Cazal, Dolores Caballero, and Ana Bella Cazal, besides two washerwomen, whose names did not appear, and that none of those five individuals figure now in your new list, with the exception of Lucia Ribas, who appears to have been one of said washerwomen. But apart from this it would appear that you have not attached to this subject the importance it deserves, as is proved by the fact that after all the individuals, excepting three, contained in your list of the 22d of February, had been admitted, you added others without advising this department of this circumstance, or of your having dismissed any of those persons that were included in the original list.

With regard to Bliss it is satisfactorily shown that he was not a member of your legation, but since you state that Balthazar, Carreras's servant, had also been recognized a member of the legation, I must point out to you that in your dispatch of the 12th of July you said of those whose names had been given as not belonging to the legation there only remained Carreras, Rodriguez, his servant, and the wife of Leite Pereira; and although in your note of the following day—the 13th—communicating that Carreras and Rodriguez had left the legation before the appointed hour, you said that the colored servant of Carreras was still with you as a servant, you never alluded to the subject again, and after calling this person first Carreras's, then Rodriguez's servant, you only now style that his name is Balthazar. I am not aware how long you have had him as servant, and I have only seen by your unanswered note of the 13th of July that he still remained with you in that character, which leads to the supposition that for some time past he had ceased to be Carreras's servant. As you seemed to require him, no objection has been raised, but I have only to remark upon the incorrectness of your statement that this individual and Bliss were the only persons recognized as members of your legation.

With regard to the concluding part of your note, to which I am now replying, I beg to refer to what has already been stated on the subject in the course of this correspondence.

Having thus replied to the principal points of the note above alluded to, I have only to beg that you will consider in its true light the one of this department under date of the 31st of July conjointly with this. And I may be allowed to add a few words more, to express frankly to you that if until now no notice has been taken of the ground assumed by you in your correspondence, by even casting a slur upon the good faith of the judicial department of my country, and denying the truth of the official assurances made to you with regard to the guilt of Bliss and Masterman, my government can only view such proceeding as an offense to its honor and its dignity.

The government of this republic, far from wishing that you should forfeit the approval of your government and of public opinion in the community of nations, will, on the contrary, rejoice to see that you do not step beyond the principles of sound policy and the dictates of reason and justice prescribed by the respect due to nations and their governments.

My government has ever been inspired by this wish, and it grieves it to see you advocating for traitors to the country as if you were one of them. They say so, at least, and it behooves you to weigh these assertions, made judicially, which I will here further complement with others.

I shall first bring forward one of the individuals of whom you have stated that you heard of for the first time. It is Benigno Lopez, who, among other things, has deposed textually as follows:

That on account of the first expedition to the north in 1864, they began to talk politics.

Washburn saying to deponent, the country appears to "shake itself."

DEPONENT. Yes, but we do not know who will suffer the first blow, although it is probable that in the end we shall fare worse, seeing the power and great elements of our enemies.

To this Washburn perfectly agreed with him.

Then, from that time forward they continued talking whenever they met, condemning the system of government, because the policy of the government was arbitrary, instead of being liberal and constitutional, as befitted a country like Paraguay, rich for its climate and for its natural products of all kinds; that the government of the marshal thought of nothing but making soldiers; and that scarcely any private citizen was to be met with; and that such a state of things could not but help to keep back industry and retard progress and civilization in the country.

That all their conversations were in this tone until on the occasion of his accompanying Washburn in a trip he made to the front in March, for the purpose of crossing over to the enemy's camp, they went more deeply into the matter, and mooted the idea of the necessity of a change of government to bring to a close the protracted war, due, in Washburn's opinion, to a violent and inconsiderate act of the marshal, of which he certainly sorely repented.

To this deponent replied, "What he is sorry for is not to have taken the allies, one by one, to make them dance."

That to this and other conversations they held together before and during the journey, deponent understood that Washburn wished that the alliance should triumph, rather than Paraguay, and that he would be disposed to work in this sense, on which account he had no scruple in laying open the plan of endeavoring to effect a change of government, not doubting that the Marquis de Caxias, as soon as he was made aware of the advantages that would follow a successful revolution, would send the bases of a final arrangement to enable them to begin the work.

That in Paso Pucu, and just before Washburn passed over to the enemy's camp, deponent went to see him in his quarters, and being asked by him about the situation of the army, deponent answered that it was not bad, but that it would be rendered a very difficult one if Caxias stretched a line from Tuyuti as far as the Paraguay River, because it would be then inclosed. That while saying this deponent bent down and described this operation by marking on the ground the various positions of the two armies, and showing that in this way the interior of the republic remained exposed, and that nothing could obstruct a force from reaching the Tebicuari by Caapucu, and by making a rapid movement as far as Paraguay, which was not far, place itself in contact with the revolutionary force, and they both combined would then be able to command the principal departments of the republic and the capital by means of the railway.

That then Washburn, being interested to understand thoroughly the plan proposed by deponent, drew from his waistcoat pocket a pencil, which he handed to deponent, saying at the same time to his private secretary, Meincke, who was in the room, to go out for a short time, which the latter did at once, not, however, before having heard part of the conversation and seen the tracing made by deponent with his finger on the ground. That then, when Meincke was gone out, deponent concluded his description with Washburn's pencil, after which the latter left for the enemy's camp, most likely carrying with him the drawing made on paper by deponent.

That it was deponent's intention, in making a drawing of the intended operation, that Washburn should show it to Caxias, and if he did not say so expressly, it was because he understood that Washburn would be sure to do it, which, in fact, turned out subsequently to be the case, not only because the enemy realized this very plan, but because Washburn himself on his return brought him Caxias's communication, with the basis for effecting the change of government as deposed to previously.

That subsequently, after deponent came back from the army to the capital, towards the end of September, he went to see Washburn in his house, who asked him how he had left those people, (the army,) to which he answered, "Well in health, but not so as regards their position, which, as I have mentioned before, has become worse," (alluding to the circular movement.)

That Washburn asked him again, "But are they going to fight?"

DEPONENT. Undoubtedly, but not much.

WASHBURN. Why?

DEPONENT. Because some of them are worn out, and others have little faith in a general action, seeing the elements arrayed against them, and I have not tried to deceive them. And then went on to say, I see with great pleasure that a great deal has been done here, and well, and that all is ready in anticipation of what may occur, and I think soon.

WASHBURN. Mr. Berges is a very able man; under his Jesuitism and apparent indifference, he works with remarkable activity.

DEPONENT. Indeed; I myself never thought he would have done so much.

WASHBURN. The fact is he has excellent coadjutors, and he is not niggard with his god money.

That then Washburn took up Dr. Graty's book and they both looked out in the map attached to it for the river Tebicuari and the distances of the various departments from one another, all with reference to the military operations connected with the expected revolutionary movement.

That on the 16th of October deponent met Washburn near the columns of the government-house, and there they spoke of the events that had happened at the seat of war at the beginning of the month, deponent saying that the allies had been worsted, to which Washburn replied: "Unless it is an engagement as those described by the Seminario, in which one or two hundred kill several battalions without the loss of a single man;" that deponent also said on this occasion that the line of the besiegers did not reach yet as far as the river, and more in this sense.

That afterwards, deponent having gone to visit Washburn in his house, they talked about the news that the enemy had reached the river, sinking two vessels. Washburn said that they had done wrong in losing these vessels, because the army could not afford to be without them, and the Brazilian squadron would certainly come up. Deponent answered that these vessels did them much harm. On this occasion deponent also said that soon great events might be expected, alluding to the movement of which he (Washburn, knew, and which was the raising of the siege.

That subsequently, at the beginning of January, when deponent was casually visiting Washburn at the Trinidad House, the latter, after inquiring about the news, as was their wont, said that the situation was becoming every day more critical, and that it was necessary to put an end to this state of things, since there was a talk of even enlisting women to continue the war, and that this revealed the impossibility of arriving at an honorable treaty, (alluding to the different overtures of peace which the marshal had inflexibly rejected.) That such a thing (enlisting women) was ridiculous, and that his wife had told him that if this took place she would not remain any longer in a country that allowed such things; to which deponent replied that these demonstrations had no other object save to strengthen, if possible, the confidence of the public, adding, "If you go, you leave us in a pretty pickle;" and Washburn said, "If I remain, it is because I think that I shall be able to be of some service to you," (meaning with regard to the revolution.)

That on another occasion they met in the Campo Grande, when Washburn, who was coming from the house of Fidanza, asked deponent what was the news, both at the seat of war and in town, and being answered none, showed himself little pleased with the calm that prevailed, and deponent thought that it was in consequence of the visit he had just been paying, in company with Maulove, to Fidanza, who was one of those implicated in the revolution, when doubtless they had discussed the matter.

That shortly afterwards Washburn proceeded to Tapua. Deponent was there with his mother, whom Washburn went to thank for having lent him a quinta in Trinidad to pass the summer, and say that he intended returning to town. On taking leave of deponent he said to him that the person in charge of the French consulate was a fool, because he talked of things that were compromising.

"What are these things?" asked deponent.

WASHBURN. He talks about a new order of things; he picks up and repeats everything, and talks also much about local politics.

That, moreover, deponent remembers that even before the evacuation of the capital, talking of the probabilities that this measure would be adopted in consequence of the affair of Tayi, and Asuncion declared a military post, Washburn said to him that such a step would be absurd; that the government had no right to enforce it, and that he could even protest if the measure applied to foreign residents; that, after the evacuation had actually been decreed, José Berges referred in the office, in presence of a third party, that had been the same night on a visit at Washburn's, and talking about the evacuation of the capital, the latter had formally declared that he for his own part would do no such thing, and on that account he offered Berges an asylum if ever he required one, and begged him to say so to the government people. That Washburn maintained his right to protest against the evacuation, as he said to deponent, inasmuch as it concerned foreigners, and that the consuls were not discharging their duties when they withdrew, and that if he did not protest, it was because his own fellow-countrymen were few. That to declare the capital a fortress, with only one gun, and against iron-clads, running the risk of its being destroyed, was an unjustifiable error.

That deponent knows, also, that Washburn warmly maintained these same ideas with a view of being backed up by the French and Italian consuls, as they themselves said, but that they refused to support him; and the deponent, moreover, says that Washburn spoke in this sense to natives and foreigners, making the revolutionists understand that he did so in their interest; and, to inspire them with more confidence, he rented several houses, in which he began to give refuge to Englishmen, and then to Carreras and Rodriguez, who belong to the revolution.

That he remembers also that Washburn complained to him and others of his living in the capital, and said to him more particularly that the small consideration shown towards his person, and latterly towards his flag, would end by exasperating him and place the government in a situation even more critical than the actual one, letting one understand by this, deponent says, that he might break off abruptly the good relations between the republic and the United States.

That in Paso Pucu, after Washburn's return from the enemy's camp, bringing the bases and the letter of Caxias for deponent, the latter said to Washburn, that if they were successful he might reckon upon half a million and something more in order that, instead of going to Chili, he might go where he pleased, and that he said this because Washburn was always talking of going from hence to take charge of the legation in Chili, and that it was only this hope that made him put up with the Paraguayan legation.

That, besides this offer, deponent, about the end of October or beginning of November, delivered to Washburn, in two sums, the amount of one thousand gold ounces and $15,000 currency, telling him that if he required more he should not hesitate to say so, because there were three thousand ounces at his disposal.

That this amount was given to Washburn by deponent personally in Washburn's house in the capital, where deponent went, carrying it himself, the first time on foot, and the second time on horseback, on both occasions at dusk.

That deponent's object in giving Washburn this gratuity was on account of his official co-operation in the revolution.

That in the above-mentioned letter of Caxias, Washburn was said to have explained the plan intrusted to him by deponent; that Caxias was agreeable to it, and sent the required bases, urging that action should be taken in that sense; that the bearer (Washburn) would co-operate efficiently, and that he went bein cheio, (well paid.)

That these bases were the same as those proposed to the government by Mr. Gould, with the material difference that the change of government was the first in those received by deponent, whilst it appeared last in Gould's.

That Washburn, as appears, bribed by Marquis de Caxias, was intrusted to him with the commission of proposing ex-officially to the marshal of his own accord to resign, in order to make peace, which, knowing beforehand that the marshal would not consent, was done in order that Washburn might be at liberty to talk on the matter and popularize the idea that the marshal was the only cause of the war, and consequently that the alliance, far from attacking the nation, had no other object in view except to save it by means of a new government.

That in pursuance of this purpose, Mr. Washburn, wished to take advantage of the army being besieged to offer his services to the marshal on the same basis as Mr. Gould, with only some accidental changes, with a view of being enabled to go over to the enemy's camp, to hold an interview with the Marquis de Caxias, apprise him of the state of things with reference to the revolution, and urge him to move, in order to profit by the good dispositions of the nation.

That on another occasion Washburn said that probably when the war was at an end the country would give itself a constitution; to which deponent replied that he did not think it would be wise to do so when the nation emerged from so prostrate a condition.

WASHBURN. Do you intend going on with despotism?

DEPONENT. No, sir; laws will be given, but neither with the name nor character of constitution, viz., as is done in England.

WASHBURN. Mr. Berges is more constitutional than you are.

DEPONENT. That is because he has been in the United States.

That besides these conversations which deponent had with Washburn, the former knew, through Berges, that the latter was prepared to do anything he was asked or that was necessary in support of the revolution so as to secure its success, and Berges himself forwarded to him all the news that came from the army. In a word, that he was on the most perfect understanding with him, (Washburn,) and that the latter received and sent Berges's and Carreras's correspondence for outside, that had reference to the revolution, and also communicated all those he himself received.

That, in addition to all this, Washburn was bound, if the revolution was successful, to recognize the new government that should spring out of it, and in a contrary case give an asylum under his flag to the revolutionists.

That all the papers of the revolution which passed through deponent's hands were put by him into a square envelope, which he closed with gum and sealed, and then took in person to the American minister, after writing upon it "Private papers," and in a corner the initials "B. L.," that on delivering this envelope to the minister he told him, "I do not wish to leave these papers in my house, and therefore bring them to you;" to which Washburn replied "Very well;" and taking the envelope, placed it on a round table; that this happened when the papers in the government office began to be moved on account of the arrival of the iron-clads at Asuncion. It was about the 20th of February, about midday, deponent entered the drawing-room by the dining-room door, having been announced by the servant Katy; that during the few moments he remained with the minister they talked about the iron-clads, and the latter asked whether the city was to be evacuated. Deponent said, "Yes;" that when deponent entered the drawing-room the minister was drinking gin, and therefore asked him whether he preferred this or brandy, and on deponent saying he preferred the latter, he ordered Katy to bring some. She shortly afterwards came with a small tray, with some brandy and a wine-glass, and deponent took a little. Soon after deponent left, and Washburn accompanied him to the hall.

That the last conversation which deponent had with Washburn was on the 15th March. Deponent came to the capital on his way to the army; Washburn was going out of town, and they met two squares behind the church of San Roque, and stopped a few moments to converse. Washburn asked deponent where he was going, and being answered "To the army," said, "What can I do for you?" Deponent answered, "I commend to you my family, and wish you may be successful;" meaning that I left my family under his protection, as he had offered to look after defenceless people and their fortunes, and that he might be fortunate in the share he (Washburn) had taken in the revolution.

Now you will have the kindness to listen, for the first time, to another individual who mentions you. Ex-Commander General of Arms Venancio Lopez says what follows :

That on the 1st of April the American minister went to visit deponent at his house in town, and told him, "Humaita cannot resist the iron-clads, and much less can the fortifications improvised do so;" and that "Brazilians being masters of the Parana and of Misiones, it is impossible to dislodge them, and the Paraguayans are so locked in that there is no possible escape; however, in my house, which is at your disposal, you shall be guaranteed, but it cannot hold all. Moreover, it is necessary to preserve what you have acquired," (referring to the revolution,) "and it would be well for you to write to Caxias that your family and your interests may be saved. It is the only thing that remains to be done."

That, moreover, he told deponent to let Caxias know that all the leaders of the revolution had been sent to the army, and that therefore the whole plan was discovered. That deponent at first refused, not having any intercourse with Caxias, to which Washburn replied that it did not matter; deponent then asked him by what means he could send a communication, and Washburn replied by way of Caapacu, saying that there was one Tilifer, adding that Vasconcellos (the vice-consul) also knew this individual, and promising that he, together with deponent's letter, would send one.

That the American minister had stated the point at which the Brazilian advanced posts were stationed.

That deponent received Caxias's through the American minister, by the Wasp, and its contents were to the effect that he was not to be afraid, since all that was meant was a change of administration to avoid the ravages of the war.

That deponent also wrote another letter to Caxias, dated the 10th or 11th of May, saying that, on the faith of the American minister's assurance, he continued to work for the revolution, although with faint hopes of success, because the leaders had all been seized and their plans discovered; that it was forwarded by Washburn with his own dispatches, but no answer to it ever came.

That the American minister had taken charge of all the papers as a guarantee, it being understood that these papers are those that refer to the revolution. That those among them that were not thought of any interest were destroyed, as well as the rough copies. That deponent delivered to the minister himself the documents he found in Bedoya's possession, the same that Benigno had shown him on the afternoon of the day he arrived the last time at the camp, saying that those were the papers of which Bedoya also had spoken when he came; that the deponent had found them when he went to look for some pens in Bedoya's office, and that after Benigno's return he had forgotten all about them.

That said documents were under a sealed cover, marked Documentos de Salinares, and that he gave them to the American minister, together with a sheet of paper on which were written the names of the new administration; that he gave them on the 4th of July, about 10 a. m., in the house of the deponent's mother, where he lived; that Washburn, on receiving the sealed packet, said, "This will serve as a duplicate," showing that he was well aware of its contents.

That the words by which Washburn began to talk to deponent, and induce him to take part in the conspiracy, were as follows:

WASHBURN. What news? None, as usual?

DEPONENT. I know nothing.

WASHBURN. It is strange that your brother (the marshal) does not wish peace in spite of all I have done, and I cannot see any hope of victory, knowing the great power of Brazil, and its influence everywhere. Besides, all know the right of Brazil to sustain this war, into which it has been forced, and hence nobody dares offer its intervention, and your brother would be admired as among the most famous and valiant men if he were to resign, not because he is conquered, but for the sake of re-establishing peace, and allow Sanchez to take his place with a view of entering into negotiations. The great republic is the only one that ought to save Paraguay, and secure its autonomy. The secret treaty is ridiculous, and the United States will not recognize it. There are not many men of capacity here, and a few of the most prominent, who enjoy the confidence of the people, may be the means of salvation.

That deponent approved these ideas, and made up his mind to support the revolution, of which the minister was thus the principal promoter, and promised moreover to consent to become the organ of communication between the enemy and the conspirators.

That according to that Washburn himself told deponent, the object of his wishing to have the Wasp at Asuncion was that she might be there to protect his friends, and that he was surprised at Caxias's refusal to let her pass, which he could only attribute to his unwillingness to establish a precedent for others.

That when deponent asked Washburn how the situation could be saved, now that his excellency knew of the revolution, he was answered, "It is that canaille Couverville, who is incapable of keeping a secret, who has discovered all. But Caxias will not lose any time; he will hasten to take Humaita, then he will send the fleet this way, and move the army towards the Tebicuari, so that you (the conspirators) will be able to save yourselves, because I shall then ask for an armistice and propose the commissioners who are to treat with the allies; that once this is obtained, the situation would depend on the revolutionary movement, and consequently the national army would not be able to act, but must submit, since Caxias is sure to send troops which he will land wherever he thinks best for calling off the attention of the marshal, who being surrounded on all sides, his retreat will be rendered very difficult, and he will be forced into coming to terms not so advantageous as they would have been at first; that with regard to Humaita, it was no impediment to Caxias, and it had not suited his plans to have taken it sooner; besides, he preferred a surrender."

That after this revelation Washburn persuaded deponent to write to Caxias, saying that he and Comandante Fernandez were the only ones that could save the situation.

Next comes José Vicente Urdapilleta, ex-judge of second instance, who makes the following references to you:

That the American minister was compromised to guarantee the transmission of the communication which Benigno held with the enemy, who was to operate in combination with the revolutionary forces, and protect the movement by sending to Asuncion the iron-clads, with a landing force that was to be disembarked in the capital itself, or any other convenient spot, following the plan of operations to be agreed upon later on. That, moreover, Mr. Washburn undertook to employ his best efforts, and even go so far as to obtain the support of his government and make use of the material force at his disposal in the river Plata to assist in the realization of the intended movement, since among his instructions from his government was that of laboring for the maintenance of freedom among the South American nations.

That the moment or time when the revolution was to break out was to be announced by Mr. Washburn, as he had to come to an agreement with the commander-in-chief of the allied army, either by letter or by an interview.

That on another afternoon, about twenty days later, the deponent met, near the house of the Figueredos, Benigno Lopez, who was coming from his house in the Recoleta, and walked with him as far as the center of the town. On this occasion deponent asked how the revolution was getting on, and Benigno said that of all those who took part in it Mr. Washburn deserved more praise than all, and was lending very valuable services to the revolutionary cause, and that he was therefore entitled to great consideration both from the conspirators and the nation in general; and that in consequence he had given Mr. Washburn 1,500 gold ounces and $25,000 currency, to which deponent remarked that it was a great deal, and he must be well pleased, since he only received $5,000 annually from his government for his mission, which, according to his own declaration, was all the fortune he possessed. That then Benigno said that Washburn's deserts were also very great, since he was disposed to favor the conspirators by all the means at his disposal, and that he had said that he intended to get two or three men-of-war of the United States stationed at Asuncion, in order to be able to protect under his flag the insurgents in case they were defeated or that their plans miscarried. That upon all those grounds he (Benigno) had given the above sum to Washburn, and would, on the termination of this transaction, give him an equal or larger sum, (this deponent does not recollect well,) and that for the $25,000 in notes he could purchase a piece of land well situated for a country residence, and for which purpose he might dispose of government land at a moderate price.

That a few days afterwards deponent met Mr. Washburn coming from his house in Trinidad, near the house of Belilla, who asked him the news of the war.

URDAPILLET. I know nothing these last days; do you?

MINISTER. No more do I; but I am going to the government house, and if I hear anything I will call on my way back at your house. He then went on: "D. Benigno tells me that you are initiated into the revolution, and I am happy that men like you should take part in such things."

URDAPILLET. It is true; and you also have taken part in it to guarantee the communications with the enemy.

MINISTER. Yes; and something more than that. I have much pleasure in exerting myself for the project, and I shall even engage the name of my government, if necessary, because by instructions I am requested to do all I can to secure freedom to the nations of America. I propose going down the river to fetch my communications, which I have not received for some time past, and at the same time I will arrange matters between them. (Benigno and the enemy.)

URDAPILLET. I am glad to hear it, and hope you will do as you say.

MINISTER. Never fear; it shall be so.

That on another occasion, when deponent was standing at the door of his own house, and Washburn, as he frequently used to do, passed by, deponent asked him how matters were going.

MINISTER. (rubbing his hands.) I am awaiting anxiously for my dispatches from my government, and with them the other. (from the enemy.)

URDAPILLETA. And will this bring us any good?

MINISTER. Of course.

That after exchanging a few more words, they talked of the actual state of things, and Washburn said that it was well that Marshal Lopez should have rendered his country famous by his heroic defense of it; that when the war was over, many capitalists would come on a visit, and for the purpose of trading with it on account of its riches; but that, in spite of all this, and of Marshal Lopez having brought to light Paraguay, the government of the marshal in no way suited the nation, because a military chief is constantly inclined to war, and the alternatives of peace and war obstruct the progressive march of the country, because war destroys the wealth produced by peace; on the other hand, the country offered a large field for exploration, and by introducing improvements from abroad—such as machinery, &c.—great and rapid progress might be made if the government were not a military one.

That in one of their conversations Mr. Washburn told deponent that Saturnino Bedoya had offered him his quinta at Ibiray, a handsome two-story building, with furniture and everything necessary, even a servant, without charging anything for it. Deponent thought that this was not of mere friendship, but as a sort of return for Mr. Washburn's services in the cause of the revolution.

Francisco Rodriguez Larreta, who according to your own testimony is known to have been on terms of intimacy with you, says as follows:

That with regard to the conditions of the secret treaty of the "triple alliance," Minister Washburn said that although they were too harsh, Paraguay would sooner or later have to submit to them, because the Brazilians were very strong; and if this was later, the sooner it took place the better.

That, as a general principle of international law, Minister Washburn considered inadmissible the pretensions of the allies that his excellency Marshal Lopez should resign the supreme rule of the republic, and believed such a demand an attack on the independence and sovereignty of a constituted country; but in the present state of things he thought such resignation would afford the most efficacious means of bringing the war to an end, and that on this occasion he had resolved to support the revolution.

That when the minister came back from San Fernando he said that he had been able to do nothing with respect to the fate of Benigno Lopez and Saturnino Bedoya, and that he had only heard that Berges had been taken unwell in crossing the Chaco, which led him (Washburn) to believe that if Berges was ill in his house, it was so far reassuring as indicating that he was not a prisoner, and that therefore the revolutionary project was not to be considered as having fallen through, but, on the contrary, still practicable.

That, on the occasion of Leite Pereira presenting himself at the American legation for shelter, Washburn consulted Carreras and deponent as to what point the protection of his house could avail said Leite Pereira under present circumstances. That both deponent and Carreras said that he had in no way the right to give him shelter if he was claimed by the tribunal as being charged criminally; and in order more fully to convince him, they referred him to the principal authors on international law that treat this point, such as Vattel, Martens, Wheaton, Haussefeuille, and Andres Bello; and that, notwithstanding his conviction that he had no right to do so, and knowledge that he (Pereira) was implicated in the revolution, Washburn admitted him into his house.

That Minister Washburn has guaranteed to the revolutionary committee the protection of his house, and promised those who had already taken refuge with him that he would not deliver them up to justice unless compelled to do so by force, as he said himself to deponent, which proved the fact that up to the very moment when deponent and Carreras went out into the streets to place themselves in the hands of justice, Washburn repeated to them that if they did not wish to deliver themselves up they had only to say so, and he would never consent to their being taken away except by main force.

That Minister Washburn entreated deponent and Carreras not to reveal that he had any knowledge of the affairs of the revolution, and not to compromise him in their depositions, offering them every possible assistance in case they remained in Asuncion; that both deponent and Carreras assured him they would not reveal the secret, or in any way betray him.

That in different conversations they had during deponent's stay at the legation, Washburn expressed his concern in the event of the revolution falling through without their being able to attain the end they sought, in order to put an end to the war, and lamented the probable fate of all those who had taken a part in the plot.

That Minister Washburn received the sum of $140,000 in notes, according to what Washburn himself revealed to deponent; that this money was given to him by Benigno Lopez, in the last days of February or beginning of March, (deponent does not recollect the date exactly;) that the money was carried by two women-servants of Benigno himself on their heads, in two journeys, about dark; that deponent was present once when one of these servants came in with the money; and that the minister placed the sum of $40,000 at the disposal of deponent and Carreras, according to a request he said he had received from Benigno himself. Deponent and Carreras, however, did not take the money, not knowing what to do with it at the time, and consequently the whole amount remained in the minister's possession.

Dr. Carreras says also:

That Mr. Washburn maintains in principle that although the government of Paraguay is not bound to give in to the pretensions of the allies with regard to the resignation by his excellency Marshal Lopez of the presidency of the republic, still in the present state of things, and owing to the prolongation of the war and the consequent annihilation of the country, it is advisable to make a spontaneous and personal sacrifice, so long as the national independence is sacred; and since the marshal is determined not to give in, and is inspired by a fanaticism to carry on the war until the country is totally destroyed, he (Washburn) thinks that any means is good which will save the nation from so complete a sacrifice, and consequently has approved the plan of the revolution and taken part in it to overturn the marshal by hunger or by the dagger.

Your excellency is also alluded to by Leite Pereira, Antonio Vasconcellos, and others of the revolutionary party, who have been more or less aware of the important part they say you have taken in it.

But I shall conclude these quotations with one more of ex-Minister Berges's, who says that when you complained of the want of the necessities of life, such as sugar, brandy, coffee, wine, and even clothes, as you could find nothing but aguardiente of the country, Berges had remarked that with money and yerba one might get on, (alluding to the fact that Berges himself supplied you with yerba and Benigno with money.) To this deponent goes on to say the minister replied, "It is true that you supply me with yerba, and Benigno has given me some money."

Deponent said, "It cannot have been a small sum."

The minister replied, "What Benigno gave me is, at the present rate of exchange, approximately equal to what you gave in North America to Ward and Carlisle."

For all this, and for the antecedents of which your excellency is aware, my government would have been justified to have broken off some time back all intercourse with a minister who, in the critical circumstances through which the Paraguayan people is passing, figures, by the testimony of the infamous traitors of the country themselves, as one of them. My government, however, ever anxious to give the most unequivocal proofs of its high consideration and regard towards the government of the great American republic, has done no such thing, but only confines itself to remitting to you the passports which you have repeatedly solicited in order to leave the country, and I am happy to inform you that the Wasp, which has come to fetch you, is waiting for you in Villeta, and that a steamer will be in attendance in the port of Asuncion for you and your suite.

Among the individuals of the legation the accused Bliss and Masterman, as not belonging to it, cannot obtain their passports, and they must remain to answer the charges that are hanging over them before the local courts of justice. Neither can Balthazar, Carrera's servant, leave the country, for which reason his name does not appear in the passport.

Having thus also replied to your note, dated 2d instant, relative to the arrival of the Wasp, I avail myself of the opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of distinguished consideration.

LUIS CAMINOS.

His Excellency CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, September 5, 1868.

Mr. Washburn, the United States minister, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the note of his honor Luis Caminos, of the 4th instant, in which, at his conclusion, he says that passports will be furnished as requested to all save Mr. Bliss, Mr. Masterman, and Balthazar, and that a Paraguayan steamer will be ready to-day to take the minister and suite to Villeta, where the United States gunboat Wasp is waiting to receive them on board. Mr. Washburn will endeavor to be ready, if he can obtain the peones or carretas necessary to carry his trunks, boxes, &c., to the banks of the river, and will be greatly obliged to his honor Señor Caminos if he could assist him in procuring them. He has in his possession a large quantity of patacones, belonging mostly to English, who have requested him to send it or take it away in case he should have the opportunity. Will Señor Caminos be kind enough to inform him if the government will object to his doing so?

Señor Caminos to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Asuncion, September 5, 1868.

I have the honor to notify you of the reception of your verbal note of this date in answer to mine of yesterday.

As Mr. Washburn is not anxious to leave to-day, the steamer will wait for him till to-morrow, so that he need not put his baggage aboard in the rain. I will give the necessary orders for this as well as for the drays he may need.

You will please give me the names of the persons who want to send off money by you, and the quantity that each wishes to send.

I embrace the occasion to offer you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

LUIS CAMINOS.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, September 5, 1868.

Mr. Washburn, the American minister, in answer to your note of to-day, has the honor to state that, from a hasty examination of the contents of the bags and boxes left in his charge by certain English subjects, he has made out the following. Many of the bags and boxes not having their contents marked upon them, and being either sealed or nailed, it is not easy to give the exact amount of each. The list of those which have the quantity marked upon them by the owner is given, and the weight of the bags not counted is given as accurately as possible:

List of patacones.

1 bag of Dr. Skinner, 600 patacones; 1 bag of R. V. Treuenfeld, 287 patacones; 1 small bag, Dr. Stewart, 8 pounds; 1 bag, George Thompson, 291 patacones; another of the same, 800, marked; 1 bag, H. Volpy, not marked, 47½ pounds; another bag, George Thompson, 153 patacones; 1 bag, Charles Twite, 100 patacones; 1 large bag of Charles Twite, not counted, 70 pounds; another, sd., George Thompson, not counted, 48½ pounds; 1 parcel of George Thompson, not counted, 41 pounds; 1 parcel of George Thompson, marked 400 patacones, 500 paper; 1 tin box of Michael Hunter, weighs 52 pounds; 1 bag of George Thompson, weighs 10½ pounds; 1 box of Charles Schutt, weighs 26 pounds; 1 box of C. H. Thompson, not counted; 1 box of Michael Hunter, not counted, 19 pounds; 1 bag of Michael Hunter, not counted, 300 patacones; 1 bag of Dr. Skinner, not counted, 822 patacones; 1 bag of Alonzo Taylor, not counted, 60 pounds; 2 bags of H. Volpy, not counted, 300 patacones each; 1 bag of C. Twite, not counted 18 pounds; 1 bag more, large, of C. Twite, not counted; 1 bag more, small, of C. Twite, not counted, 200 patacones; 1 bag of C. H. Thompson, contents unknown; 1 bag of Michael Hunter, contents not marked; 1 bag of Mrs. Thomas; 1 bag of G. T. Maggs, contents unknown; 1 balize of G. T. Maggs, contents unknown; 1 balize of J. Cambridge, contents unknown; 1 box of J. Cambridge, contents not marked; 1 box of R. V. Treuenfeld, contents not marked; 1 large box of Alonzo Taylor, contents unknown; 1 trunk, marked Dr. Stewart, contents unknown; 1 bag of Charles Twite, 200 patacones; 1 bag of P. Burrell, 260 patacones; 1 package of Dr. Skinner, 260 patacones; 1 bag of Michael Hunter, 300 patacones; 1 bag of Miss Eden, not counted; 1 bag of Mr. Volpy, 315 patacones; 1 bag of Miss Grant, 310 patacones; 1 box of C. H. Thompson, contents unknown; 1 box of R. V. Treuenfeld, contents unknown.

Others, not English, have left money in charge of this legation with the same request, but the above list contains the large part of what is in its possession. Some, however, have left their property in iron safes that the American minister will be unable to take, and these, with the trunks and boxes that he will be unable to deliver to their owners before his departure, he will leave in his house, to be given to their owners by his successor, or by such other persons as may be duly authorized by his government to deliver them, as also are left a part of the archives of the legation.

Señor Caminos to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,

Luque, September 5, 1868.

After answering your verbal note of yesterday officially, another note comes to me, and in it you say that other persons not English had left money with you to be taken away, but that the list you sent contained the most of what you had; and you add, that some may have left their property in safes that you could not carry, and that you left them in your house, to be delivered to the owners by your successor and some person appointed by the government, and that you were also going to leave a part of the archives of the legation.

I must say, Mr. Minister, that your manner of treating this matter verbally seems very singular to me, particularly as it is of such importance, and consequently I make the following reply:

1. The English alluded to are those who are in the government service and wish to aid their families abroad by their pay, and it is not meant as a particular favor to the English nation to the slight of other nations friendly to Paraguay.

2. Whatever commission you may have received from persons not mentioned to take away their money, you cannot do it without due obedience to the laws of the country in such cases made and provided.

3. It appears, from cases already decided, that several criminals deposited their robberies of the treasury in your house, when the money does not belong to them, and cannot be taken out of the country legally.

4. My government will not be responsible for effects at your legation after you have left it, particularly as it is in a hired house; nor is there any law to prevent the owner from taking possession of it whenever he pleases; and therefore, if you leave anything there, no matter what it is, it will be considered as abandoned property. It would be entirely different if your successor had arrived; but he has not yet been announced, and when you quit the house no person shall enter it, for then the evacuation of Asuncion will be complete, as you were the only person who refused to leave the city.

I cannot understand your reasons, Mr. Minister, for abandoning a house in a depopulated city, where you were the only inhabitant, and leaving the archives of your legation in it; but as it is not my business to demand your reasons for anything you do, in respect to the great American republic, I offer to receive under seal all the papers of the legation, and to hold them subject to the order of the American government.

Yours, &c.,

LUIS CAMINOS.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

ASUNCION, September 6, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, in which your honor makes certain objections to my taking away money belonging to other people than those in the government employ, or for persons whose names are not given. In reply to this I will remark, that there are only two persons having money here to my knowledge, which I should feel authorized to take away. These two are Domingo Parodi, Italian, and Carlos Ulrich, German. The former has left with me two bags marked 800 pats. each, and a light box supposed to contain jewelry. The latter has left with me a box marked 709 pats. There is, however, a bag of patacones here belonging to Mrs. Grant, widow of the late Wm. Grant, which I promised to send her, and for which I shall be held responsible. That is all the money not belonging to myself that I propose to carry away. I have no interest in it, and only wish to take it as a favor to the owners. But if your government objects, I shall only ask that its decision may be soon made known to me, for as soon as this matter is arranged I shall be ready to depart. In fact, my own affairs are ready, and I am anxious to be off, as I know the commander of the Wasp is very impatient to return to Buenos Ayres. Will you have the kindness to advise me at the earliest moment of the hour when the steamer is to start?

Should your government not object to my taking away the money above referred to, your honor will do me a great favor if you could advise the owners to send me a couple of strong boxes to pack it in, and at the same time send a clerk to take an account of it. A part of the sum mentioned in my list of yesterday was delivered to the order of Messrs. Hunter and Nesbet.

Respecting the archives of the legation and the former consulate, which I shall not take with me, I shall leave them in the office of the legation, not expecting any further care or responsibility on the part of the Paraguayan government than for the house or property of any foreigner.

I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of the passports, for which please accept my thanks.

I improve this occasion to tender to your honor assurances of high regard and distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor LUIS CAMINOS,
Acting Minister of Foreign Relations.

Señor Caminos to Mr. Washburn.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Asuncion, September 6, 1868.

Your note of this morning, in answer to mine of yesterday, is in hand, and as I have already answered you orally, I maintain what I said in my note to you yesterday.

In relation to the money which you said you thought you had a right to take away with you, I will inform you that you can only take Parodi's and that belonging to the widow of Alexander Grant, after having satisfied the law. Charles Ulrich's case is different: he received large sums from the treasury, and you will please deliver it to the police. On your last visit to the department I gave you the names of some ladies who heard you were remaining to deliver them the deposits they made with you, and now other persons have come to claim their deposits, and it is to be hoped, Mr. Minister, that you will delay your departure till their requests can be complied with.

I regret the occasion of this delay; but this is simple justice to families that would be bankrupt if they lost the money they had deposited in the American legation. I will order the steamer to wait until you have refunded all the deposits, and if you will give me the names of the depositors I will assist you in finding them out.

Yours, &c.,

LUIS CAMINOS.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, September 7, 1868.

SIR: In my note of yesterday, in speaking of the money in my possession belonging to persons in the service of the government, I observed that if no objection was made I would be willing to take it away, but that in that case it would be a favor to me to have the owners send a couple of strong boxes to put it in, and to have some official to take an account of it. But as I have received no answer to this proposition I shall proceed, if not otherwise advised by you, to put it in such boxes as I can find, and, with your permission, will send it aboard the steamer.

Your honor will permit me to repeat my verbal request of yesterday, that Mrs. Leite Pereira may be furnished with a pass to go to her country house. I understood from your honor that it would be granted, but I sent my servant for it yesterday and he was unable to obtain it.

I improve this occasion to renew to your honor assurances of high regard and distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor LUIS CAMINOS,
Acting Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, September 7, 1868..

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, in which your honor informs me that the money left with me belonging to Señor Parodi, and that of Mrs. Grant, I should be permitted to take with me, paying the duty. Mr. Parodi has already taken his away, and I will pay the duty on the three hundred patacones of Mrs. Grant. Ulrich's money will be left with the other things in my house. Your honor also informs me that many people who have left their valuables in my house are desirous of taking them away before my departure, and the hope is expressed that I will delay my voyage till they may be able to do so, as some of them will be rendered insolvent if unable to recover their property now in my possession. In answer to this, I will observe that all these things will be left in two or three rooms of this house, the keys of which will be sent to the care of your honor, so that I do not see why they may not recover them as well after my departure as before, and I shall therefore decline to delay my voyage a single hour for such purpose. I am ready to go now, at an hour's notice, and have been so ever since I received my passports, and if I do not leave to-day it will be because I am unable to do so. Your honor will know at what hour the steamer will leave, and till near that time I shall be happy to deliver to their owners any things in my possession.

I improve this occasion to tender to your honor assurances of high regard and distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor LUIS CAMINOS,
Acting Minister of Foreign Relations.

Señor Caminos to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Asuncion, September 7, 1868.

I have received two notes from you to-day; one about taking away money belonging to persons in government service, and about a passport for Mrs. Leite Pereira. The first question has been settled, as you will find in my note, and a pass is not needed for the lady, as the police is informed of her intended departure with you for Trinidad.

The second note, in answer to mine of yesterday, says: Mr. Parodi has drawn his money, and will pay the duty on the three hundred dollars of Mrs. Grant, and Mr. Ulrich's would be left in the house with the goods of other persons; and you said all the other property would be locked up in the house and the keys given to me, and you did not see why the owners could not get their property after you were gone as well as they could before, and you would not stop for that.

Allow me to disagree with you: First, Because only you and the depositors know anything about the deposits, their nature and value. Second, If locked in two or three rooms, who could deliver them but yourself? Third, Who could know anything about the claims, where no receipts had been given, but yourself? Fourth, In case of deposits missing, who could be responsible but you? Fifth, I will not receive the keys you propose to leave with me; who, then, will open the rooms and distribute the goods?

As to Ulrich's money, I have already told you it must be delivered to the police, and not left in the house.

You are mistaken when you say I prevent your departure. The persons whose money you have demand your delay and the return of their deposits.

Yours, &c.,

LUIS CAMINOS.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, September 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, in which you express entire dissent from the course that I had proposed to take at my departure from Paraguay. Having received my passports, I can have no further discussion on points of a diplomatic character. All the persons who left their property with me did it at their own risk and responsibility, as I told them that neither I nor my government would be responsible for anything left with me. I certainly shall not assume any such responsibility now. As people have made infamous charges against me in connection with another matter, false in every particular, the same parties, or perhaps others, may allege that they have left untold sums of money with me that I have refused to deliver; or it may, for aught I know, be weeks before the parties who have left their goods with me come to claim them. In that case am I to be detained in the country till they are all taken away? In your earlier note of yesterday your honor observes that numerous persons have solicited my delay, both Paraguayans and foreigners, in order to withdraw their effects previous to my departure. Why have they not, in the meanwhile, come for them? A few foreigners have done so, but not a single Paraguayan. How long am I expected to wait?

Your honor remarks that persons having their property deposited in my house solicited my detention, according to the laws of the country, till they could take it away. Had those persons been aware that a foreign minister is subject to the laws of nations only, and not to the laws of the country to which he is accredited, they would not probably have made such a request.

In regard to the money left in my hands by Charles Ulrich, I will remark that three of the rooms occupied by this legation, numbered 97, 99, and 101, were rented by me from the said Ulrich, and that he has other property in them. Desiring to meet your views as far as I can consistently with my duty, this box of money will be left by me with the other things belonging to Ulrich in these rooms, over which I shall claim no legation privileges from this time, and the keys will be delivered to your honor, or to such person as may be designated to receive them, whenever they may be called for.

I am willing to do anything in reason, Mr. Minister, to facilitate persons in obtaining possession of their property; but as I only received it as a favor to them, at their own risk, I do not consider I am under any obligations to remain here on their account. The most of my trunks are already on board of the steamer, and we are left without many things absolutely necessary for health and comfort. In your note of the 4th instant you advised me that a steamer would be ready to take me away and put me aboard the Wasp on the following day, and in your note of yesterday you say that you will order the steamer to still wait for me. I trust that the offers thus made may be so far complied with that I may be able to leave to-day.

I am sorry, Mr. Minister, to feel that I ought not to conform to your views, and I therefore ask again for the means of going on board the Wasp, that has been waiting to receive me for more than a week.

With this note I send another for Captain Kirkland, commanding the Wasp, which I beg your honor to forward to him as soon as possible.

I improve this occasion to renew assurances of high consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor LUIS CAMINOS,
Acting Minister of Foreign Relations.

Señor Caminos to Mr. Washburn.

[Translation.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Asuncion, September 8, 1868.

I have the honor to notify you of the reception of your note of this date, asking my assistance to enable you to get away. I answer briefly.

I intended to have no more diplomatic intercourse with you after I sent you your passport, and if I have exchanged a few notes with you the reasons were justified by their contents.

If the persons who deposited their property in your hands did so at their own risk, though you assumed no responsibility for yourself or your government, it does not seem to me to be very honorable in the minister of a nation so much respected by our people to abandon those deposits, unless compelled to do so by superior force.

To save you the delay of weeks, as you say, waiting for people to withdraw their deposits, I proposed to notify them as soon as you furnished their names to do so, or run the risk of their loss; but you did not accept my proposal.

As to false claims that may be made for fabulous sums, you are the best judge. You say a few foreigners have withdrawn their deposits, while no native has appeared, and you cannot account for it. I account for it in this way: As all the natives went to the country, they have not had the time to return and withdraw their deposits.

I will order the police to receive the keys of Nos. 97, 99, and 101, to which you refer, containing the goods of Mr. Charles Ulrich.

I regret, Mr. Minister, that you cannot have your carriage put on board; but this inconvenience might have been avoided had your own conduct been different.

To hasten your departure, and seeing that you are willing to give up the goods to their owners, let me suggest that you leave them with the agent of some friendly power, who will deliver them up according to your direction; or, if this does not suit you, select some trusty person of a mercantile firm to make the distribution. I will not object to your choice of any foreigner of your acquaintance, who may be in the service of the government, for that purpose.

Finally, I propose, in case you are determined to abandon the property, to send an officer of the government to take care of it, provided you will give a certified list of the goods, with the documents received with them, so that the owners may come and get them upon receipts you may have given, or meet together and decide among themselves who are the proper owners. I take no responsibility for the officer nor for the government, as neither knew of the deposits; and any future dispute must be between you and the depositors.

The Rio Apa is at your service whenever you choose to leave, and you can do so to-morrow if you like, if you will settle the little difficulty about the deposits, as you seem disposed to do.

If you still entertain a suspicion that I wish to delay your departure, I hope the tenor of this note will remove it.

I have forwarded your note to the commander of the Wasp.

I remain yours, &c.,

LUIS CAMINOS.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, September 8, 1868.

SIR: I thank you very cordially for your note of this day, and accept your suggestion, to leave my house and the property which different persons have left in it in charge of a representative of some neutral power or to some other foreigner of established character and position. In accordance with this proposition I have selected the Italian consul, Señor Chapperson, dean of the consular body in Paraguay, as the most eligible and proper person for this office. I do not know whether he will accept the charge or not, and I have written a telegram to him which I send to the telegraph station at the same time I send this note to your honor. The conditions of responsibility are freely accepted by me, as I have never assumed any; and whenever I have given receipts, which has not been more than two or three times, I have expressly stated in them that the property was left entirely at the risk of the owners. Immediately after hearing from Señor Chapperson I will advise you, and probably shall then be able to inform you of the hour when everything on my part may be arranged for my departure.

I improve this occasion to renew to your honor assurances of high regard and distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor LUIS CAMINOS,
Acting Minister of Foreign Relations.

Señor Caminos to Mr. Washburn.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Asuncion, September 9, 1868.

I hereby acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday, informing me that you had written to the consul of Italy, asking him to take charge of the archives of your legation and of the deposits of valuables left with you, and saying you would notify me of his acceptance of the charge by Mr. Chapperson.

You write me at noon to-day that the charge has been accepted, and that the archives and deposits will remain at the legation, as I suggested.

I cannot consent that the house you occupied shall continue to be the office of the legation after your departure, as it then will be like any other house in the deserted city. But you and Mr. Chapperson are at liberty to keep the archives and deposits in any house you please.

You will notify Mr. Chapperson that, as you have agreed that the deposits be delivered in presence of government officials, one will attend to witness the acts of delivery.

If Mr. Stewart, Skinner, Burrell, and Twite, or any other who has deposited money with you, presents to you, personally or by deputy, a legal permit to take their money away with you, the government will not object, provided the money is legally exported.

The Rio Apa is waiting for you, and I have ordered the necessary assistance in getting your effects on board.

Yours, &c.,

LUIS CAMINOS.

Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Washburn to Señor Caminos.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, September 10, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of yesterday. I had never supposed or claimed that this legation would remain as such, or have any immunities or privileges more than any other house in Asuncion, after I had left the country.

In regard to the delivery of the property of other persons left in my charge, I have requested Señor Chapperson not to deliver it to its owners without the knowledge of the authorities; and as many of the trunks and boxes have no mark or name upon them, I see no objection to the presence of an employé of the government, to make sure that they are delivered to their rightful owners.

I have no notice from any of the persons still having money in my possession, viz., Stewart, Skinner, Burrell, and Twite, that they have the permission of the government to send it out of the country. I have received, however, a letter from Dr. Skinner, requesting me to deliver his trunk to the minister of war and marine, and take his money away with me. From the others I have only verbal requests, made months ago, to do them the same favor. I therefore shall leave it all in charge of the Italian consul, to be delivered to its rightful owners.

Your honor will pardon me if I again say I am ready and impatient to leave, and as you say the Rio Apa is waiting to receive me, I will remark that as soon as I can send on board my remaining luggage I shall be ready to follow. I certainly hope to get away by 9 o'clock this morning, and get on board the Wasp by mid-day, as our situation here is very disagreeable.

Will your honor please advise me to whom I am to pay the duties on the three hundred dollars belonging to Mrs. Grant, as payment was refused to be received yesterday at the Capitama del Puerto.

I take this occasion to renew assurances of distinguished consideration.

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

His Honor LUIS CAMINOS,
Acting Minister of Foreign Relations.

Señor Caminos to Mr. Washburn.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Asuncion, September 10, 1868.

I hasten to answer your note of this morning by saying that the Rio Apa is ready to take you to the Wasp, and the commander has orders to start as soon as you get on board.

The three hundred dollars belonging to the Widow Grant are exempted from export duty, in consideration of the services of her late husband, just as a larger sum was exempted when that lady left the country.

Yours, &c.,

LUIS CAMINOS.

Mr. Washburn to President Lopez.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WASP, OFF ANGOSTURA,
Paraguay River, September 12, 1868.

SIR: When Captain Kirkland was about leaving this vessel yesterday to bid farewell to your excellency, I gave him a memorandum of certain things, to which I requested him to call your attention. Captain Kirkland informs me that on reaching your headquarters he found he had omitted to take this memorandum with him, and therefore was unable to comply fully with my request, having only given the paper a hasty perusal. I therefore take the liberty, at the moment of my departure, of deviating from diplomatic customs, and sending a personal note directed to your excellency. In this memorandum I suggested that he might show you a letter from General Webb, our minister in Rio, from which it would appear that he had almost come to a rupture with that government, by reason of its refusal to permit this vessel to pass above the squadron. This he had done on his own responsibility, without waiting for orders from the United States government, which, on hearing of the outrage, has doubtless taken the most energetic measures to enforce its rights and extricate its minister from a most frightful position. This letter which you saw proves how much truth there was in the declaration of your ex-minister for foreign affairs, José Berges, that I was in collusion with General Webb, and in the interest and pay of the Brazilians.

I have in my possession several letters for Dr. Carreras, which I yesterday requested Captain Kirkland to deliver, but which he refused to do unless I would open them, lest he too should be accused of conveying treasonable correspondence. I herewith send the letters, however, as I do not believe that any treasonable correspondence has ever passed through my hands for or to anybody. In fact, I do not believe there has ever been any conspiracy.

The declarations of Berges, your two brothers Venancio and Benigno, and Sr. Urdepilleta, as given in the notes of your two last ministers of foreign relations, in so far as they implicate me as having any knowledge of a conspiracy, are entirely false, and you know it; and you know that not one of them would confirm or affirm the declaration imputed to him if he were out of your power, but would deny it "in toto," and declare that he had never made it, or that he had done so under torture. Declarations of that kind, your excellency ought to know, will have no weight outside of Paraguay. Not one word of them will be believed, and that all may not be denied by them, you must not only kill off all the persons who have made them, but all by whom they were extorted.

Before finally leaving Paraguay, it is my duty to make my solemn protest against the arrest of those two members of my legation, Porter Cornelius Bliss and George F. Masterman. Their arrest in the street, as they were going with me from the legation to pass on board the steamer, was as gross a violation of the law of nations as would have been their seizure by force in my house. It was an act not only against my government, but against all civilized powers, and places Paraguay outside the pale of the family of nations; and for this act you will be regarded as a common enemy, one denying allegiance to the law of nations.

You will also be regarded as a common enemy for having seized and made prisoners, and loaded with fetters, nearly all the foreigners in Paraguay, and afterwards entered their houses and taken away their money, on the miserable pretext that, finding less in your treasury than you expected, those who had any money in the country must therefore have robbed it from the government.

Your threat to Captain Kirkland, on his first arrival, that you would keep me a prisoner in the country, will be duly represented to my government, and I only wish to confirm his reply to you, that had you done so my government would have hunted you not only through all South America, but throughout all Europe.

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

HIS EXCELLENCY MARSHAL LOPEZ,
President of Paraguay.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Goodfellow.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, September 7, 1868.

MY DEAR SIR: Appreciating the friendly interest you have always shown in me, and the kindness with which you have aided my family to obtain news from me during my long detention in Paraguay, I think it proper to send you the present letter by Mr. Washburn, who will doubtless make known to you in detail the unprecedented events which have recently transpired here affecting the rights of all neutral nations, and more especially involving an unexampled violation of the immunities of the American legation, and of the treatment due to an accredited minister of the United States.

You will learn, sir, with surprise, that in common with hundreds of foreigners and natives, comprising almost all the adult males of the country who were not bearing arms, I am accused of belonging to a conspiracy against the government of Marshal Lopez, with the additional aggravation respecting me that I am also charged with belonging to a secret committee, who have put their hands to a compact to assassinate the marshal. You can readily judge of the probabilities of both accusations, and will easily believe me when I say that there is not even the slightest foundation for them, and that, so far from knowing of any conspiracy, I have grave doubts whether any has existed, notwithstanding all the acts of this government, and the so-called confessions of criminals, to be found in the published correspondence between Mr. Washburn and the minister of foreign affairs. This doubt is, I believe, common to all the persons belonging to the American legation.

You will also see the herculean efforts which have been made by this government to fasten upon Mr. Washburn a complicity with the real or pretended revolutionary plot. You will see the false testimony which has been put into the mouths of prominent persons. Much of these statements are self-contradictory, and all of them conflict with each other upon the most essential points; and lastly, they all have this in common, that they furnish no definite information concerning the organization, objects, means, and occasion of action, nor even who were to take the decisive steps; besides, among so many revolutionary papers alluded to, apparently not one of that character has been seized by this government.

But I have no need to discuss the matter further; the truth is evident, and will be recognized by every one in Buenos Ayres. I hope some decided action will proceed from the ministers of neutral nations in Buenos Ayres, though I can scarcely hope that any such action can benefit me, as I am already declared guilty by the government, although not having the slightest idea of the nature of the testimony, necessarily false or forged, which has been or will be produced against me.

All persons in this legation have passed the last two months, since the extradition of myself and Mr. Masterman was demanded, in a state of continual agitation, alternating between hope and despondency, and following the course of the correspondence, which, on the part of this government, has steadily gone from bad to worse.

I desire to bear the strongest testimony to the fact that, as to all the statements implicating Mr. Washburn in the conspiracy, there is not one of whose truth I have any knowledge, and most of them I know to be false. I also wish to bear witness to the unswerving constancy with which he has insisted upon the rights of legation, and done for me all that could be appropriate under the circumstances. Whatever may happen to me, I can meet my fate with a stout heart and perfect confidence in the Great Architect of the universe, knowing that my Redeemer liveth. I have written at large to my family.

Accept my gratitude for favors received from you and Mrs. Goodfellow, to whom I send my love, and regards to all inquiring friends.

Yours, most truly,

PORTER C. BLISS.

Rev. WILLIAM GOODFELLOW.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Davis.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Asuncion, September 10, 1868.

DEAR SIR: You will learn from Mr. Washburn of the queer doings that have been going on here for two months past, or, at all events, will learn enough about it from the newspapers. I never thought to be accused of "high treason" by any government under the sun; for, being a musical genius, as you are aware, I am clearly not fit for "treasons, stratagems, and spoils." Whatever comes of the affair, I desire to bear testimony to the persistent efforts of Mr. Washburn to save myself and Mr. Masterman, my fellow-rascal, (as the official correspondence of the ministry here politely designate us.) Mr. Washburn had liked to have shared the fate of the hero of his own novel, if the United States gun-boat Wasp had not very opportunely come to his rescue. As it is, he escapes "by the skin of his teeth," after all possible obstacles have been put in the way of his departure. The Wasp is now lying but a league below here, but is not allowed to come up. I suppose Mr. Washburn will leave to-day, and I shall immediately be nabbed by the twenty or thirty "guardians" who have kindly "looked after me for the last two months."

I hope for relief from our government in three or four months; that is, if it don't come too late for any practical purpose, so far as I am concerned.

Please give my best regards to General Webb and family. I hope Mr. Washburn will arrange all little matters between us; please give him any letters or keepsakes of any little value for my family that I left in a trunk with you. I accompany some lines for Mrs. Davis.

Yours, faithfully,

PORTER C. BLISS.

GEO. N. DAVIS, Esq.

Mr. Bliss to Mr. Washburn.

SEPTEMBER 11, 1868.

SIR: Finding myself at length relieved from the restraint which your excellency has so long exercised over my will, I cannot do less than express freely and spontaneously the important part which your excellency has taken in the revolution in which you have involved many persons, and among them myself. I have declared (feeling deeply, because I would like to avoid such a scandal to your excellency, but following out the truth) that your excellency has been the soul of the revolution; and if this deed now appears to the light of Heaven confessed to by all its accomplices, to whom does it owe its existence save to your excellency, who has continued its direction up to a very recent period? I consider myself, therefore, completely absolved from the promise which your excellency extorted from me yesterday in your office not to reveal your proceedings, old or new. Even your brilliant speculations with the company of Hopkins, for which your excellency ought to pocket a hundred and odd thousand of patacones, have been put in evidence, as also the gilded pill you made Polidoro and Octaviano swallow, as also the last of Caxias, at the time of your excellency's celebrated visit of mediation in March, last year.

The object of this letter is, to say to you that I have determined to request from your excellency the delivery to the bearer of my historical manuscripts, which involve a compromise with this government, and which are, without reason, in deposit with your excellency, you having taken possession of them during my illness last year, and because I have forgotten to demand them of you. They consist, as your excellency well knows, of a voluminous history of Paraguay till the year 1810, and some two thousand pages, or more, of notes in Spanish on more recent epochs, with the chronology up to our days.

Also, I beg that your excellency will have the goodness to send me the three letters written by express order of your excellency, for your justification regarding the affairs of the revolution, of which one is addressed to the New York World, another to Rev. Wm. T. Goodfellow, in Buenos Ayres, and the last to my father, Henry Bliss, of New York.

The truth having been fully displayed, these letters cannot serve your excellency for any object, and, since they are false, it suits me no longer to keep the mystery of hypocrisy, and for your own honor your excellency ought to comply strictly with these my demands.

I do not exact from you the English manuscripts which your excellency made me write in a spirit inimical to Paraguay, since these are the property of your excellency; but I advise you, as a friend, not to attempt to fight against the evidence given by infinite witnesses.

I take advantage of the occasion to salute your excellency with distinguished esteem and appreciation.

PORTER C. BLISS.

His Excellency Hon. CHARLES A. WASHBURN,
United States Minister Resident.

Mr. Washburn to Mr. Stewart.

BUENOS AYRES, September 24, 1868.

SIR: When I left Paraguay on the 12th instant, I regret to inform your excellency that nearly all the foreigners in that country, including several of your countrymen, were in prison, and as I am the only person beyond the reach of President Lopez's power who has any personal knowledge of their situation, it seems to be my duty to give any information I possess to the representatives of the different foreign governments, that, knowing the condition of their unfortunate countrymen, they may take such action as may seem most proper in order to extricate them from their terrible situation. Unless speedy action is taken there may be none left to tell the tale of their annihilation.

To give an idea, therefore, of the situation there, and of the dangers and horrors to which all foreigners in that country are subjected or exposed, I propose to give a brief narrative of the events that have transpired since the 21st of February last. On the evening of that day, on returning from a duck-shooting "paseo," I learned that several Brazilian iron-clads had passed Humaita, and were on the way to the capital. On reaching my house, I was informed that the minister of foreign affairs, José Berges, had sent an urgent request for me to visit him at his office. I immediately complied, when the minister told me that the Brazilian squadron having passed Humaita, and being already half way to Asuncion, the government had ordered an evacuation of the city, and had declared it a military point. He also said the capital was to be removed to Luque, a little village some ten miles from Asuncion, and that he had invited me to visit him in order that I might have such accommodations provided for me at or near Luque as I might select. I replied that whoever else might obey the order of evacuation, I certainly should not. My legation was, for the time, the territory of the United States, and I should remain in it, giving such protection as my house and flag could afford to all who chose to resort to it. I told Señor Berges, also, that the government had no right to compel the foreigners to abandon their houses and property; that if they chose to remain and defend it, taking the risk of exposure to a bombardment of the town, they had a right to do so. He dissented entirely from this view, and on returning to my house I found it full of people, who were anxiously waiting to learn if I would remain in the capital or not. I told them that I should stay, and many more than my house could accommodate asked permission to remain within the legation. I told them that I could not give them all shelter, but if they chose to deposit their valuables in my house I would receive them, but always subject to their own risk; I should give no receipts for anything.

The same evening and the next day people came rushing in in large numbers, bringing their trunks and boxes and several iron safes, all of which were deposited in the different rooms of the legation. The next day people were hurrying terror-stricken from the town, not from fear of the Brazilians, but of a worse enemy, and towards evening several Englishmen came to my house and asked me to permit them with their families to occupy certain vacant rooms in the rear of my legation. As they were all in the government employ, I suggested that it would be more prudent for them to get permission to do so from the authorities. They accordingly asked and obtained the permission, and on the following morning they came with their families, twenty-one persons in all, and took shelter in the legation. The following morning Dr. Antonio de las Carreras, who was the former head of the Oriental government and a most bitter enemy of the Brazilians, fearing lest, if he fell into the hands of the allies, he would be treated as was Leandro Gomez after the fall of Paysandu, came to my house and asked for shelter. He was accompanied by Francisco Rodriguez Larreta, who went to Paraguay as secretary of legation with Dr. Vasquez Sagastume, the Oriental minister resident in 1864, and I gave them a cordial welcome, and they remained with me till July 13. At the time we all thought that the war was virtually over, and that within a few days Asuncion would be in the hands of the Brazilians. Such was the universal wish of everybody, Paraguayans and foreigners alike. On the 24th the iron-clads approached Asuncion, which was defended by a little fort having but one gun of sufficient caliber to do any harm to monitors or iron-clads, and this one so badly mounted, as I was informed afterwards, that it could not be depressed so as to be of any service. As the Brazilians approached this fort they began firing at it, but without injuring it. The fort replied with some half a dozen shots to some thirty-five or forty from the iron-clads, when the latter, for some reason inexplicable to me, turned back and went away. No harm was done to the fort, and very little to the town. One shot struck the new palace of the President, but the damage done to it was very trifling. We then supposed that the iron-clads would soon return reinforced, but week passed after week, and month after month, and we could learn nothing of what was going on at the seat of war. Supposing that Lopez was shut up within his intrenchments around Humaita, and that it would be impossible for him to escape with any considerable portion of his army, we thought the duration of the war was only a question of time, a few days more or less. Thus things remained with us, till on the 1st of April we learned, for the first time, that Lopez had abandoned Paso Pucu, and had reached and passed the Tebicuari with the larger part of his army. Thus the end of the war seemed to be indefinitely postponed. Our situation in Asuncion was extremely disagreeable, as it was impossible to obtain many things elsewhere regarded as necessities of life.

The town was completely deserted, save only that more or less people were permitted to come in occasionally to carry away things that, in their first fright and hurry, they were unable to do. Some incidents occurred which showed that the government, or rather Lopez, for Lopez is the government, did not approve of my keeping so many people in my legation, and therefore all of them who had not been recognized as belonging to it thought it prudent not to venture into the streets. But considering the circumstances, we passed the time more pleasantly than could have been expected. Carreras and Rodriguez were most agreeable and intelligent gentlemen, and Mr. Bliss was an encyclopedia of knowledge on almost every subject. Our Paraguay servant was able to obtain for us all the beef, mandioca, maize, chickens, and eggs required, and sometimes a duck or a turkey; the caña of the country could also be obtained at double the prices of Martell's best brandy. But the gloom seemed to be darkening every day over the country; scarcely ever did a person come to my house to carry away anything deposited there, but he had to tell of other foreigners recently arrested and taken in fetters to the President's headquarters at San Fernando. What it all meant no one of us could divine; there was a terrible mystery about it. At length, however, about the 1st of May, I received notice that the United States steamer Wasp had come up as far as Curupayti to take me away, and was there detained by the allied squadron. I knew that Lopez did not wish me to leave Paraguay; that he, like everybody else, was very anxious for me to remain. The foreigners of all nations were especially anxious that I should wait to the end of the war; and many of the better class of Paraguayans, those having most to lose, were exceedingly importunate that I should stay to give them the protection of my flag at the last extremity. Of these the mother of the President was one of the most solicitous. I told them all that I would not abandon them; that I would endure privations and loss to give them any protection in my power, and that if a successor did not come to take my place, or imperative orders from my government to return home, I would stand by them to the last. I knew also, or at least had no doubt, that if I had proposed to go away and had asked Lopez for means of conveyance to pass through the allied lines to embark on the Wasp, he would not have granted my request. I therefore wrote to the commander of the Wasp that if he did not come above the squadron my family could not get aboard of his steamer, and I therefore urged him very strongly to force the blockade. My great object was to get my wife and child out of the country, and if the Wasp was once above the military lines I could go or not, with or without the permission or favor of his Excellency Marshal Lopez, if, on the arrival of the steamer, it should appear to be my duty to do so. I was disposed, however, to remain, as I knew that if I left I should carry with me the last hope of hundreds or thousands. They all seemed to think that in any contingency my house and person would be inviolate. I did not fully share this opinion, but I nevertheless thought if I could get my family away so much would be gained, and then it would be my duty to remain. With this view I went down to San Fernando to see President Lopez and confer with him in regard to the passage of the Wasp above the Brazilian squadron. I found him reserved and glum, though evidently desirous that the Wasp should come through; and before leaving to return to Asuncion he promised to forward my letter to Captain Kirkland by flag of truce, and gave me letters to inclose to his commanders at Humaita and Curupayti to allow the Wasp to pass without molestation. In my conversations with Lopez he expressed great dissatisfaction that I had admitted so many persons into my house. My communication to Captain Kirkland being dispatched, I returned to Asuncion. The Wasp, however, did not at that time go above the squadron, and we were then all left in uncertainty whether or not anything would come to our rescue ere it was too late. The arrests of foreigners continued, but for what object or for what offense no one could imagine. The few people I saw were more frightened and shy than ever. Nothing, however, of importance occurred till, on the 16th of June, we were surprised by the appearance of the acting Portuguese consul, José Maria Leite Pereira, and his wife, who came to ask the protection of my house and flag. Of the events that followed this I refer you for information to the correspondence I had in regard to it, published in the Semario. First, the government desired to know if the said Leite Pereira was in my house. I replied in the affirmative, but denied the right of the government to question me as to the persons in my legation, and that if it knew or suspected any obnoxious person to be within it, a specific allegation of his offense must be made before I should be under obligations to send him away. Some two weeks passed after the first call for him was made before it was repeated, and in the mean while we all began to cherish the hope that he would not be molested. His whole offense, so far as I knew then or know now, was the crime which, among civilized men, would be considered venial, if not meritorious, of spending all his own money and all he could borrow to relieve the prisoners who fell into the hands of Lopez, relying on them or their respective governments to repay him after the war. On the morning of his coming to my house, however, he had received notice that his consular character would no longer be respected, and as he had previously been cautioned that Lopez was badly affected towards him, he considered the withdrawal of his exequatur as but a prelude to imprisonment, irons, and starvation; he therefore fled, with his wife, to the United States legation, hoping to find shelter and protection. It was accorded him without hesitation, though regarded by me as an unwise and imprudent step on his part. On the 11th of July, however, the dream of security was dispelled by the receipt of the letter from the acting minister of foreign relations, Gumesindo Benitez, published in the Semanario of July, in which the government demanded the dismissal, on the following day, not only of Leite Pereira, but of everybody else in my house that did not belong to the legation. Pereira and the English left accordingly, though "I told them all that I did not send them away, and that if they chose to remain they might do so, and I would never deliver up one of them until some specific crime was alleged against them." They all thought, however, it was best for them to go, and the English requested me to go and see Colonel Fernandez, the military commander at Asuncion, the men offering to resume work in the arsenal, and requesting to be advised of the points to which the women and children would be sent. The house was surrounded by as many as forty policemen, and they were all afraid of being taken immediately to prison. Fernandez, however, pledged me his word of honor that they should not be molested by the police, but should be well treated, and said the men would be again taken into the service on condition of making new contracts. The men had made the offer only because they thought it better to go to work than go to prison. They accordingly left the legation in the afternoon, and were directed to the railway station, where they were most miserably provided for, notwithstanding that Fernandez had pledged his word of honor that they should be well treated. They remained in that situation for about a week, when they disappeared, and I know not what has become of them. I have heard that the women and children were sent to a village about four leagues from Asuncion, called San Lorenzo, and that the men had, like most of the other foreigners in Paraguay, been taken in irons to the army headquarters. Leite Pereira left about five p. m. of the same day, and was arrested as soon as he got into the street. Of his subsequent fate I know nothing. On the same day I wrote a letter to Benitez, advising him that the Portuguese consul and the English had left voluntarily, but that as no charge had been made against Carreras or Rodriguez, and they preferred to stay in the legation, and as such was also my wish, I presumed no objection would be made to it. By sunrise, however, the next morning, I received another letter still more urgent, demanding that they should leave my house by one o'clock of that day. Still no specific charge was made against them, and I told them that they might go or stay as they thought best, but that they would have the protection of my house and flag until they were taken by force, or till some direct crime was laid to their charge. They both said that if I would promise to remain till the end of the war they would not deliver themselves up, as it was impossible for any specific charge to be brought against them, and they did not believe that Lopez would venture to take them out of the legation by force; but I could not promise to remain to the end of the war, and they therefore said it was better that they should go at once than to enrage Lopez by remaining, when at last they would probably fall into his hands. They accordingly left at twelve m. of the 13th of July, but not till I had shown them my letter of the same date to Benitez, in which I gave my reasons for believing that the government could have nothing serious against them, and that in regard to Rodriguez, even if it had, they had no right to touch him, as he was entitled to diplomatic immunities.

This letter I sent the same afternoon to Benitez, and as all were then gone who did not belong to the legation, I thought that I should be left to a dismal peace. Before night, however, came another letter demanding that I should likewise send away two members of my legation, P. C. Bliss and G. F. Masterman, whose names as such had long before been given in to the ministry for foreign affairs.

At this point I made a stand, as you will see by the published correspondence, and, by fencing and fighting to the best of my ability, saying some flattering things about Lopez, I kept them with me till my final departure. I admit that I purposely prolonged the correspondence, in hope of saving these two men. They were arrested, however, as they started to accompany me to the steamer, at the moment of leaving the legation, taken by force from my side, and their subsequent fate may be guessed at from what I shall hereafter relate.

May none ever know the dreary uncertainty of the last two months and a half of my life in Paraguay. To see men with whom you have had the most friendly relations for months, with whom you have discussed questions of history and politics every day, varying the monotony of the days with billiards and of the evenings with whist, and yet to feel that of these very men with whom you were talking over the situation one or more might be in irons in one hour, and shot within twenty-four. Certainly you will allow that this was enough to render even the sleep of a brave man fitful and uneasy, and of a man like me, without such pretensions, utterly inadequate to "knit up the raveled sleeve of care." And up to this time we had not the least idea of what it was all about. No such word as treason or conspiracy had, to my knowledge, ever been heard in my house. What could Lopez want? Was it his plan to kill off all foreigners, that no one may be left to tell the story of his enormities? Did he seek to blot out the record of his crimes? If so, the minister was no safer than the other members of the legation. But as Bliss and Masterman were not taken for several weeks after the departure of Carreras and Rodriguez, we gradually got into a more normal state. The conduct of persons accused in the time of the French revolution, whose levity in the prospect of death seems incredible, appeared to us, as we often remarked, no longer strange; but to the credit of Bliss and Masterman, though not to myself, as I did not consider my danger as great as theirs, I will say we scoffed at the dangers before us, and talked, joked, and laughed as freely as though we had nothing to fear. At this point I may remark that, from the time that Leite Pereira came to my house, it was always surrounded by at least a dozen policemen, and that frequently, on looking out in front, I have counted more than that number on one side. Probably fifty men, who might otherwise have been in the army, were kept night and day to watch me and the members of my legation. In the mean while we could hear scarcely anything of what was going on. With the exception of the consuls, who occasionally came in from Luque, no one ever came to my house, and my Paraguayan servants, if they learned anything, feared to tell it. I did learn, however, that about the time that the great sweep was made from my house, the brother of the President, Venancio Lopez, was carried off in irons to the army headquarters. His other brother, Benigno, had been called below long before, and when I visited his excellency at San Fernando, in the early part of May, Don Benigno and the minister of foreign affairs, Berges, were both close prisoners, as was the President's brother-in-law, Saturnino Bedoya. The old Vice-President, Sanchez, who had previously been a prisoner, was then allowed to leave his house, but neither he nor any Paraguayan dared approach me or be seen with me.

For a time we feared it was the intention of Lopez to cut the throats of all the foreigners, as we knew but little of any arrests at that time of Paraguayans. If they were arrested, they were taken off so quietly that we might or might not hear anything of it for weeks or months. But while the English who had been in the legation were detained in the railway station, the train came in one night at midnight full of prisoners. The English could see nothing, as no light was allowed in the station, but the clanking of the chains and the sighs and groans of the prisoners as they were forced from the cars and driven forward towards the bank of the river were distinctly audible. They were all embarked in a steamer for San Fernando before daylight. A few days after I learned that this crowd of prisoners was almost entirely composed of Paraguayans; that nearly every man in the new capital, the judges, clerks, accountants, and all, save the chief of police, Sanabria, a man eminently distinguished for his brutality, Benitez, and the vice-president, were the only ones left there, besides policemen and soldiers; that there was a gloom over the place so deep and funeral-like that the women and children scarcely ventured out of their houses, and if they did, it was with fear, as if they had just felt the shock of an earthquake and were in dread of another.

For more than fifty years the country has been a Dionysius gallery. It was always the policy of Francia, and of Carlos Antonio Lopez, that everything said should reach the ear of "El Supremo." But in the worst days of Francia the government was mild and paternal compared with what it has been under this younger Lopez. People have been thrown into prison not only for saying things perfectly innocent, and for not reporting what they have heard, but also for the crime of not reporting what they have not heard. It is made the duty of everybody to be a spy on everybody else, and woe to him whose ears are not open to every word spoken in his presence.

The arrest of all the civil magistrates indicated that it was not the foreigners alone that had made themselves obnoxious to Lopez. But what it was all for no one in my house, as I yet firmly believe, had the least idea. The published correspondence, however, will show that about the 18th or 20th of July the government suspected, or affected to suspect, a conspiracy, alleging that ex-Minister Berges was a traitor, and was in collusion with the enemy, and that under my official seal I had transmitted the correspondence to and fro between the conspirators. I must refer you to the published correspondence to show how they undertook to connect me with the conspiracy, or, at least, as knowing that a revolution was in contemplation. At first it would seem that they were so confident of implicating me that they began to publish the correspondence; but after receiving my letter of the 11th of August, in which I showed so many contradictions in the declarations that had been made by the accused, probably under torture, that they suspended further publications. But it was not in the nature of Lopez to show any magnanimity, or even justice, by acknowledging he had been led into error by false depositions. Men who know him would as soon accuse him of ordinary courage as of magnanimity, and he never was accused of that, except in his own "Semanario," of which he is virtually the editor. During all this war Lopez has never exposed himself to any personal danger; he has never on a single occasion risked himself in any battle, and while he was at Paso Pucu he had an immense cave, or rather house, with walls of earth over twenty feet thick, from which he never ventured for weeks together; and at the same time that his organ was filled ad nauseum with accounts of the great Lopez leading with dauntless valor his legions to victory, he was sitting quaking and quivering in his cave, afraid to venture out lest a ball might reach him. On one occasion, some two years ago, when he was out with his bishop and his staff, a shell struck at a distance of half a mile or more from his excellency. Instantly the brave Lopez turned and ran like a scared sheep, with his staff, including the bishop, after him, the latter losing his hat as he fled affrighted after his chief. This is the only instance known of his ever having been in personal danger; he has not even the vulgar merit of personal courage, nor has he any other. His firmness, carried to obstinacy, is the result of personal fear. Many persons, his own people, who have escaped from his power, and whose families have been tortured and otherwise persecuted to death, have sent messages to him threatening to kill him at sight should they ever meet him; he therefore dares not treat with the enemy, for so many have sworn to pursue him, the world will not afford him a refuge if he once has no army between him and his enemies. He knows the country to be lost and ruined; he has no navy, and in my opinion not more than one-fifth of the land forces of the enemy. Why the latter do not attack him and put an end to the war I do not know; but they do not do so, and the war may not end for a long time. Lopez has recently said he expected to be compelled soon to fall back from the river, and then he would retire into the mountains, driving everybody, foreigners and Paraguayans alike, before him. In that case, at the rate the allies have been going on for the last two years, it will be long before he will be unable to present as strong a front to his enemies as he did when they landed above the Tebicuari, viz, one man to watch the telegraph.

It was not, however, till August that I heard, besides the conspiracy against the government, that there had been a great robbery of the public treasury. Of the particulars of this robbery I could never learn anything; neither did I ever have any knowledge of the details of the plan of the conspiracy. It was said in one of Benitez's letters that Mr. Bliss, a member of my legation, had signed a paper, with others, in which they had engaged to assassinate President Lopez. I knew that was false, or, at least, had no doubt that it was so, and defied them to produce any such paper; but they never showed it. They never gave me any clue as to the manner of the conspiracy, or how the revolution was to be effected, and I do not believe to this day that anything of the kind was ever attempted. The declarations of prisoners prove nothing except the merciless cruelties of Lopez, for it is known that he freely employs the torture. He loads his prisoners with heavy fetters, sometimes two, three, or four pairs, and besides flogs them, if they do not give the testimony he requires, till they die.

The only explanation I can give in regard to the robbery of the treasury is this: since Lopez came into power he has never had a competent bookkeeper in his employ, and very probably has never known till recently how much money had been left by his predecessor. He has been spending largely ever since, and probably no accurate account has ever been kept of the amount paid out according to his order. After the city was evacuated, however, in February, he probably had occasion to count his money, and found a large hole in the bottom of his treasury. This discovery was not probably made till some months after the removal to Luque, as about the month of June we found that all those foreigners who had made any money during the past years, and were most likely to have any in their houses, were arrested and sent below. Among them were English, French, Italians, Spanish, Germans, and Portuguese. The plan of Lopez appears to be to get this money into his hands, and then by torture or threats to extort confessions of being either conspirators or plunderers of the treasury. On these confessions they will probably be executed, on the precautionary principle of footpads and other murderers, that "dead men tell no tales." How Lopez expects to escape with the money thus obtained I do not know. Perhaps he thinks that some neutral gunboat will take him and his plunder away at the last moment. But I here give notice that the money thus taken does not belong to Lopez. It is the property of citizens of those powers that are able to pursue it and return it to its rightful owners.

Your excellency, as all the world, probably wonders how it is, if Lopez be the character I have described him, that he is served so faithfully and bravely. It is entirely through fear, for, save and except a few of the most willing instruments of his cruelties, like his favorite mistress, his bishop, Luis Caminos, Sanabria, and a few others, who have evinced most alacrity in doing his bloody work, there is not a man, woman, or child (I do not except either his mother, sister, or brothers) who would not thank God if he would take him to another world where his deserts could be more adequately rewarded.

Why then do the Paraguayans fight so bravely? It is not because of their superior courage, nor of their devotion to Lopez. That they are a brave and enduring people cannot be denied. But the reason why they fight so desperately is this, that, according to Lopez's system of discipline, there is always more danger in giving way than in going on. He has no confidence in his troops, and always seems to act under the belief that they would desert if they could get a chance. He, therefore, in going into battle, advances his first lines, with orders to fight to the death. A little in the rear is a smaller body, with orders to shoot down the first man who gives way or attempts to desert. Behind these are still others, with orders to shoot any one who fails to bring down any one in front who does not fight to the death; and behind those again are others with like instructions, until at last the threads are all gathered in the hands of Lopez. If, in spite of all these precautions, a point is carried by the enemy, his unhappy officers who survive are shot and the men decimated. Under this system he has lost at least one hundred thousand men, probably more than the Brazilians, and yet this system, though it has not left six thousand able-bodied men in the country, has kept from three to six times as many of the allied forces at bay.

The country is entirely denuded of its male population. All the ploughing, planting, and sowing is done by women; women must yoke the oxen, do the butchering, and all the other work usually done by men. There are many women also with the army, to do the labor of men, and thus relieve the troops, but none, I believe, are forced to bear arms.

The next news that we shall probably hear from Lopez is that he has retired with his whole army to the mountains, and that he has driven every man, woman, and child before him. Had not the Wasp arrived till a month later, I have no doubt that I should have been forced to do the same. To the last moment Lopez hesitated whether to keep me a prisoner or not; he wants no one to survive him capable of telling the world of his enormities; and of all those whose declarations have been given in the correspondence lately published, not one will be allowed to escape, nor will any of those persons before whom they were made. For, once beyond the reach of Lopez, they would declare that they had never made them, or had made them under torture.

Since arriving in this city I have seen a letter that was brought by the Wasp, evidently written at the dictation of Lopez, in which some details are given of the nature of the plot or conspiracy. This is the first information I had of the kind of plot that had been discovered, and the absurdity of the whole thing convinces me more strongly than ever that there never has been any plot or conspiracy at all.

How long is this war to last ? For more than a year and a half I have believed that Lopez would not hold out for two months longer ; but I had no idea how slowly some people could move, if they resolutely set themselves not to fight.

With the hope that the war would end shortly, I remained a year longer than I intended, very much against my interest, and suffering great discomfort. I believe that at the final catastrophe I could be of great service, especially to the foreigners; and had Asuncion been taken in February, when the iron-clads went up there, as we then expected it would be, I should doubtless have been able to save the lives of many who now will never see their native land again. But when all of them had been killed or made prisoners, and nobody, native or foreigner, dared come near my house, and I was utterly powerless to do any service for anybody, I thought it time to obey the orders of my government and return to the United States.

Your obedient servant,

CHARLES A. WASHBURN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, November 28, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that, on the 19th instant, Colonel Prado made an assault on the rebellious city of Arequipa. This movement, after some very severe fighting, resulted in the success of the government troops, as they forced the rebels to retire from their outworks to the center of the city, and, at last advices, Colonel Prado was preparing, from his improved position, to make the final and decisive attack. The losses, as stated in the official reports, are comparatively insignificant, but there is some reason to believe that the real number of casualties has not been made public. In Lima, the partisans of the revolution are very downcast with this intelligence, and those who have always had faith in Prado are more confident than ever of his success.

The rebellion in the north of the republic has, in every encounter with the troops of the government, lost ground, and if Colonel Prado takes Arequipa speedily, as there is every reason to believe, the rebellious faction in the north will instantly disappear.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
ALVIN P. HOVEY.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, December 14, 1867.

SIR: From intelligence received from a perfectly reliable source, I am enabled to inform you that President Prado is pushing rapidly his preparations for the reduction of the rebellious city of Arequipa; several of the large guns are already in position, and the final and decisive attack upon the enemy may be looked for shortly. I am informed by the same person, an American, that, having penetrated into the city, he easily discerned the discontent and want of confidence existing among the revolutionary chiefs. It is apparently President Prado's plan to reduce the city by a severe bombardment, thus causing the effects of war to be felt, not only by the soldiers, but by the non-combatants who instigated the present rebellion.

In the northern portion of the republic, Colonel Balta, commanding the insurgents, has gained an unimportant success in the capture of the city of Cajamarca; but on the receipt of this intelligence in Lima, orders were given for the concentration of all the government forces in that section, and the minister of war, Colonel Cornejo, has put himself at their head. This officer, who has the reputation of an able soldier, will immediately commence active operations with his troops, and should an encounter take place between Balta and himself, the probabilities of success are greatly in favor of the government party.

The almost unanimous opinion in the country leans towards the triumph of Colonel Prado.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
ALVIN P. HOVEY.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, December 22, 1867.

SIR: By the steamer which arrived at Callao on the 19th instant, we have information that, in conformity with a proclamation of President Prado, the bombardment of the city of Arequipa, by the forces of the government, should have been commenced on the 18th of the present month. In other respects, the military situation near that city was unchanged.

In the north, the troops led by Colonel Cornejo, the present minister of war, had attacked the forces of the rebel Colonel Balta, and at the last advices the battle was still raging, and the advantage apparently with the government.

By the next steamer of the 28th instant, I think I will be able to communicate some intelligence that will foreshadow the speedy ending of the present revolution.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, December 28, 1867.

SIR: Since my last dispatch No. 106, dated the 22d instant, no change of moment has taken place in the military situation here.

Colonel Prado has commenced the bombardment of Arequipa, but without, at latest intelligence, having caused any great damage to life or property. A large Blakely gun, while being conveyed to the camp of Colonel Prado, was spiked and rendered useless by a detachment of the enemy's forces.

In the north the position is the same. The opposing forces were to have fought the decisive engagement about the 23d or 24th of this month, but as yet we have received no intelligence concerning the affair.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, January 14, 1868.

SIR: President Prado returned on the night of the 4th instant from the siege of Arequipa, with a shattered and repulsed army, amounting to about fifteen hundred men. The battle was fought on the 27th of December, and is said to have failed in consequence of the desertion of an entire regiment under the command of Colonel Ortiz, the companion in arms and sworn friend of the President. Ortiz's regiment charged with the butts of their guns in the air, and were received with acclamations by the army of the rebellion. Prado's loss will probably amount to fifteen hundred men, killed and wounded.

The causes which led to this revolution may be properly attributed to two sources: 1. The Congress which was convened by Prado for the purpose of forming a new constitution had no sooner met than they passed a resolution resolving that all power was centered in themselves, thus becoming one hundred and one dictators. The whole course of congressional action was a steady, unwavering effort to break the power of the President, and cause the people to lose confidence in his administration. 2. The church party, aided by the women, who control no small part of the political power in Peru, determined to destroy him, because they well knew that he entertained principles in favor of toleration and progress.

In this view many fanatical movements were made in the cities, with the intent of poisoning the public mind against him.

On his return from Arequipa, a spirit of insubordination could easily be perceived throughout the city. This feeling increased until the morning of the 5th, when the President rode through the city, meeting in every part with hisses and cries of disapprobation. He had scarcely returned to his house, which is in front of this legation, when sharp firing was heard in the streets, the people having seized four small cannon at the railway depot, which were being sent to Callao. The firing continued all day and through the night, with mobs passing through the streets, committing many acts of outrage. During the day the majority of the President's troops deserted him, passing over with their arms to the opposite party, and at the close of the encounter the revolutionary party was almost everywhere successful. The casualties are stated at sixty-eight killed and two or three hundred wounded.

On the 6th, the President being advised that the troops would no longer support him, and seeing that further efforts towards the maintenance of his position were in vain, renounced in favor of General La Puerta, (see inclosure No. 1.) The President's family, living in front of my house, to avoid threatened danger from the mob, took temporary asylum in my legation. Here he remained until the night of the 7th, when he left, and subsequently took refuge on board of the United States steamer Nyack. There was no demand of any kind made for his apprehension. In fact, some of the new officials aided him in going on board of the vessel, and he sailed for Chili, on the Nyack, on the 11th instant.

On the 10th I received a note from General Francisco Diez Canseco, brother of the actual leader of the revolution, in which he claims to be political and military chief of the departments of the center, a copy of which, with translation, and my reply thereto, are herewith transmitted, (see inclosure No. 2.)

As indicated in my note to the general, I shall await the commands of the government of the United States before I acknowledge any government de facto.

In General Pedro Diez Canseco's proclamation, published on the 8th in the Peruano, a copy of which, with translation, is transmitted, (see inclosure No. 3,) I deem it important to call your attention to the fact that all acts of the Prado administration, public and private, are declared null and void. This decree, if carried into execution, will have the effect to nullify the declaration of war against Spain, to restore the treaty made by ex-President Pezet with that nation, and to destroy the treaties of alliance made between Chili, Ecuador, Bolivia, and Peru, besides nullifying all contracts made with citizens and foreigners by Prado's government.

It would be difficult to form any opinion as to the future. But from the contentions now raging between the chiefs of the successful revolution, Balto, Canseco, and Zevallos, the probabilities are that there will be but little peace for months to come in Peru. I am strongly impressed with the belief that Prado will return to control this country in less than one year from the present date.

The finances of the country are exhausted and wasted by these civil dissensions, and the people look to the government for their daily bread. The official "outs" fully equal those who hold positions under the powers that be; and the mongrel negro, mulatto, cholo, and Indian population care not who rule so that they can have a little money and a little excitement.

To hope for republican institutions being sustained by such a people is to hope in vain. Add to this the interest of the church here, which is to destroy all civil power and erect in its stead a reign of intolerance and bigotry, and you have a fair prospect of the future. Such being the status, and the clergy being by far the most powerful, numerous, and influential class in the country, the future of Peru seems to me to be extremely dark. There are many men struggling for progress and liberty, but as yet their efforts have been unavailing. Among this number may be classed Padre Vijil, Mariatequi, Prado, Quimper, Pacheco, and a large part of the foreign population, but as yet, I regret to say, that the seed has fallen on stony ground. Notwithstanding these views, I do all I can to add to the impression here that this is really a free country and government. To be so in name only is for us far better than to have a despotic government established in Peru.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
ALVIN P. HOVEY.

REPUBLIC OF PERU.—THE PRESIDENT OF THE REPUBLIC IN COMMAND OF THE ARMY AND NAVY.

LIMA, January 7, 1868.

EXCELLENCY: The fate of arms not having been favorable to my cause, and for that reason the civil war having increased in its proportions, I desire to separate myself from the political scene of contest, believing that my person is one of the prettexts for which the republic is suffering so greatly.

I therefore resign the presidency of the republic, and I am ready to leave the country, if this be necessary for the establishment of peace and order.

Therefore your excellency will have the goodness to proceed in the manner most conducive to this object.

God guard your excellency.

MARIANO J. PRADO.

General LUIS LA PUERTA,
Encharged with the Presidency of Peru.

LIMA, January 7, 1868.

EXCELLENCY: I have had the honor to receive the note of to-day, in which your excellency resigns the presidency in order to remove one of the pretexts of the civil war.

This abnegation is worthy of your excellency's noble character, but I was but encharged with supreme power during your excellency's absence on military duty in the south, and since your excellency's return I have ceased exercising that function. Moreover, I am not empowered to accept the resignation of the President.

Far from continuing in the exercise of the executive power, I beg your excellency to designate the person to be appointed president of the council of ministers.

I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

LUIS LA PUERTA.

His Excellency Colonel MARIANO IGNACIO PRADO, Constitutional President of the Republic.

REPUBLIC OF PERU.—COMMANDANT, POLITICAL AND MILITARY, OF THE DEPARTMENTS OF THE CENTER.

LIMA, January 10, 1868

In consequence of the triumph obtained by the constitutional cause at Arequipa, and the events which have lately taken place in this city and in Callao, his excellency General Pedro Diez Canseco governs the entire republic, in accordance with the constitution of 1860.

The circumstance of his excellency's absence, and my desire to inform your excellency of the sentiments which are held by the new administration, give me the honor of acquainting you with the fact that I am authorized by the President to govern the central departments of the republic, with the character of political and military chief of the same. Therefore, I assure your excellency that the government which I have the honor to represent will cultivate and strengthen the kind feelings fortunately existing between my country and that so worthily represented by your excellency.

I beg to assure your excellency of that distinguished consideration with which I sign myself, your excellency's obedient and attentive servant,

FRANCISCO DIEZ CANSECO.

His Excellency General A. P. HOVEY,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

Mr. Hovey to Señor Canseco.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, January 11, 1868.

GENERAL: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 10th instant, informing me that, "in consequence of the triumph of the constitutional cause at Arequipa, and the events which have lately taken place in this city and Callao, his excellency General Pedro Diez Canseco governs the entire republic, according to the constitution of 1860. The circumstance of his excellency's absence and your desire to inform me of the sentiments held by the new administration lead you to communicate to me the fact of your being encharged by the President with the command of the departments of the center of the republic, with the character of political and military chief of the same. You also inform me that the government which you represent will cultivate and strengthen the friendship which happily exists between our respective countries."

Without assenting to or denying the positions stated in the communication referred to, but in view of the great and very important changes and consequences which must necessarily flow from the disturbed condition of Peru, I deem it to be my duty to place all the facts before my government, and await its commands.

The archives of Peru will show that I pursued this same course with Colonel Prado when he assumed dictatorial power, on entering the city of Lima, and that my government declined to acknowledge his authority for more than ten months thereafter. This arose from no personal feeling, but from the ardent desire of my government to see the principles of republican institutions firmly established in Peru. America should be the land of free institutions, and the government I represent would be jealous of any movement that would bring either anarchy or monarchy to the people of this country.

It is useless for me to say to you, general, that I shall leave nothing undone that may tend to strengthen the bonds of friendship now existing between our respective governments, and that may aid the advancement of republican institutions.

Trusting that the future may bring a brighter dawn upon your country, I have the honor to be, general, your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

General FRANCISCO DIEZ CANSECO, &c., &c., &c., Lima.

[Translation.]

Pedro Diez Canseco, second constitutional vice-president of the republic, encharged with executive power:

Whereas, 1st. On the 28th of November, 1865, Colonel Mariano Ignacio Prado rebelled against the lawful authority of the country, in establishing a dictatorship, by virtue of resolutions forged in the several barracks of the troops, thus changing the form of government, and arrogating to himself the title of supreme chief, in opposition to the 5th article of the existing constitution, by which this act is termed high treason.

2d. That the people of the republic have solemnly refused to recognize the authority of Colonel Prado, as is proved by the acts which they have signed, and which have not been put in force, owing to the brute power which he exercised.

3d. That Colonel Prado has wounded the essentially Catholic spirit of the people by his attacks against their religion; that he has assailed individual and social guarantees; that he has wasted the public money; that he has oppressed the people with unjust and grievous taxes; that without due course of law he has filled the prisons with citizens, and also has banished them to foreign countries, for having only refused to recognize his illegitimate authority; and, in fine, his wicked administration has committed innumerable and grave crimes.

4th. That, according to the decree of the 22d of September last, constitutional order is again restored, in conformity with the national will, so unanimously and vigorously expressed, it now becomes necessary to comply with the provisions of the constitution.

5th. That, according to the 10th article of that document, all acts of those who usurp the public authority are void of effect.

6th. That, in conformity with article 127 of the penal code, those who vary the form of government and depose the constituted authorities are responsible for the crime of rebellion. Therefore, I decree:

1st. That the state of affairs be re-established on the same footing as before and on the 27th of November, 1865.

2d. In virtue of the preceding article, all of the decrees, resolutions, regulations, commissions, issued, and to be issued by Colonel Mariano Ignacio Prado, are null and void, these emanating from him in the character of supreme authority. As regards the commissions issued in favor of the officers, soldiers, and sailors who participated in the combats of Altao, on the 14th of February, 1866, and Callao, on the 2d of May, 1866, the government reserves the faculty of rewarding worthily those individuals.

3d. In conformity with that ordered in the first article, the tribunals of the republic will proceed with all pending law-cases according to the tenor of the codes and laws declared to be in force.

4th. Colonel Mariano I. Prado and his accomplices are responsible for that covered by the 127th article of the penal code.

The minister in general is encharged with the execution of this decree.

Given in the government palace at Arequipa, the 14th day of October, 1867.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, January 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that the government forces under Colonel Cornejo, the minister of war under Prado, have been completely defeated by Colonel Balta, in attempting to capture the town of Chiclayo, defended by the latter. Although the government troops had almost entirely demolished the town, by means of their artillery, yet in the final assault, through the treachery of one of their battalions, they were forced to fly.

By this victory the whole of the republic is under the unquestioned control of the revolution.

SIR: Since my dispatch No. 110, dated January 14, 1868, no important change has taken place in Peru.

Colonel Balta, the chief of the revolution in the north, was the recipient of a public ovation on his arrival at Lima, on the 19th instant. General Canseco was, at last advices, marching down from Arequipa to the coast with an army of 3,500 men, which force he intended to embark on board of the national vessels and proceed with to this city. Until the struggle for the presidency occurs no further trouble is generally apprehended.

The elections, which will take place about April or May, may afford an opportunity for another outbreak.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, January 28, 1868.

SIR: Several American citizens have presented claims to me against the government of Peru for alleged injuries. They state that in Chiclayo, where the revolutionary army under Balta had control, every foreigner had to flee for his life. Particular attention is called to the communication of Consul Montjoy, and the consular protest, herewith transmitted.

Claims are also made by persons in Lima for injuries to person and property.

Several hundred thousand dollars, the property of Americans, was lost in Callao when Prado's forces entered and sacked that city in 1865. In reference to these last, the government of Prado made arrangements, through congress, to adjust them; but now, as all of Prado's acts are declared null and void, these claims will, in all probability, meet with the same fate.

I most earnestly desire the advice and instructions of the department on this very important and delicate question. As yet, I have made no diplomatic claims of any kind, as the government of Colonel Prado promised me, unofficially, to fairly adjust all claims of American citizens without resorting to diplomatic correspondence.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
ALVIN P HOVEY.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lambayeque, January 18, 1868.

HONORABLE SIR: Since my last, the sacking and burning of Ulates and Tormas, in this province, has been continued systematically and deliberately by armed parties that formed part of the army of Colonel Balta in Chiclayo, and commanded by governors and other officials appointed by him, and arrived to such an extent that, in view of the depredations committed upon foreigners and upon foreign capital, the foreign consuls have considered it necessary to protest against such acts in the name of their respective governments, and in the name of the citizens and subjects of all other nations who have been or may be injured in person or property in such a cruel and wanton manner, that the republic of Peru may be held responsible for the act of its public officers.

The greater part of the devastation has been committed since official notice has been received of the change of government in Lima, and that Colonel Balta has ordered or permitted these excesses is proved by his appointment as sub-prefect, of Tomas Sello, in this city, who publicly receives and banquets the leaders and officers of these marauders.

The estate of Mr. Alexander Ruden has been utterly destroyed, his loss amounting, I am told, to more than $60,000. I have advised many other Americans to apply to you for redress, as I am powerless to assist them.

I inclose with this dispatch a copy of protest, also a dispatch for "Decano," of diplomatic corps, with copy of the same to be made public in the manner that body may determine. I request you to cause it to be delivered.

I have the honor to be your excellency's very obedient servant,

United States Consul.

[Translation.]

In the city of Lambayeque, capital of the province of that name, in the department of La Libertad, Peru.

On the 14th day of January, 1868, the consular body, resident in this city, met, under the presidency and in the office of its dean, the consul of the United States, with the object of taking into consideration the burning and sacking of valuable property belonging to foreigners, and to Peruvians, committed before the public as witnesses, and before the constituted authorities, by forces, armed, which sallied from the towns near to the places burned, those forces being commanded by officers of their own and by some of the political authorities of the district; that when the immediate solution of the conflict at Chiclayo was confidently hoped for, and the re-establishment of order in these provinces, together with the reassertion of the guarantee covering life and property, a fatal overturning of the social order followed, destroying property, signalized by the sacking and burning of the establishment of the foreigners, Solf & Co., of Chiclayo, Santiago Feely in Jayanca, and of the farms Viña, Balangrande, and Chocofe, the property of Peruvians, in which many foreign employes lost all of their possessions; that moreover, this city, the farm of Errepon, Patapo, Molina de Sta Lima, and others, the property of foreigners, are threatened with a like fate; that such a state of things forms now the most disconsolate and horrid picture; offering to Peru and to the civilized world the most difficult and exceptional situation in which a country could be placed after the effervescence of the political crisis has passed by. In such a situation the consular corps, composed of the undersigned, resolved—

First. To protest, as it does protest, against the above mentioned acts, and against the violation of the guarantees expressed in existing treaties, in the name of their respective governments, and in the name of all foreign citizens, who have been injured or who may be, in their persons or in their property; and declares that it believes the government of Peru to be responsible for the depredations committed by its subordinates and its armed forces.

Second. To send a copy of this protest to the dean of the diplomatic corps, resident in Lima, that he may inform the government of Peru of its contents; and also may inform the other foreign representatives.

Third. That copies be likewise sent to each one of the ministers or diplomatic agents of the countries represented by the undersigned.

No. 115.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, February 14, 1868.

SIR: A government de facto has undoubtedly been established in Peru under the assumed presidency of General Pedro Diez Canseco. You may remember that when I arrived in Peru he was, by virtue of his office, (second vice-president,) and the force of other circumstances, the actual President of the republic. (See my dispatch No. 1, dated November 20, 1865.) I then transmitted my letters of credence to him; but, before I could be received, the army proclaimed Prado dictator, and Canseco quietly retired. His constitutional term of office expired in October, 1866. Now he leaps the hiatus, and claims to continue his rights by virtue of his former election, ignoring all that has passed under the government of Prado.

* * * * *

I have not forgotten to adhere strictly to my original instructions, and to those contained in your dispatch No. 8, dated March 8, 1866, in which you say: "The policy of the United States is settled upon the principle that revolutions in republican States ought not to be accepted until the people have adopted them by organic law, with the solemnities which would seem sufficient to guarantee their stability and permanency."

With this and my original instructions, with Peru in a state of anarchy, and without any lawful head, I gave my reply to General Francisco Diez Canseco, brother of the new acting President, as stated in my No. 109, of 14th January, 1868.

That reply has caused considerable controversy between the journals of Lima. I enclose the attack upon me, with translations, and the reply made by a Peruvian, also with translation, marked respectively No. 1 and No. 2.

I have had nothing to do, directly or indirectly, with any of these publications.

Should the government feel any interest in this paper controversy, I will have every article touching the question translated and sent forward, only observing that the Nacional is not a national newspaper, but is owned and controlled by English companies.

* * * * *

On the 28th ultimo I received a circular note from his excellency Doctor Don Juan Manuel Polar, secretary of foreign relations in the new government, in which he informs me that "the power of the constitution of 1860 being re-established in the republic, and with it the legal authority of General Pedro Diez Canseco, the second Vice-President, he (Doctor Polar) had been called to the post of minister of foreign affairs in the formation of the new cabinet."

In announcing this fact to me, he assures me that he will take pleasure in faithfully interpreting the ideas of his government, which have no further object than to preserve and strengthen the kind and friendly feelings which have united always, and do unite, Peru to the United States. (See inclosure No. 3.) My reply thereto, in which I state that I will communicate the contents of his note to my government, and that my duty will compel me to await its orders, is likewise transmitted herewith. (See inclosure No. 4.)

Every other diplomatic representative here has acknowledged the new order of affairs, and the feeling manifested against me by some persons arose solely because I did not give my unconditional and immediate adhesion to the new government.

A large amount of unsettled claims and recent outrages committed on several Americans will render it necessary soon to have some communication with the government de facto. Mr. Alexander Ruden, a highly respectable and honorable citizen of the United States, taking no part whatever in the politics of the country, has suffered damages, through the destruction of his plantation and crops, amounting to more than ninety-one thousand dollars. Others have been wounded and driven from their employments.

The specific instructions of the government upon this important subject are respectfully solicited.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
ALVIN P. HOVEY.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Lima, January 28, 1868.

The power of the constitution of 1860 being re-established in the republic, and with it the legal authority of the second Vice-President, General Don Pedro Diez Canseco, the undersigned has been called to the post of minister of foreign affairs in the formation of the new cabinet. The undersigned has the honor to announce this fact to his excellency the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, and he takes pleasure in faithfully interpreting the ideas of his gov-

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, January 28, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note, dated to-day, in which your excellency informs me that, as the power of the constitution of 1860 has been re-established in the republic, and with it the legal authority of his excellency General Pedro Diez Canseco, the second Vice-President, your excellency has been called to the post of minister of foreign affairs. Your excellency further informs me that your excellency will take pleasure in interpreting the ideas of your excellency's government, which are to preserve and strengthen the warm and friendly relations which have always existed, and happily do exist, between Peru and the United States.

I shall take great pleasure in embracing the first opportunity of placing the recent important changes in Peru and the contents of your excellency's note before the government of the United States, and my duty will then compel me to await its orders.

As it is the firm policy and the greatest pleasure of the United States to cement and strengthen the bonds of friendship between all nations professing republican institutions, I trust that the friendly relations now existing between our respective countries will always happily continue.

Without having the pleasure of being personally acquainted with your excellency, permit me to congratulate your excellency upon the exalted position which your excellency now enjoys as secretary of foreign affairs in the government of Peru.

Your excellency will please accept the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

His Excellency Señor Dr. Don JUAN MANUEL POLAR,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

[Translation from the Nacional, Lima, January 22, 1868.]

A DIPLOMATIC INCIDENT.

With great surprise the public have seen the diplomatic dispatch addressed to the superior chief of the department of the center by the minister plenipotentiary of the United States, in answer to a note which the superior chief had addressed to the foreign representatives, announcing the new government which the republic had just inaugurated, and proclaiming the establishment of the empire of the law.

It is really to be regretted that an officer, purely military, with attributions only to attend to the first requirements of interior order, should have passed a circular to the diplomatic corps, announcing his office, relating the events which have recently occurred here, and reestablishing directly diplomatic relations. But since the entire diplomatic corps, with strict impartiality, had accepted these relations, it was to have been desired that the American minister would have observed the same conduct, instead of establishing, by his refusal, a groundwork of hostility to the new state of affairs which the people, with perfect right, had established. Of the two extremes the American minister could have adopted one, either to have denied roundly to recognize the representation of Don Francisco Canseco, or to proceed in the manner followed by his colleagues. But the dispatch to which we allude, without assailing Canseco's note as irregular from its nature, is an open condemnation of the events which have taken place in the country, and moreover is an ill-timed menace, which the minister was not in a position to make, nor was there any motive for its being made. If it was necessary to receive instructions as to whether the new state of things should be recognized or not, diplomatic practice counsels never extemporaneously to venture opinions which might give occasion to grave commentaries or troubles, which are always inconvenient in the relations which two free people cultivate.

No one can deny that the Peruvian nation is the only judge of its own actions, while they do not offend or injure the rights of other countries. Her transformations of a purely domestic character, are shielded from all diplomatic censure, but more especially when they tend towards establishing, more solidly, the true republican rule, under the protection of the law. In the supposition that even this were not true, only governments can definitively emit opinions concerning the recognition or not of other governments, and even then they cannot, without offending, proceed capriciously. The conduct of the American minister is based on very glaring errors. His excellency has forgotten that the only reason adduced for the delay in acknowledging the administration of Colonel Prado was, that the form of government had been altered, the dictatorship having been proclaimed, an event which has not now taken place, on the contrary, the republican form of government has been more firmly established, guaranteed by the empire of the law, following the traditions of more than half a century of independence, interrupted by the arbitrary acts of a ruler who destroyed and vitiated the representative government, violated and abolished all public liberty and rights.

In spite of the fact that Peru is in the last scenes of a very disastrous civil war, still the administration is regulated and the government of the law established.

People so advanced in democracy as those of the southern States of the Union live yet subject to a most odious military rule, and are deprived of all their benefits under the federal constitution; but here, in the midst of a new people, with the sound of the last combats has disappeared all that military rule which conducted us to anarchy or monarchy, and we may inspire confidence to all republicans of good will.

There are no conquered or conquerors. After the battle, all participate in the benefits of the common law; and no man, who for political opinions may be persecuted, but can find protection in the tribunals of justice.

It is sad, indeed, that our country passes through so many perturbations, but no one will deny that they tend to establish more securely the practice and establishment of republican institutions. But, in the midst of our troubles, the justice and circumspection of our governments, especially in their international relations, have never been obscured. This spirit of justice and moderation should be fomented, but the minister of the United States has forgotten it, and on more than one occasion acted contrary to it.

The feelings which political conflicts leave behind them frequently occasion difficulties in the relations existing between nations; and when, as in the present instance, diplomatic agents do not preserve their neutrality between the parties fighting in the fields of interior policy.

The minister of the United States, felicitating the government on the death of Grand Marshal Castilla, offered a great offense to all of one national party. Conceding asylum to some and denying it to others, he left the bounds of diplomatic circumspection, and his present dispatch comes to finish these antecedents, in revealing a hostility which we earnestly desire had been better concealed, in view of the friendly relations which Peru cultivates with the great republic of the north.

[Translation from the Comercio of January 28, 1868.]

A DIPLOMATIC INCIDENT.

A feeling of national dignity impels us, as good Peruvians, to reply to and refute the article which was published in the Nacional, in its issue of 22d January.

There is nothing more sacred than international relations, nor is any one to be more respected than a foreign diplomatic minister. If we can read contemptuously the articles appearing in our journals about internal politics, we cannot with the same feeling peruse an article which, while treating on international questions, might compromise the national good name. We especially refer to articles which refer to diplomatic questions, or treat of the actions or the person of any representative of a great nation friendly to Peru.

This is what now has happened. We hope that Peruvians will always be found ready to defend foreign ministers when these may be attacked unjustly, or not treated with the high respect, the particular delicacy, and the especial consideration to which they are entitled, and which they receive from every civilized nation, every respectable government, and every reputable man.

We treat of the answer given by General Hovey, minister plenipotentiary of the United States, to Mr. Francisco Diez Canseco, superior military chief of the departments of the center, in answer to the circular which this gentleman thought proper to address to the diplomatic body, resident in Lima, on the 10th instant, concerning the new government just then established.

In criticising the note of the American minister, the editors of the Nacional have proceeded with great haste and injustice, have committed grave errors, and have fallen into deplorable contradictions.

To begin with, the editors confess that Mr. Canseco did badly in writing the said circular, and really that is the only sensible remark made in the whole article. They say, "That it is to be regretted that an authority solely military, only encharged with the duty of attending to the first necessities of interior order, should have directed a circular to the diplomatic and consular corps announcing his position, relating the recent events occurred in the country, and reopening diplomatic relations."

The editors, therefore, begin by contradicting themselves, attacking the reply of the American minister by admitting that it was caused by an absurd circular.

The Nacional says that the public have seen with marked surprise the reply referred to. This is an error. We have spoken with many distinguished persons and several persons of high position, who regard the reply as called for by the situation. The Nacional commits another error in saying that the American minister has been alone in his mode of proceeding, and he should have observed the same conduct as did his colleague.

Now, in the first place, it is simply ridiculous for a newspaper to pretend to dictate to a foreign minister the line of conduct which he should follow; and in the second place, as nations have different policies, so have their agents. But the replies of the ministers of France and England are, on the whole, the same as that of the American plenipotentiary. The English minister says, "I will improve the first opportunity of informing the government of her Britannic Majesty of the facts you communicated to me;" and the French chargé says, "I will fulfill the duty of remitting your dispatch to the cabinet of his Imperial Majesty, which will surely appreciate it." The American minister says, "I deem it to be my duty to make known all these facts to my government and await its orders."

The difference is that the American minister says he will await orders, which the chargés d'affaires mentioned had no necessity to say. If the representative of the United States believes it to be his duty to do this, no one can deny his right, and he, better than any one, knows what he does.

The Nacional commits a very great error in saying that "of two extremes the American minister could have adopted one—either to have roundly refused to recognize the representation of Mr. Canseco, or to follow the conduct of his colleagues." As to the second extreme, it is absurd to suppose that all ministers can proceed alike when their governments have different policies; and as regards the first, the Nacional itself says that ministers cannot refuse to recognize a government; only governments themselves can do so. Therefore, this opinion being correct, the American minister did perfectly right in saying he would wait for his orders, and fulfilled his duties as a true diplomatist.

With respect to the other expressions contained in the dispatch of the American minister, it will be necessary to make some observations in order to clear up the rather obscure faculties of the editors. True diplomacy imposes on diplomatists generally the duty of not expressing a definite opinion as to the charges which may occur in the countries to which they are accredited. The minister of the United States has followed this rule. The diplomacy of the United States is frank and open; it declares truths with great clearness; from the beginning it calls things by their proper names, as bread "bread," wine "wine." This may not be agreeable to some, but the pill must be swallowed; it is the best way to avoid ulterior difficulties.

The American minister says, not only that he will acquaint his government with the facts, as do the English and French ministers, but that he will wait the orders of his government; this is his duty, a duty imposed by his government; and he tells the new government of Peru this fact frankly. The American minister does even more; he has the exquisite delicacy to explain his conduct, and he cites the precedent involved in the case of the recognition of Colonel Prado's government, which was not recognized until several months after its establishment.

It is to be noted that the question interesting the United States is not, whether the government be dictatorial, monarchical, or republican; it is, whether the will of the people upholds it, and if it presents guarantees of stability. The imperial government of Napoleon III was very soon recognized by the United States. The government of Maximilian would likewise, no doubt, have been recognized had it been supported by the people. As to the government (dictatorial) of Prado, South America never saw a more popular movement, yet the United States recognized it only after the 2d of May.

It is necessary here to make reference to an incident which took place in those glorious days for Peru that some wish now to erase from history. When General Hovey presented his credentials to the supreme chief he said, among other things: "Our continent should be the mansion of freemen; and as, according to the language of Jefferson, 'Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty,' we should be more than vigilant of our republican institutions. Permit me to say that, during your short administration, which I have had the pleasure to witness, Peru has received new life, which the most remote generations will experience."

Colonel Prado commenced his reply thus:

"The great nation which you represent pointed out to us the path of independence and liberty; and although vicissitudes incident to nations in their infancy have made superficial minds believe that the principles of Washington had degenerated in our country, recent events have proved the contrary.

"To preserve liberty and independence, a people, guided by mysterious instincts, sometimes employ means which appear contradictory for the ends it desires to attain, and the most liberal government on earth—that of the United States—has invested itself with faculties at first sight incompatible with republican principles, but indispensable towards saving the institutions of that great nation.

"It is highly satisfactory to me that the minister of the United States has formed such an elevated opinion of the use which my government has made of an authority which, though in contradiction, apparently, to republican principles, was placed in my hands to consolidate and defend from unjust attacks the independence and the dignity of America, which I hold as dear as that of my own country.

"I trust, Mr. Minister, that, whatever apprehensions the establishment of a dictatorial government in Peru may have for a moment awakened, the people of the United States will see in my policy the practice of Washington's doctrines, in whose defense the Peruvian nation has put in execution the vigilance of Jefferson."

History will decide if Colonel Prado, styled dictator, exercised more power than our noted presidents de facto have done. Let it be proved that the present government is supported by the people, which we do not doubt, and that it presents guarantees of stability, (which God grant,) and we will see that the American government will speedily recognize it. But the suddenness of Prado's fall is rather unpropitious.

We must tell the truth. Foreigners believe that now no government is stable in Peru. This belief can only be removed by seeing a government exist for several consecutive years. The man whose high destiny it will be to put an end to revolutions in this country has not yet made his appearance on the tragi-comic stage of Peru.

If some expressions in the American minister's dispatch have caused surprise, the editors of the Nacional must know that the diplomats of the United States are more frank in their language (always neutral and impartial) than those of other countries. We were pleased to see in that dispatch the words "anarchy and monarchy;" these contain the whole history of Spanish America, and exactly those most hateful to the American people, and any anarchical or revolutionary movement is highly distasteful to that people, and any monarchical scheme repugnant in the extreme.

We learn, however, from the dispatch that we will receive the friendship of the citizens of the great republic in proportion to our ability to destroy in Peru the spirit of anarchy and monarchy. Unfortunately both exist, and both urge us towards our ruin. The influence of the great republic is every day more powerful in the whole world. In America it will be omnipotent; to resist it will be to perish. It is necessary to practice the great republican principles of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Monroe; then we will be powerful and strong; then great and happy; then the friends of the people of the United States. Without that condition, one of three things is our destiny—either to eat ourselves à la Dupasquier, which is the case; or some European power will conquer us, which would be difficult; or we will be absorbed by the United States, which very well may happen, for that republic is destined to be the new Rome.

Now, if the Nacional desires to know why the Americans express themselves with so much frankness, although diplomatic practice counsels no opinion to be hastily expressed, as the Nacional dogmatically remarks, we will reply, quoting the words of the great American statesman, Daniel Webster, contained in the dispatch which he wrote, while Secretary of State, to the Austrian minister in Washington, 21st December, 1850, in answer to a protest ordered by the Emperor of Austria to the instructions given to the American minister, A. Dudley Mann; these were to recognize the independence of Hungary, provided it seemed possible that it could be maintained. Mr. Webster says, interpreting the principle which the great republic has always followed: "At the same time, while observing faithfully its obligations as a neutral, no one can ever impede the government or the people of the United States from exercising, according to its own discretion, the rights which it holds as an independent nation, nor from forming and expressing its own opinions freely and on all occasions concerning the great political events which may take place between the civilized nations of the earth."

That nation, observing its rights and practicing its duties faithfully, is not to be wondered at for being universally respected, and for increasing its power every day.

We now trust that the Nacional will comprehend the language used by the diplomatic agents of the United States. It manifests an unexampled audacity in asseverating that the conduct of the minister is based on notable errors; it shows a lamentable ignorance in affirming that his dispatch is an open condemnation of the events which have recently occurred in the country, and that it is an ill-timed menace; and it utters a stupid falsehood in stating that the minister did not hold himself neutral in the affairs of Peru. The representative of the great American republic holds too elevated a position to mix in the personal, tricky, insignificant, and lilliputian politics of Peru.

We will answer two other charges made by the Nacional, and then we will conclude.

The editors say that General Hovey congratulated the government on the death of General Castilla. In answer to this, we state that, in answer to Minister Osorio's first circular to the diplomatic corps, dated June 9, 1867, the American minister wrote: "I congratulate myself for the opportunity which presents itself to enter into personal relations with your excellency, and, in conclusion, I beg to felicitate your excellency for the brilliant future upon which Peru, free from internal dissensions, is about to enter." The editors of the Nacional will see that this was not a congratulation on General Castilla's death, and that the minister of the United States, as well as his government and people, looked with horror on all revolutionary movements, and congratulated the government on every occasion when Peru was free from internal dissensions. On the other hand, this Castilla, a traitor by office, would have died in any civilized country with a rope around his neck.

Peru, which deems herself more civilized than the rest of the world, abolished capital punishments, and consequently proceeds rapidly to its dissolution. Instead of shooting three or four conspirators and traitors, they are allowed their liberty, and in their revolutions three or four thousand innocent lives are lost, immense amounts of property destroyed, the country demoralized and regarded with contempt by foreigners.

The editors of the Nacional have committed another error in asserting that General Hovey conceded asylum to some and denied it to others.

Every one knows the history of diplomatic asylum in Peru, and the efforts made by Secretary Pacheco to abolish it; all applauded the conduct of the plenipotentiary and the admiral of the United States in that question.

The American minister has not contradicted himself in the slightest degree, but has observed to the letter the principles which he laid down.

The two cases which have occurred at the American legation are well known—that of Colonel Zegarra and that of ex-President Prado.

One day the minister was proceeding to his house, and when he arrived at the corner of the street where he resides he was brusquely and suddenly seized by the arm by a person whom he did not know, Colonel Zegarra, and told that the person wished to speak to him in the legation. Once past the threshold, the unknown exclaimed, "I implore the asylum of the legation," and at the same time a competent authority arrived with the proper writ against Colonel Zegarra, who had been pursued very closely. We ask, did not the minister of the United States fulfill his line of duty, denying the asylum, and not permitting himself to be surprised into consent?

The second case is this: ex-President Prado was pursued by no authority whatsoever; nevertheless, the evil passions of some ruffians and of a part of the populace were excited to the comital of wanton deeds. Colonel Prado then acted with prudence, seeking a house more secure than that in which he lived, and he went to the American legation, exactly in front of his own residence. As no one demanded him; the case of diplomatic asylum did not occur; nevertheless, the American minister hastened to tell him, from the beginning, "General Prado, no one shall touch you in my house, but you know better than any one else that this legation is no asylum for those which the justice of the country rightfully claims." Several persons connected with the present government heard this—persons who visited Colonel Prado during the thirty-six hours he remained in the legation; persons who offered to aid him in his efforts to embark, and who, as we have been assured, did so. We have, therefore, in the case of ex-President Prado, three circumstances—first, the authority did not pursue him, but rather aided his escape; second, that he did not wish for asylum, but was the guest of a friend only for thirty-six hours; third, that the American minister informed him of his proposed mode of proceeding in time. We ask, did the American minister deviate in this from the rules which he himself laid down?

What say the editors of the Nacional now?

To inform them and many who are absolutely ignorant of diplomatic asylum in its international rights, we will repeat what we have said previously concerning its fundamental principles.

Whatever may be the rights of authorities of the country, or the duties of foreign ministers—problems to be resolved by the law of nations—there are two invariable principles which no nation, government, minister, or private individual can ever transgress: 1st. The domicile of a legation is inviolable, and never can any armed demonstration be made against it. 2d. The foreign ministers solely obey the orders of their governments. To deliver up a person taking asylum, is not to obey an order, but to fulfill a duty imposed by the minister's own government and to act in consonance with his instructions. To disavow these principles, is to be ignorant of right; to violate them, is to provoke foreign war.

Now, messieurs the editors of the Nacional, what have you done in writing your editorial about so delicate a matter? What was your object in pretending to criticise a diplomatic note emanating from a minister so distinguished as that of the United States? What object had you in accumulating such a mass of errors, falsehoods, and contradictions? Why, finally, have you attacked so unjustly a foreign diplomatic agent? It really is unjust, most unjust, to say that the "American minister has by his conduct established a basis of hostility, and that he has disavowed, and on more than one occasion acted in contradiction to, that spirit of justice and moderation which he should have fomented."

You, messieurs the editors, have in your publication, actuated by ignoble motives, demonstrated in a superlative degree a want of moderation, discourtesy, audacity, and a spirit of injustice unworthy of a civilized country and dishonorable to the press.

We have shed a tear of grief to see how the illustrious guest who has shown so much sympathy and interest in our country has been treated in Peru. He was accredited to our government, being "one of the most distinguished citizens of the United States," according to the words of President Johnson; he who, without ceasing, has expressed and repeated, publicly and privately, his sincere desires for the greatness of Peru; he who has followed with great and unusual interest all the steps taken by this little republic towards making a name in the catalogue of nations, and to show to the world her growing strength; who, finally, has fulfilled his duty with Puritan severity, and has always labored to foment the love of liberty and of republican institutions, and the observance of the grand principles which are the foundation of American independence.

Can this be called "hostility" and "a contradiction of the feeling of justice and moderation?" When ideas are so perverted in a country, it must be very far on its rapid road to destruction.

But we believe that Peru is not in that condition, and in the name of the nation we protest against the discourteous words of the Nacional.

We can assure his excellency General Hovey that since his arrival at these shores he has been esteemed, respected, and beloved by all who have had the honor of knowing him, and by all who have had an opportunity to admire the rare and beautiful qualities which adorn him, as a man, as a jurist, as a soldier, and a diplomat.

JURIDICUS.

LIMA, January 25, 1868.

P. S.—With an unworthy motive, the editors of the Nacional have again occupied themselves with the dispatch of General Hovey, and they have the audacity to say in their review of the fortnight (which goes abroad, translated into three languages) "that if in a respectable paper of the United States a reliable and truthful account of the manner in which the representative of that nation in Peru has comporting himself, it is almost certain that he would be recalled."

If the ideas expressed by the Nacional were those of a respectable newspaper, and one that represented national feeling, they would have some value abroad. But it is known that the Nacional always adores the rising sun; it was established with the dictatorship and then adored Prado, then it began to adore Castilla, then it passed to Canseco, and now it adores Balta.

Such newspapers are condemned in foreign countries and exercise no influence whatsoever.

Moreover, to console the editors, we will tell them a painful truth. In all foreign countries without exception, in all the corners of the civilized world, there is but one Peruvian name which lifted us from the mire where we were lying, and which gave us some fame. There is only the name of one Peruvian which inspires universal admiration and respect; there is only the name of one Peruvian surrounded with an imperishable glory which reflects on his fellow-citizens abroad—that name is that of Maricano Ignacio Prado.

No one is a prophet in his own country, and much less in an ungrateful one.

No. 116.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Lima, Peru, February 14, 1868.

SIR: The 91st article of the constitution of 1860, of the republic of Peru, now proclaimed to be in force, reads as follows:

When the offices of President and first Vice-President of the republic are vacant, the second Vice-President will be encharged with the supreme command, until the person called by the law may be ready to enter upon the discharge of his duties. In case of a vacancy, he will give, within three days, the necessary orders for the election of a President and first Vice-President, and shall convoke congress for the objects mentioned in article 81 and the following articles.

Canseco arrived in this city on the 15th January, took control of the government immediately, but failed to call an election until the 7th of February, and then refused to recognize the old congress, but called for a new one. The hiatus of Prado's government was too broad for any one, save the President himself, to leap. On this point all that a discreet Peruvian will say is, "Vamos á vér." A translation of the "Bando," calling for the election, is annexed. The officials, expectants, and a few of the lower orders of the people, celebrated for three days the anniversary of Canseco's birth, with fireworks, cannon, etc.

No notice of this important celebration was given to this legation, and yet I am informed that the new cabinet was greatly enraged because the stars and stripes did not, of their own volition, and in honor of that very great day, ascend to the top of the mast, and wave their ample folds over the American legation.

The struggle for the presidency will shortly begin between the other aspirants and chieftains, amongst whom may be mentioned Balta, Cevallos, Costas, and others, and then more devastation of the property and danger to the lives of foreigners may be reasonably expected.

Should an election take place, the chances of Colonel Balta for the presidency are decidedly the best, but many believe that the Canseco party are now doing all they can to thwart him.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[Translation.]

Pedro Diez Canseco, second Vice-President of the republic, encharged with the executive powers:

Whereas the glorious termination of the revolution which had for its object the re-establishment of the legal regimen, and the expiration of the administrative period being near at hand, the time has arrived for the people to elect the President and the Vice-Presidents of the republic, and likewise the citizens who are to compose the national congress.

In virtue of the great political events which have occurred since congress adjourned in 1864, it now becomes necessary to renovate and elect entirely anew the congressional body to regulate the advancement of the country, and to enter, without meeting insuperable obstacles, on the constitutional mode of government. Having heard the decision of the cabinet council, I decree:

1st. That on the 1st of April next the parroquial electors shall assemble to select the citizens who shall form the provincial electoral colleges, both bodies to act in strict conformity with the law of April 13, 1861.

2d. The provincial electoral colleges shall select the President, first and second Vice-Presidents of the republic. The same colleges shall elect the senators and deputies corresponding to the departments and provinces composing the nation, in accordance with the plan formed by the congress of 1861.

3d. Congress shall be inaugurated on the 28th of July next, to fulfill the duties imposed by the constitution, and to enact, according to its attributions, the laws which may be required by the condition of the republic.

The minister of state in the department of foreign affairs is encharged with the execution of this decree, ordering it to be published, printed, and circulated.

Given in the house of government in Lima, the 6th of February, 1868.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 21, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 28th of January, No. 113, has been received, with its accompaniment, which is a copy of a report that was made to you on the 18th of January by Mr. Montjoy, United States consul at Lambayeque. There is annexed to the copy of the consul's report an account of certain proceedings of foreign consuls, residing in Lambayeque, held on the 14th of January. In this dispatch you inform me that several American citizens have presented claims to you against the government of Peru for alleged spoliation committed in Chiclayo, which constitute the subject of the consul's report. You also inform me that claims are presented to you by persons residing at Lima, for injuries to person and property, and you call my attention also to the fact that several hundred thousand dollars, the property of Americans, were lost in Callao when President Prado's forces entered and sacked that city in 1865, and that the congress which convened under President Prado's administration made arrangements to adjust the last-mentioned claims, but that now, inasmuch as all President Prado's acts are declared null and void, those claims will in all probability fall into abeyance.

Upon this statement of facts, you properly ask the instruction of this department. By the President's direction I now comply with that request.

You will receive such claims as citizens of the United States may present, together with such evidence on the subject as may be offered, and will transmit the same to this department, with a report upon the merits of each. It is indispensable that the department be fully informed concerning the status of citizenship, domicile, and duration of residence, the occupation and employment of each claimant. Those claims will be carefully examined here, and made the subject in every case of explicit instruction. In the mean time you will present no claims to the government of Peru, unless in some special case, which may have arisen subsequent to the 28th of January last, and which in your judgment will not admit of delay for further examination. In any such special case you will report your proceedings to this department.

It is the policy of this government, as far as possible, not to embarrass, but to favor reorganization and restoration in the American republican states where administration has been deranged by foreign intervention or civil war.

The Peruvian minister residing here will be informed of the contents of this dispatch, and you will ask leave to give a copy of the same informally to the de facto government of Peru.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith, for the information of the department, the copy of an unofficial letter received by me from Commander J. H. Gillis, commanding the United States steamer Wateree, giving an account of the state of affairs in the north of Peru.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Commander Gillis to Mr. Hovey.

UNITED STATES STEAMER WATREEE, (3d rate,) Callao Bay, February 18, 1868.

SIR: While the Wateree was absent from Callao on the cruise from which she has just returned, I enjoyed opportunities of ascertaining the condition of some parts of the coast of Peru, and avail myself of the honor of hereby informing you of what I trust will be of interest to you. At San José I met the American consul of Lambayeque, and accompanied him to that city, and while there, saw enough to convince me that that section is in a very unsettled state. Indeed there seems to be a perfect reign of terror.

On the 17th instant a party of two hundred and eighty "montoneros" came into Lambayeque for the purpose of welcoming Colonel Balta on the following day, and were received in a public manner by the authorities of the place. While formed in the public square, these men applauded themselves on account of the depredations which they had committed, and cried death to those whose estates they had plundered. On the 8th instant Balta entered the city and received an ovation, the "montoneros" being the chief participants besides the authorities. On the morning of the same day, as a party of officers from this vessel were riding through the public square of Lambayeque, they were stopped, and the horse of one of the officers demanded by some of the same party who had been publicly received the evening previous. I brought the affair to the notice of our consul, and demanded redress, but came away before I could receive a reply.

No serious public outrages occurred, so far as I heard, but they were expected, and indeed the well-disposed citizens appear to heartily despise these roving bands, but feel too weak to offer any resistance. About the time of my arrival at Lambayeque, a wealthy land owner, who claims unusual privileges through the favor of Colonel Balta, shut off the water from a rice plantation belonging to the United States consul, and up to the time of my departure, February 15th, Dr. Montjoy had been unable to obtain any redress, and his crops were fast being ruined.

I will further state that Colonel Balta is reported to have six hundred armed men at his disposal, and it is believed that he intends to instigate another revolution, if he fails to be elected at the coming election.

This vessel also stopped at Santa and Culebras, where there seemed to be no serious difficulty, though the people are apprehensive of trouble. I did not touch at any other port, because, as far as I could learn, there was nothing to demand the presence of a man-of-war, most of the towns being comparatively quiet, though by no means in such a state as one could wish.

I brought as passengers from Lambayeque, two men who were obliged to leave that place, as their lives were in danger at the hands of the lawless. One is an American citizen, and the other a Prussian, both sent on board by the American consul.

I shall do myself the honor to have a personal interview with you as soon as possible.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAMES H. GILLIS,
Commander United States Navy.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 4, 1868.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your two dispatches of the 14th of February, Nos. 115 and 116.

Your account of the partisan discontent which was manifested in Lima in regard to your omission to recognize at once, without instructions from your government, the military chief of a successful armed revolution in Peru, has been read with careful attention. Your proceeding on that occasion is again approved and confirmed. The United States could have no motive to intervene between the political parties of a sister republic. They have every possible motive for sustaining in every case the deliberate and final action of the whole constituent people in every such republic. In case of revolution, foreign nations are entitled to wait for definitive conclusions of the people thus concerned.

You again solicit instructions on the subject of claims. I have nothing now to add to previous instructions on that subject. Those instructions are well considered by the President. Some consideration is due by a friendly state to the embarrassments which governments sustain in the case of revolutionary changes.

SIR: I have the pleasure of acknowledging your dispatch No. 76, dated February 4, 1868, approving my conduct under the new order of affairs in Peru, and my reply to General Francisco Diez Canseco.

As my course has been so entirely different (under instructions) from the other members of the diplomatic corps, and as my failure to acknowledge immediately the existing government has given some little offense, I am gratified to know that, in performing my duty, I have, at least, met with the entire approbation of my government.

Considerable excitement prevails in Lima. On the 6th, General Canseco became alarmed, and caused quite a number of arrests to be made. In the list of prisoners are found the names of the two Colonels Suarez, Colonel Bermudez, Colonel Mugacuru, and others, all strong supporters of Prado, during his administration. Several of these gentlemen have occupied prominent positions in Peru, and are considered as wielding a large amount of political power. It is said that a strong Prado party already exists in Peru, and many look to his early recall.

SIR: On the 13th instant General Gutierrez was dispatched to Chiclayo by the government at Lima, with orders to remove and bring to Lima all the cannon, muskets, and material of war to be found at the first-named city. Hardly was his approach signalled, when the inhabitants of Chiclayo rushed to arms, and expressed their determination to forcibly oppose the removal of the cannon, &c. General Gutierrez not desiring to bring on an encounter between his troops and the people of the town, returned to Lima, without fulfilling his orders. The government then conferred full powers upon Colonel Balta, and dispatched him to Chiclayo, to endeavor, by means of his influence, to quiet the people and facilitate the removal of the guns. The report of the progress of his mission has not yet reached Lima.

The people of Chiclayo alleged, in their defense, that the government, while constantly sending arms and ammunition to the south, desired to completely disarm the north, thus placing the latter under the control of the former. The affair is regarded as very significant, and is evidently the precursor of further trouble.

LIMA, March 20, 1868.

The undersigned, minister of foreign affairs of Peru, has the honor to say to his excellency the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States, in answer to his note of the 18th of the present month, that, without accepting in any manner the name of government de facto, given to that which he has the honor to serve, by that of the Union, he will take pleasure in receiving, in the indicated manner, a copy of the important dispatch of Mr. Seward, whose contents he has already had the satisfaction of learning from the representative of Peru in Washington.

It is the agreeable duty of the undersigned to reiterate to General Hovey the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

JUAN M. POLAR.

His Excellency the ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY
AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY of the United States.

Mr. Hovey to Señor Polar.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Lima, March 20, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note No. 2, dated March 20, 1868, informing me that your excellency, without accepting, in any manner, the name of government de facto given by the government of the United States to the government of Peru, will be pleased to receive the copy of the dispatch of the honorable William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States, (the contents of which your excellency has already had the satisfaction of learning from the representative of Peru in Washington,) in the manner indicated in my note of the 18th instant.

Your excellency will find inclosed a copy of the dispatch referred to in our communications, together with a copy of the consular protest signed at Lambayeque.

I beg to assure your excellency that I have not the least desire to raise any question as to the form of the existing government of Peru. Whether it be a government de facto or de jure, or both, the constitution and laws of Peru, together with the laws of nations, must decide, but your excellency will see by the inclosed dispatch that I have simply complied with my duty by communicating with what my government is pleased to call a government de facto.

If the government at Washington had regarded the present government of Peru as a government de jure, there would have been no necessity for any informal correspondence.

The high estimation in which my government holds his excellency Sr. D. J. A. Garcia y Garcia, now the representative of Peru in Washington, together with the ardent desire to cultivate lasting relations of friendship between our respective governments, has been the cause of placing within his knowledge the facts contained in the said dispatch.

Hoping that such confidence may always exist between our respective governments and representatives, I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

His Excellency Sr. Dr. J. M. POLAR,
Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Government of Peru.

LIMA, March 21, 1868.

Inclosed in your excellency's appreciated communication of to-day, I have had the honor to receive the copy of a dispatch from the Honorable William H. Seward, to which your excellency referred in your dispatch of the 18th instant, and the copy of a protest signed by the consular corps of Lambayeque, relative to the occurrences which took place in that province in January last.

As regards the dispatch of the honorable Secretary of State of the American Union.

I should manifest to your excellency that my government has seen in it a new proof of the spirit of justice which animates the American government, of the wise and conciliatory policy of that eminent statesman, a policy which must lead to beneficent results between the two countries and their governments.

In reference to the consular protest, I deem it necessary to make known to your excellency that in accordance with the request of the British subject, Mr. James Feely, presented through the British legation, asking for the removal of the sub-prefect of Lambayeque, and also for indemnification for the injuries suffered by the said Feely, an affirmatory decree has been issued, a copy of which I have the honor to transmit.

I beg to renew to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, March 28, 1868.

SIR: The contest for election still continues. From the indications in Lima, and the action of the clubs, the best informed among the foreign population believe that it is the object of the President, Canseco, to control the future destiny of Peru, either as president or dictator. The probability is that such a condition of things will arise in the coming elections, that no one candidate will receive an absolute majority under the constitution of 1860, and in that event the election will be thrown into the incoming congress, and those now in power will undoubtedly do all they can with that body to maintain their present positions. It is but justice to Canseco to say that he, like Cæsar, has thrice refused the nomination, (the constitution forbidding the same:) whether the parallel may be carried out, future events will show.

All of the departments of the government are not acting in complete concert with the present government of Peru, and it is distinctly understood in Lima that the friends of Canseco are doing all they can to thwart the election of Balta, who is undoubtedly the most popular chieftain of the hour. Should Balta fail, another revolution is inevitable.

If this election be fairly proved, and sanctioned by the congress which meets in July next. I beg that I may be authorized at once to open relations with his government, as I believe that to be our best policy.

My impression is that our policy here, so far, of non-admission, does not work for the best interests of our country. The Lima newspapers

Not deeming this circular as fully authorizing me to acknowledge the present government of Peru, in view of my former instructions, I thought proper, on its reception, to call upon his excellency Doctor J. M. Polar, minister of foreign affairs, and ask for an informal interview.

Calling at the Foreign Office on the 19th of the present month, I met his excellency informally, and had an extended conversation with him in regard to the question.

He expressed his kindest feelings in regard to your friendship for this country, and, after hearing the proposition for an armistice, declared himself personally satisfied with the measure, but said that it would be necessary to lay the matter before the government of Peru and its allies, before a definite answer could be made to the proposal. He then asked me if there would be any objection to giving him a copy of your circular, in the form of a confidential memorandum. As he expressed himself so decidedly in favor of an armistice, I thought there could be no indiscretion in granting him the desired copy, and accordingly sent it to him on the same day of our interview.

He seemed to be gratified at the proposition, and said that he would opportunely inform me of the result.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, May 7, 1868.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 123, of the 14th of April. It informs me of the pleasing fact that, at present, the political condition of Peru is only slightly disturbed, and that it is universally believed that Colonel Balta in the late elections has met with success as a candidate for the presidency.

* For this circular see p. 321.

Having given me this information, you express a hope that if this election shall be fairly approved and sanctioned by the congress which will meet in July next, you may then be authorized at once to open relations with the government. You express an opinion that the precaution which we so habitually pursue in regard to a hasty recognition of revolutionary government does not work for the best interests of our country in Peru; and you observe that "the Lima newspapers have been teeming with most unjustifiable attacks against our country and yourself ever since your refusal to recognize the government of General Canseco."

The views you have thus expressed will receive careful consideration. It is less than two years ago since the United States reluctantly recognized the government of President Prado, which came in by revolution against the constitutional system—the same constitutional system which General Canseco now claims to have been restored by a reactionary military force. The United States must be entirely indifferent to political persons and parties in Peru, as in all the South American republics, so long as all those persons and parties agree in maintaining a republican system as the only admissible form of government. To us an administration conducted by General Canseco, or by Colonel Balta, would be as acceptable as an administration conducted by any other chief. What we wait for in this case is the legal evidence that the existing administration has been deliberately accepted by the people of Peru. When a republican form of government is constitutionally established, we hasten to recognize the administration, and to extend to it a cordial friendship. We do thus because every state which constitutes itself a republic becomes by force of that very circumstance a bulwark of our own republic. We do not deny or question the right of any nation to change its republican constitution. We do not deny the right even to change it by force, although we think that the exercise of force can only be justified in rare instances. What we do require, and all that we do require, is when a change of administration has been made, not by peaceful constitutional processes, but by force, that then the new administration shall be sanctioned by the formal acquiescence and acceptance of the people.

We insist upon this because the adoption of a different principle in regard to foreign states would necessarily tend to impair the constitutional vigor of our own government, and thus favor disorganization, disintegration, and anarchy throughout the American continent. In our own late political convulsions, we protested to all the world against any recognition of the insurgents as a political power by foreign nations, and we denied the right of any such nation to recognize a government here independent of our constitutional republic until such new government should be not only successful in arms, but should also be accepted and proclaimed by the people of the United States.

We must be content to endure the temporary dissatisfaction which this policy may occasionally awaken in our sister republics.

In accordance with the principles I have mentioned, the United States will recognize the republican administration which may be organized in Peru so soon as it shall appear to have been deliberately accepted by the Peruvian people themselves. We cannot do it until then.

Should your position at Lima become uncomfortable in consequence of adherence to the policy herein set forth, you will be at liberty to withdraw from the republic temporarily, and await elsewhere the progress of events. I sincerely hope, however, that no such exigency will arise.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Lima, Peru, July 22, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that on my arrival in Lima, on the 20th instant, I found the congress recently elected engaged in the preliminary labors of qualifying their members. As a general thing there are two contestants for every seat, yet both classes claim to be the supporters of Colonel Balta, the President elect, the contest simply being for personal advancement and ambition.

The general impression is that peace will prevail, and that Balta will assume his seat undisturbed, although it is difficult to predict with any degree of accuracy the future action of the people of Peru.

I have some difficulty in clearly understanding my duties under your dispatch No. 83, dated May 7, 1868, and will wait further advices as to when I shall recognize the government here.

Balta has been elected by the entire vote of the people, and my opinion is that it would be the best policy to recognize his government after his inauguration.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

SIR: In my late visit to Chili, in conjunction with General Kilpatrick, I had interviews on two several occasions with the secretary of foreign affairs of that government in regard to the propositions for meditation made by the United States. The secretary expressed himself as being entirely willing to accept the first proposition of an indefinite truce, which he stated would be tantamount to peace, as no cause of war would be likely to ensue from the old issues. He further said that personally he could have no objections to adjusting the matter by means of the congress of plenipotentiaries proposed by the United States, but that as a party measure it might materially injure the present administration in Chili.

SIR: I beg to present to your consideration the following translated extract from the report of the minister of the interior of Peru, submitted to-day to congress. From the extract it will be perceived what views are held by the minister regarding those disturbances which took place in the north in January last, and which gave rise to the claims I have the honor to forward to you :

A very lamentable event, and one fraught with the most unhappy circumstances for agricultural interests, has occurred at Lambayeque, and throws a gloom over the epoch through which we have passed.

Between the proprietors of the estate of Vina and the neighboring population quarrels have been constantly taking place for some time past. These quarrels were brought to a climax by the triumph gained in Chiclayo by the constitutional party, and for the moment there was no authority at Lambayeque sufficiently powerful to cause private rights to be respected. The government immediately took measures to prevent a repetition of these occurrences, and Colonel Balta was sent to calm the excitement of the people in that section ; this he did by means of his great influence, but it has been necessary to maintain in Lambayeque a force sufficient to guarantee those private rights which were so cruelly trampled upon.

This opinion of the minister demonstrates clearly the justice of the claims against his government, which are herewith transmitted.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

SIR : I have the honor to subjoin a translated extract from the report transmitted to the present congress, by his excellency the minister of foreign affairs of Peru :

Although the government of the United States of America, following a policy peculiar to itself, has not recognized officially the actual government of Peru, yet it has not failed to give us unequivocal proofs of its friendly interests, through the medium of its minister plenipotentiary in Lima, General Hovey, and through our own legation in Washington.

In addition to the offer of mediation made by the government of the United States, another evidence of its circumspection has been shown to us in informing us of the instructions given to its representatives relative to the claims of citizens of the United States.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Lima, Peru, August 14, 1868.

SIR : After an examination of the votes cast in the recent elections, congress, on the 1st instant, declared Colonel Balta the legal President of Peru, and on the following day he was solemnly installed in his position. His remarks, on his inauguration, were as follows :

HONORABLE REPRESENTATIVES : Invested with power by the national vote, and faithful to the oath which I have just subscribed to, I will be just, and nothing more than just, since I am convinced that in justice we will find that firmness necessary for the salvation of the republic.

I know that the financial condition of the country is not satisfactory, but relying on your valuable assistance, and on the patriotism of all Peruvians, we may hope speedily to remove all embarrassing circumstances—a complete forgetfulness of all past discords, national reform in all administrative branches, but a reform emanating from the law; protection to arts, industry, and agriculture; thus creating genuine sources of wealth.

Such will be my constant effort. Thus the public tranquillity will not be disturbed, and ambition will find the basis of a solid and honorable future in labor, and not in favor, or positions derived from favor.

To you, illustrious legislators, pertains the duty of assisting, with your efficacious co-operation, the constitutional government inaugurated to-day, and I, on my part, promise to be inexorable in extirpating discord or civil war.

May God guide and fortify you in your arduous duties, laboring for the health of the republic.

The new cabinet has been formed as follows:

President of the council and minister of war, Colonel Juan Wancisco Balta; minister of treasury, D. Francisco Garcia Calderan; minister of foreign affairs, D. J. Antonio Barrenechea; minister of interior, D. Pedro Galvez; minister of justice, D. Luciano B. Cisneros.

Mr. Barrenechea was the minister of foreign affairs during the latter portion of Colonel Prado's administration, and was universally esteemed.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Lima, August 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith the copies and translations of the correspondence which has taken place between the minister of foreign affairs and myself, on the occasion of the inauguration of the government of Colonel Balta, marked inclosures Nos. 1 and 2.

On reviewing your dispatch No. 83, dated May 9, 1868, I find the following:

What we wait for in this case is the legal evidence that the existing administration has been deliberately accepted by the people of Peru. When a republican form of government has been constitutionally established, we hasten to recognize the administration, and to extend to it a cordial friendship. * * * and, in accordance with the principles I have mentioned, the United States will recognize the republican administration which may be organized in Peru so soon as it shall appear to have been deliberately accepted by the Peruvian people themselves.

You will perceive from the correspondence herewith transmitted, and from the unanimous action of the Peruvian congress, that Colonel Balta has been duly proclaimed constitutional President of Peru, without a contesting element within the limits of the republic. In this view I have deemed it to be the policy of our government, as well as in conformity with the directions contained in your above-mentioned dispatch, to acknowledge the present administration. I would have been compelled to have taken issue with the actual government, after the reception of the note from the foreign minister, if I had not accepted the same.

The country is as peaceful now as it ever has been, or, probably, will be for years to come, and the people seem satisfied with the new administration.

I will observe that the government of President Balta is not the immediate sequence of force, but has been produced by the universal vote of the people, and sanctioned unanimously by congress. Canseco took possession of the presidential chair by force; Balta, by the peaceful will of the people. In this view I consider that I am acting within the letter and spirit of my instructions, and hope that my action will be approved by our government.

I have the honor to be, your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

No. 6.]

LIMA, August 5, 1868.

I have the honor of addressing your excellency for the purpose of informing your excellency that the nation has chosen, and the congress proclaimed as constitutional President of the republic, Colonel José Balta, who assumed the supreme power on the 2d instant.

After the agitations through which Peru has passed, your excellency and the government of your excellency will view with satisfaction the establishment of a government emanating from the free suffrage of the people, and which has the firm intention of consolidating order in all of the departments of public administration.

One of its principal duties will be the careful direction of foreign affairs, which are intimately united to the internal order of the republic, and the preservation and expansion of those kindly feelings which happily exist between Peru and the United States. In order to attain this end, the government will take the greatest care in causing the persons and interests of all foreign citizens and subjects to be respected within this republic, and to comply faithfully with all existing treaties.

Far from having interests in conflict with those of any other country, Peru, comprehending perfectly her own, desires to preserve the greatest harmony with all nations, and the present government is convinced that that of your excellency is animated by the same wish.

The government now inaugurated, eminently national by its origin and by the course it proposes to follow, is foreign to all parties, since it considers itself, above them all, inspired by justice and strict impartiality, far from blindly refusing to recognize the events of the last few years in the republic; considers it a duty to remember those events in order to carry into effect all that may be just, and to profit by experience.

His excellency the President, doing me the honor to believe that I can interpret his noble views has named me minister of foreign affairs. In accepting this high post, I have flattered myself with the hope of finding in your excellency's government the same friendly sentiments which animate that of Peru. The profound satisfaction I experience in once more entering into relations with the diplomatic corps resident in Lima, is so much the greater since I have the hope that the cordiality of our relations will contribute towards augmenting the good understanding of the two governments, and towards strengthening the ties which unite Peru to the United States.

I dare to hope that your excellency will aid me with your benevolent assistance in this important object, and I beg to assure your excellency of my most distinguished consideration, and to subscribe myself your excellency's most attentive and obedient servant,

J. A. BARRENECHEA.

His Excellency General ALVIN P. HOVEY,

Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

Mr. Hovey to Señor Barrenechea.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Lima, Peru, August 10, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to receive your excellency's note, No. 6, dated the 5th instant, in which I am informed that the nation has chosen, and the congress proclaimed, Colonel Don José Balta as constitutional President of the republic, and that Colonel Balta assumed the supreme power on the second of the present month.

Your excellency remarks that, after the agitations through which Peru has passed, the government which I have the honor to represent, as well as myself, will regard with lively satisfaction the establishment of a government called into existence by the free vote of the people, and which has as its firm object the consolidation of order in all of the departments of public administration.

Progress is often the fruit of the agitations and excitements through which nations pass in the grand march of their destiny. I sincerely trust that this may be the case in the late agitations to which your excellency has referred.

The undersigned is gratified to know that the amicable relations existing between the governments of the United States and Peru, have from the earliest hour of the Peruvian republic always been such as should exist between governments professing the same principles, the most cordial and friendly, and that your excellency's government desire that such relations should so continue.

So far from Peru having interests inconsistent with those of other governments, her geographical position, her productions, mineral and agricultural, and her best interests in every point of view (in the opinion of the undersigned) demand not only peace at home, but friendship with the world.

The undersigned has learned with great pleasure, from your excellency's note, of the intention of your excellency's government to cause the rights not only of Americans, but of all foreign citizens to be respected throughout the limits of Peru. This is not only in accordance with the policy of all progressive governments, but is a doctrine absolutely necessary for every republic of America, north or south.

Your excellency further informs me that the government recently inaugurated is above party, and is a government instituted for the people, and desires to comply with all that is just. Nobler impulses could not animate the hearts of those in power, and I hope that the most sanguine expectations of his excellency the President and his cabinet in this regard, may be fully realized.

Permit me to say to your excellency that my past experience in Peru, and knowledge of your excellency's character, assure me that nothing but the kindest relations can exist between our respective governments as long as your excellency holds the high position to which your excellency has been so justly and so honorably elevated.

I beg to assure your excellency of my most distinguished consideration.

SIR: I have your dispatch of the 22d of July, No. 131. It affords me much pleasure to know that the secretary for foreign affairs in Chili expressed himself to you as being entirely willing to accept the first proposition of the United States for an indefinite truce in the war between the allied republics and Spain. I take notice further that the Chilian secretary said to you that he had no objections to adjust the matter by means of a congress of plenipotentiaries, as proposed by the United States, but that as a party measure it might materially injure the present administration in Chili.

Insomuch as this information comes in an indirect as well as informal manner, I am obliged to limit myself in the use of it to a simple mention of the matter thus noticed to the Spanish minister plenipotentiary here for the information of his government.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, August 22, 1868.

SIR: I regret to inform you that Peru has suffered the greatest calamity which during its existence has befallen it. On the 13th instant, at 5.40 p. m., a very decided earthquake was felt in Lima and Callao, and, although not causing any injury of consequence, was pronounced to be the most severe movement of the earth experienced here since 1860. Following the earthquake, the sea, rising in a great wave, overwhelmed a portion of Callao, inflicting great damage on the town, and but for the protection afforded by the island of San Lorenzo, the city would have been completely destroyed. Upon the succeeding night a disastrous fire broke out in that city, causing a loss of upwards of one million and a half of dollars. During this terrible occurrence, Colonel Balta, the President, and his ministers were present at the post of danger, directing the efforts of the soldiers and firemen, and rendering very effectual assistance. The Chincha Islands were, in part, submerged, but, owing to the speedy retrocession of the sea, suffered little injury; whilst the city of Ica, distant forty miles from the main land, opposite the Guano Island, was completely destroyed. By the steamer which arrived from the south on the 19th of the present month we learn that the cities of Arica, Arequipa, Iquique and Moquegua, and several minor towns, have been reduced to ruins. The loss of life is estimated at one thousand eight hundred, while the damage done to property will not be covered by two hundred millions of dollars. In the bay of Arica, the United States ships Fredonia and Wateree were cast on shore and lost, the first with the loss of thirty-seven men, the second with one. The conduct of Commander Gillis, of the Wateree, and of his officers and crew in alleviating the wants of the people of Arica is highly commended, and the humane services of the physicians of these two ships, Doctors Winslow and Dubois, have been duly appreciated.

These cities are completely destroyed, not one single house remaining. The effect here has been intense, and, urged by myself, Admiral Turner, commanding the naval forces of the United States in the South Pacific, has generously offered to aid the government in its efforts to render assistance to the ruined and starving people of the south. I beg herewith to transmit the copy of a letter from myself to the minister of foreign affairs, (No. 1,) and copies of the correspondence passed between the admiral and myself in relation to this subject, (No. 2.)

The government is busily engaged in equipping vessels and loading them with all necessities for the distressed people. I sincerely trust that our only ship here, the Powhatan, may be of some service.

The damage done to commercial interests is immense, and cannot be estimated now from the imperfect data at hand.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

SIR: The undersigned takes pleasure in informing your excellency that Admiral Turner, commanding the naval forces of the United States in the South Pacific, will proceed immediately to the port of Arica, to aid, as far as possible, in alleviating the distress caused at that place by the recent earthquake.

In this view the undersigned will be pleased to present Admiral Turner to his excellency the President, so that his voyage may have all the beneficial effects possible.

The earliest convenient hour is requested, as the admiral will arrive at Lima at 11.30 a. m.

I beg to reassure, &c.,

SIR: Fearful that the interview of this morning may have led to misconstruction from the natural imperfections of translation, I beg leave to transmit herewith the correspondence which has passed between the admiral and myself in relation to the matter in question.

Nothing would give the admiral and his command more pleasure than to serve your distressed countrymen in the hour of their great calamity. You will please inform the admiral by one o'clock to-morrow how he can assist you, as his vessel, the Powhatan, will sail about three p. m.

I beg to assure, &c.,

MY DEAR ADMIRAL: Do not fail to do all you can to alleviate the sufferings of those who have borne the terrible calamity of the late earthquake in Peru. I not only request but beg you to leave no effort undone that may aid them in the hour of their direst calamity. If necessary, make your vessels like merchantmen, to take food and provisions to those who may now be suffering. Tell me how many medical men and assistants may be able to find passage in the Powhatan to-morrow. I know your generous nature, and I am sure our government will fully sanction all that you can do in the great cause of humanity.

Send whom you wish to my ship, or at least to the flag-ship; Captain McDougal is her captain. We will try and take care of them to Arica.

SIR: The details received respecting the terrible earthquake in Peru, concerning which I informed you in my dispatch No. 144, have convinced me that the first estimate made of the loss of life and property was greatly under the truth. From what I have been able to learn, I believe that fully two thousand persons have perished, and upwards of three hundred million dollars' worth of property destroyed from the effects of the shock.

Government and private corporations and individuals are still actively engaged in forwarding all kinds of supplies for the sufferers, and large subscriptions on their behalf are being raised in Lima.

The United States steamer Kearsarge hearing, in Coquimbo, Chili, of the disaster, immediately proceeded with provisions to Arica, and was the bearer of the first assistance received by the starving people.

LIMA, August 21, 1868.

I had the honor of opportunely receiving your excellency's estimable notes of yesterday informing me that Rear-Admiral Turner, commanding the naval forces of the United States in the South Pacific, proposed sailing to Arica immediately, with the view of alleviating, as far as possible, the disaster caused by the earthquake, and asking that the government should denote the articles it might desire to send to Arica by the Powhatan. Your excellency's conduct, and that of the estimable admiral, is that to be expected from the representatives of the American Union, who, wherever they may be, are always ready to aid the unfortunate, and who, in Peru, have given always convincing proofs of their humane and generous feelings in our days of trial, days which try true friendship and true friends.

Your excellency is aware that my government hastened to accept this important offer, and sends to-day, on board the Powhatan, a commission of surgeons and a contingent of money.

His excellency the President and the undersigned went on board the Powhatan to personally thank Admiral Turner, and to manifest his profound gratitude for such an opportune proposal, and I now fulfill the pleasant duty of assuring your excellency of our lasting gratitude.

I beg to renew, &c.,

J. A. BARRENECHEA.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's very courteous note dated to-day, informing me of the measures taken by the government of Peru in relation to the offer of assistance made by Rear-Admiral Turner, and expressing the sentiments of your excellency's government, in regard to the steps taken by that officer and myself.

Your excellency's country is filled with sorrow and sadness, caused by the late terrible earthquake.

Permit me to condole with your excellency and the afflicted people of Peru in the hour of your disaster.

Seldom have the world seen sorrows like yours. Calabria, Lisbon, Callao, New Madrid, (Mo.,) in my own country, have in times gone by passed through trials probably as severe as this, but the memory of those past sufferings is softened by the great lapse of years; still here we realize and feel again all the horror of the dreadful past.

May God in his mercy "temper the wind to the shorn lamb," and bring your country out of the terrible ordeal through which it is now passing.

I have done all in my power to alleviate the sufferings of your countrymen, and now can only add that I deeply regret that my countrymen could not have done more than we have for the cause of humanity.

I beg to reassure, &c.,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, September 14, 1868.

SIR: In my dispatches Nos. 144 and 145, dated the 22d and 28th of August, respectively, I gave you a slight account of the terrible earthquake which on the 13th ultimo laid desolate a large part of Peru, and now, again, it is my painful duty to inform you that a large and the most prolific part of the republic of Ecuador is in ruins, caused by a similar shock at 1:30 on the morning of the 16th of the same month. This earthquake seems to have had its center in the province of Imbabura, near the volcano of Ocampo, about sixty miles north of the city of Quito. Eight towns, with the adjoining haciendas and populations, are said to have been entirely destroyed, numbering from forty to fifty-four thousand inhabitants. The cities of Otavalo and Cotacachi, containing respectively about twelve and eight thousand inhabitants, and both situated on the shores of the Lake Mojanda, are said to have been swallowed up with their entire populations, and their sites have become a part of the lake. The city of Ibarra, with a population of thirteen thousand, is totally destroyed, only about three thousand of the inhabitants escaping, and the town Atuntaqué leveled with the earth, burying all of its inhabitants in its ruins. Nor is the injury confined to the cities and towns, but all of the haciendas of the province, the richest in Ecuador, growing sugar and grain, and producing large numbers of cattle and sheep, have, as it were, been swept out of existence.

Quito did not suffer in the same ratio in the loss of life, but its walls and houses are destroyed. The most of its inhabitants, including the English chargé d'affaires, Mr. Hamilton, with his large family, were driven to the open plaza or square in the center of the city; and he, more fortunate than the others, is now enjoying the great luxury of a tent, while thousands of the best citizens are without shelter. To heighten the gloom, despondency, and misery of all, the terrific thunder-storms of the tropics seem to have redoubled their forces, and have literally deluged the whole country.

The losses in Imbabura will cause great suffering in Quito, as nearly all the necessities of life for that city were drawn from that province. The difficulty of conveying food from Guayaquil will be very great, as the journey requires twelve days' severe travel, with mules, carrying small burdens, over rugged and precipitous mountains, deep gorges, and narrow passes. If relief in some form is not speedily given, many of the sufferers will be compelled to reach the sea-shore or perish. Extracts from private letters and public documents published in the Lima journals (see inclosures Nos. 1, 2, and 3) show the destruction and destitution to which I have referred. Indeed, these shocks have almost ruined the republic of Ecuador. The mentioned representations have been fully corroborated by the statements of his excellency Don Antonio Flores, plenipotentiary of Ecuador in Peru. In Peru, also, as I have heretofore informed you, proud and rebellious Arequipa is levelled with the dust; Arica swept from the sea-shore, with but one solitary house remaining; while the district and city of Moquegua, with its rich villages, vineyards, and haciendas, are but the wrecks of things that were. Had the earthquake in Peru taken place at night-time, as it did in Ecuador, the loss of life would have exceeded one hundred thousand souls. As it was, that loss in Peru is less, but the loss of property far greater.

Want, hunger, and famine, in these now unhappy countries, are striding through all classes in the midst of the unburied dead, and a general paralyzation of thought and action seems to pervade the land. This is, no doubt, caused by the continuous shocks since, and the great fear of other calamities; and, to add to the consternation of the weak, fearful, and helpless, robbers, in some localities, are said to be sacking and pillaging everything within their reach.

I take great pride in informing you that Rear-Admiral Thomas Turner, Captain McDougal, Commanders James H. Gillis, James S. Thornton, Austin Pendergrast, and the other officers and crews of their command in our navy, near the scenes of danger, have done all that noble-hearted, brave sailors could do to alleviate the sufferings of all within their reach.

The generosity of our country, in days gone by, has left a record that will never be forgotten—Greece, Poland, Hungary, and Ireland, with no greater, if not far less claims for aid or charity, have found that in the United States there were feeling hearts and open hands for those who deeply suffer. Will not our generous-hearted countrymen add Peru and Ecuador to their noble list?

Our government, I know, can do no more than has been done by our navy, but I most earnestly urge and entreat that you appeal to the good men of our country to aid by charity the suffering people of Peru and Ecuador: Let those who gave bread to starving Ireland repeat their generosity, and let the Protestant and the Catholic now join and vie with each other in showing, by their works, that the Christian's creed means good will and charity towards their fellow-men; and let all others who have a heart that can feel for the sufferings of their fellow-beings aid by sending a mite from their riches to the hungry, starving, naked, and desolate people of these two countries. Money, clothing, food, or any other necessities of life, would be "bread cast upon the waters;" but the supplies, to do good, must come quickly. The people are too much terror-stricken to act with vigor, and the governments of Peru and Ecuador cannot now give the aid the necessities of the people imperatively demand.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

QUITO, August 19, 1868.

With profound grief I communicate to your excellency that on the 16th instant, at 1.15 a. m., a violent earthquake destroyed almost all of the churches and public buildings of Quito, the greatest part of the private houses is considerably damaged, and the losses suffered through this catastrophe are inestimable, and thirty years' labor will not repair them. Only eleven people were killed in the capital.

The city of Ibarra has been completely destroyed, only the sixth part of its population escaping. All the other towns of the province (Imbabura) shared the same sad fate, especially Otavalo, where not a living human being remains.

The earthquakes still continue, and consternation and despair increase every moment in the hearts of those who have escaped this tremendous catastrophe.

God preserve your excellency.

C. PONCE,
Secretary of State.

His Excellency Don ANTONIO FLORES,
Plenipotentiary of Ecuador at Lima.

[Translation from the Nacional, of Lima, September 2, 1868.]

QUITO, August 19, 1868.

At half-past one o'clock a. m., on the 16th instant, a terrible earthquake visited this city and the towns adjacent to it. The churches of San Francisco, the Company, Carmen, Saint Clara, the Cathedral, Saint Augustine, and various others have been almost entirely destroyed. The palace of the archbishop and the government house are also in ruins, and throughout the whole city there is scarcely an edifice which has not been severely injured. The shock evidently proceeded from an eruption of the volcanoes of Imbabura or Cotacachi. All the persons having the means have emigrated to the country, and those remaining here sleep in the public plazas for security. The aspect of the city is very sad, only in the squares are people to be seen, or when some procession begging the intercession of Heaven sallies forth. As well as we can discover, only nineteen lives were lost during the catastrophe; but if the continual shocks we experience still augment in force, we shall have to lament greater calamities. This city, however, has not felt the shock as greatly as the surrounding towns. The city of Ibarra has been totally destroyed, not one house remaining standing, and the town of Otavalo is levelled to the ground. More than thirty thousand persons have perished, and the destitution and distress of the survivors cannot be overestimated.

By the next mail I will be able to enter into further details, as at present the particulars of the disaster have not been fully received.

Extract from an editorial of the newspaper Comercio of Lima, dated September 6, 1868.

The note addressed to the chief of the commission of assistance by the North American admiral, Mr. Turner, not only calls for national gratitude on the part of Peru, but shows the nobility and virtue of the writer, so much the more, if we consider that the sentiments expressed were followed by actions whose value, under the peculiar circumstances, is inestimable.

In spite of the total loss of the Fredonia and Wateree, and the terrible calamities through which the officers and crews of these vessels passed, the noble activity and great heartedness of these valiant sailors were immediately displayed in showering benefits, in the shape of food, clothes, and medical services, upon our desolate and ruined countrymen. In addition to this assistance rendered by the shipwrecked crews, no sooner was the intelligence of the disaster known in Lima, when the American minister residing here, in conjunction with Admiral Turner, placed the ships of the United States squadron in Callao at the disposition of our government, so that, as merchant vessels, they might carry all necessary succor to the starving people of the south. The government eagerly accepted this generous offer, and by means of it was greatly assisted in extricating itself from the terrible embarrassment always attendant on such disasters. We fulfill a most grateful duty in chronicling these acts, and in doing honor to the feelings and the humane and philanthropic proceedings of the American sailors, acts which enslave the gratitude of a nation, and which will cement more strongly our happy relations with the magnanimous people of the United States.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, September 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I solicited and obtained an interview with his excellency the President of Peru, on the 7th instant, for the purpose of acquainting him with the contents of your circular, dated the 27th of March last, instructing me to propose, in the proper quarter, that this government should consent to a formal armistice; and, following this, to suggest the idea of a congress of plenipotentiaries, from Spain and these allied republics, to be held at Washington, to arrange a definitive peace.

The President accepted, on the part of Peru, the propositions contained in your dispatch, saying that war was no longer desired by his country since the victory obtained over the Spaniards on the 2d of May, 1866, had avenged the wrongs suffered by Peru; that an indefinite truce would be mere weakness, but that your propositions would lead to peace, now greatly coveted by this republic. He added many expressions of his gratitude in regard to the generous interest always manifested by the United States for Peru.

The minister of foreign affairs, who was present at the interview, informed me that, by order of the President, he was already holding conferences with the representatives of Chili, Bolivia, and Ecuador, resident in Lima, for the purpose of jointly accepting the propositions contained in your circular, and that he would speedily acquaint me, in writing, of the result of the deliberations.

I may mention that Ecuador has a plenipotentiary here now, with special instructions to bring about peace on the terms proposed by the United States.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, September 30, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith (inclosure No. 1) a copy and translation of an opinion given by the honorable M. T. Wreta, fiscal of the illustrious supreme court of Peru.

The duties of this office are similar to, but of more extensive jurisdiction than, those of the Attorney General of the United States, and his opinions and conclusions have like weight and authority. As many claims for aggravated injuries have been filed in this legation, (a part of which, with the proofs complete, have been forwarded to you heretofore for the action of the government,) and as the honorable fiscal has cited American authorities in the refusal of a French claim, of the same class as those I have referred to, I have deemed it to be my duty, and proper, under the circumstances, to protest, in the form of a "deduction," against his very unjust and illegal conclusions, (inclosure No. 2.)

Without prompt action in this regard, I was fearful that the government of Peru might take some decisive action that might retard the payment of the claims of our countrymen. You will perceive that, in conformity with your dispatch No. 77, dated 21st February, 1868, I have made no diplomatic claims, but simply prepared the way for them in future, should the government of Peru fail to do justice without that unpleasant recourse.

While Americans stand foremost, at the present, with the Peruvian government, I regret to state that a large class of those who may be styled the "best society" in Peru entertain strong antipathies towards all foreigners.

The late magnanimous decree of President Melgarejo, of Bolivia, making all Americans, north and south, citizens of that republic, with full rights, on the simple registration of their intentions, can find no response in Peru. I trust that I have taken no position which will not meet with the entire approval of our government.

The sworn statements of the injured, with their proof, and the report of Grand Marshal La Fuente, late minister of the interior, clearly show that the remedy should come quickly from some source; and if the claims of our countrymen are not firmly and immediately supported by the government of the United States, I am fearful it never will come.

I am positively informed that the English, French, and Prussian chargés d'affaires have also sent protests to the minister of foreign affairs against the opinion of Dr. Wreta, to which I have referred, the subjects of each having suffered in the late outbreak.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

LIMA, August 27, 1868.

MOST EXCELLENT SIR: The fiscal gives his opinion that "as Bernard Prieur has asked from your excellency the payment of $4,979, the value of goods robbed from his armory, situated in Baquijano street, No. 266, and gives as reasons that on the 6th of January last, during the mutiny of the people of this capital, his establishment was broken into, and he was left in utter want and misery"—founding upon these reasons, he considers his demand to be strictly just, and applies directly to your excellency without making the claim in a diplomatic channel as a French subject.

Although Prieur does not explain the manner in which the robbery was committed, you may read in the letter which he presents as proof, and which is written by the owner of the house in which his store is situated, Don Francisco Forcelledo, as follows: "On the 6th of January I was standing in the door of the house in which I reside, at the moment when the revolutionary movement took place, and I saw a disorderly troop of men of the lower classes breaking open the door of the store in which you have your armory, and who, after having penetrated therein, appropriated all the arms they could find."

Society and the government always deplore the misfortunes that happen to natives and foreigners, and they protect equally the one and the other, in so much as may be within their power and the laws may permit, and condemn all violation of individual guarantees. An abstract examination of the events of the 6th of January, so far as regards political views, which lead to nothing in the present case, shows, that if at two o'clock on that day a mutiny among the soldiers of the barracks of San Augustin took place, followed by a popular rising in the streets, and that extended through the streets of Baquijano as far as the Callao railway station, the action of the authorities was so rapid and effective that in less than three hours the mob was dispersed, and the districts in which those occurrences took place were completely quieted. But during those few moments of strife many lives were sacrificed and, some crimes committed, which it was unable to foresee and impossible to prevent. Unfortunately, the situation of the armory of Prieur in one of the streets in which the riot took place served to excite the desire of the mob to take advantage of the opportunity to procure arms with which to resist the police, without there being a suspicion that there was a project to injure any particular person, much less causing such damage to a foreigner in distinction to a native citizen.

In whatever manner the subtraction of the arms that belonged to Prieur was executed, it was always the crime of robbery committed by a crowd, accompanied by violence and house-breaking, which is provided for in 1st titulo, section 12, of the Penal Code. The corporal punishments laid down for those guilty of these crimes are to be applied, together with the restitution of the thing robbed, (article 371,) because such persons are both criminally and civilly responsible for their acts; and the civil responsibility comprehends, besides the restitution of the thing stolen, reparation for the injuries and indemnification for the losses, and is binding upon all of the delinquents, and falls upon their heirs in preference to all and every obligation posterior to the particular crime. (Articles 87, 92, adnfollowing. Penal Code.) But if, in conformity with the general ruling of section 1, lib. 1, del. C. de E. P., only those tribunals and judges established by the laws have the power to give a verdict as to such criminal and civil responsibility, for the reason that the administration of justice belongs exclusively to them. By the especial decision contained in the second part of the 92d article of the C. P., the judge and no other authority is competent to assign the proportionate amount which ought to be paid by each criminal for his civil responsibility, (without lessening his obligation as to being jointly responsible.)

Regulated by these decisions, Prieur ought to take advantage of his right, and not apply to your excellency, asking fiscal indemnification. If it is the law of nations that the utmost protection owed to foreigners is to concede to them that which is conceded to natives, and administer to them strict justice as quickly and as impartially as to these, it is also that they ought not to complain, but be contented with being treated equally well with the natives; that they cannot pretend to any prerogatives in the proceedings, and that they are obliged to obey the law in so much as they are protected by it. Prieur, besides being a Frenchman, if he is protected in his person, property, rights, and actions, is not so protected in a distinct and privileged manner, but in the same as Peruvians themselves; and being, in the particular point, in the same condition as they according to article 3 of the treaty of December 10, 1861.

Although Prieur, to have recourse to your excellency, has viewed the robbery of his store in the light of an injury more or less proceeding from civil war, and committed by a multitude of people or a mob, the fiscal responsibility is in no respect compromised. In the republic, for natives and foreigners, the principle reigns, and has been solemnly promulgated, that the state is in no manner responsible for the payment of losses and damages occasioned by civil wars. They are accidents, misfortunes, public calamities for the persons upon whom they fall. So it was declared by the council of state in the vote with which the government agreed on the 11th September, 1834, and so it was declared in the supreme decree of the 9th of February, 1859.

The fiscal responsibility is founded upon another principle of universal justice, to wit: A government cannot be responsible when the acts that cause the injury are entirely independent of its will, and, when far from tolerating them, it tries to restrain them. And this principle, in these same words, was recognized and set down in the treaty between France and Venezuela in 1843.

In conformity with this principle, the minister of state, Mr. Rouher, denying before the French legislative body the charges made against him in the session of the 22d June, 1866, by Mr. Jules Favre, because he had not exacted effectively from the Russian government indemnification for the damages caused by a police agent to a dress-maker, Madame Masset, said: "In this little affair is involved a great international question; it is a fundamental rule in every country that the foreigner can have no more privilege than the native. I have never heard that the pecuniary responsibility of the government may be compromised by the crimes of its agents. Such responsibility has never been proclaimed in any place. In England, the minister, Lord Palmerston said, in the session of Parliament of 17th June, 1850:

"The honorable speaker (Lord Stanley) supposes that the government of the Queen has established as a principle to demand indemnity for every loss or damage suffered by English subjects in Greece or other countries, that result from tumults, riot, or similar causes. No, it is not possible to sustain that foreigners have the right, in every case, to expect indemnity from the government of the country in which they have suffered losses or injuries."

In the session of the House of Commons on the 13th of June, 1865, the same Lord Palmerston answered to another charge concerning indemnifications. "That really the English subject, Mr. Taylor, had suffered considerable losses in consequence of the unqualified acts of the liberators of Sicily; but that the chief of the ministry thought, with the lawyers of the Crown, that the Italian government was not responsible for such outrages."

The cabinet of St Petersburg, adhering completely to the principles avowed by that of Vienna, sustaining the refusal of the Duke of Tuscany to indemnify the losses suffered by the English during the pacification of Liorna, said, in the dispatch of the 2d of May, 1850, for the information of the English cabinet, "when an individual establishes himself in another than his native country, he accepts the possibility of all those dangers to which that country may be exposed. Should it be admitted as a precedent, that which England desires to establish with respect to Naples and Tuscany, it would result that British subjects in foreign countries would occupy exceptional positions, with very superior advantages to that enjoyed by the inhabitants of all other countries, and the situation of the government receiving them would be intolerable. The Emperor would see the necessity of examining and defining, in a very precise manner, the conditions under which he would concede to a British subject the privilege of residence and property-holding.

"The cause of Naples and Tuscany is that of all weak states, whose existence is only guaranteed through the maintenance of the tutelary principles which we have just cited."

The cabinet of Washington, refusing the indemnities asked by those Spanish subjects whose houses were sacked by an unbridled mob on the 24th of August, 1851, said, in a dispatch of the 13th November, "in every country, at times, mobs of the lower classes get together, and everywhere at times popular violence breaks forth, and outrages the laws and tramples upon the rights of citizens and foreigners. In such cases, public faith and national honor exact that not only those outrages should be condemned, but also that the authors or perpetrators should be punished, whenever it is possible to bring them to justice.

"The Spanish subjects who have come to this country to mingle with our citizens, have a right to the protection due to Americans. It may well be that the losses of the Spaniards are greatly to be regretted, but withal it is well known that many American citizens have suffered equal losses from the same cause, * * * and the subjects of her Catholic Majesty have no motive for complaint, if they are protected by the same laws and tribunals as the native citizens."

Many native citizens and foreigners have suffered immense losses in the United States, occasioned by the last civil war, and nevertheless the principle of fiscal non-responsibility has not been broken. Neither has it been less loyally respected there when it was favorable to other governments and not to American citizens. So it may be seen from the Attorney General holding that the United States should not exact indemnification from Spain or Chili for damages caused by the bombardment of Valparaiso, said: "The undersigned does not believe that the principle that those foreigners domiciled in belligerent countries ought to suffer the same as native citizens all the eventualities of the war has ever been seriously controverted or denied in practice."

Sustained by these reasons of universal justice and the common convenience of all states, this department has opposed every claim for illegal indemnity that has come to its knowledge. On account of all expressed in the foregoing, that which corresponds to the present case is to declare that the nation is not responsible for the payment solicited by Prieur, leaving intact his right to bring a demand in the form prescribed by the laws against whomsoever he may think proper, and that a cause shall be instituted for the robbery of the store and armory, so that the culpable parties may effectually suffer the responsibility, both civil and criminal, in all the severity prescribed by the law.

URETA.

The PRESIDENT.

Mr. Hovey to Señor Barrenechea.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, September 30, 1868.

SIR: I was not a little surprised to see in the newspaper Comercio of the 14th instant, No. 9888, the official opinion of the honorable fiscal of the supreme court of Peru, Doctor Wreta, in regard to the claim of Bernard Prieur, a copy of which I have the honor to herewith inclose.

As the claim referred to was made by a subject of France, I should not, at this time, have addressed your excellency in relation to the claim of any citizen of the United States, now in this legation, against the republic of Peru; but the statements and false logic contained in the honorable fiscal's report, coming, as they have, from such high authority, alarm me for the rights of my countrymen, for, if adopted in their broad extent by your excellency's government, I am fearful that the worst of consequences may ensue to those whose claims are now in my hands.

I therefore, without waiting the action of my government, have the honor to make, informally, the following protest, or deductions to protect, as far as possible, the rights of all concerned.

The ability of the honorable fiscal is of the highest possible cast. He seems to be able to find a technical excuse for almost any supposable case, but can it be possible that any man or government can justify the conduct of those who perpetrated the outrages committed in Chiclayo and Lambayeque, described by Grand Marshal La Fuente in the following manner: "A very lamentable event, and one fraught with the most unhappy circumstances for agricultural interests has occurred at Lambayeque, and throws a gloom over the epoch through which we have passed.

"Between the proprietors of the estate of Viña and the neighboring population quarrels have been constantly taking place for some time past.

"These quarrels were brought to a climax by the triumph gained in Chiclayo by the revolutionary party, and, for the moment, there was no authority at Lambayeque sufficiently powerful to cause private rights to be respected. The government immediately took measures to prevent a repetition of these occurrences, and Colonel Balta was sent to calm the excitement of the people in that section; this he did by means of his great influence, but it has been necessary to maintain in Lambayeque a force sufficient to guarantee those private rights which were so cruelly trampled upon."—(Report of Grand Marshal La Fuente, minister of the interior, to the Congress of 1868.)

The ingenuity of the honorable fiscal may be commended, but his conclusions will find no home in ethics, logic, sound policy, or the laws of nations. Indeed, in substance he ignores and denies all international claims made by domiciled citizens.

He says: "The cabinet of Washington refused to indemnify certain injuries inflicted upon Spanish subjects by an infuriated mob, in New Orleans, in 1851."

I must remark, with great deference, that he is surely mistaken. Mr. Webster, the Secretary of Foreign Affairs, may have refused; but President Fillmore, on the 14th of June, 1852, in a special message to Congress, acknowledged these claims, and recommended their payment, which was done by virtue of an act of Congress passed August 31, 1852, which reads as follows:

"It is hereby appropriated to enable the President of the United States to make compensation to the Spanish consul and other subjects of Spain residing at New Orleans, and other subjects of Spain at Key West, for losses occasioned by violence in the year 1851, arising from intelligence recently received at those places of the execution of certain persons at Havana who had recently invaded the Island of Cuba, $25,000."

When the honorable fiscal calls Mr. Webster, great as he was, "the cabinet of Washington," I have clearly shown that he falls into an error. This same Daniel Webster claimed the Lobos Islands for the United States, yet both the President and Congress renounced the claim, and showed again the grave mistake he committed. We have many examples, in all ages and countries, that great men frequently commit not only errors but great blunders.

In the United State, which is not a centralized government like that of Peru, each town, county, or State is liable to the citizen for the damages caused to him by any mob force. Such town, county, or State are made by law corporate bodies, and can be sued in the courts of the country, and compelled to do justice. Thus the city of Louisville paid for injuries done by her mobs to the Catholics in 1858, the city of Cincinnati for damages caused by her negro riots, and the city of New York paid millions for the injuries proceeding from the draft riots which occurred during the late rebellion. Ample and complete protection to life and property is the absolute right of the citizen in every civilized nation. The government owes him this, because he, as a resident, pays to support the government. With us the doctrine is carried still further; and if a city, town, or county suffer bad roads, bad bridges, or any other nuisance to exist, and a person is injured thereby, he can bring suit and recover ample damages from the town, city, or State wherein he has been injured. This is the clear and undeniable law of the United States, and it is a perversion of logic to deny like liabilities here.

Let the distinctions I make be properly observed, and the conclusions I have drawn must inevitably follow.

The honorable fiscal further says: "Many native citizens and foreigners in the United States of America suffered immense losses occasioned by the late civil war, and, nevertheless, the principle of non-responsibility fiscal has not been broken, nor less loyally respected when it was favorable to other governments, and not to the American citizen."

I will not stop to answer this statement in detail, but I can assure your excellency that millions of dollars have been paid to native and foreign citizens in the United States for the injuries done to person and property during the late conflict. The only refusals have been to disloyal men and to rebellious States. The riots in New York in 1863 were opposed to the war, and, in substance, favorable to the States in rebellion, yet that city alone paid millions of dollars for private injuries. As to those who committed treason in the United States, the argument of the honorable fiscal is wholly foreign to the subject. The Court of Claims at Washington is almost daily giving judgment for the very class of claims of which the honorable fiscal says "the non-responsibility fiscal has not been broken."

As to the proof of these statements and payments, see acts of Congress, United States Statutes at Large, 1864, vol. xiii, pp. 148-381; acts 1865 and 1866, pp. 194-360-370; acts 1867, pp. 397-444. (The Annual American Encyclopedia for the year 1863, p. 816.)

I will now submit a few of the other facts and authorities bearing on this particular case, as adjudicated by the United States and other powers in Europe and America.

From the argument of his excellency Reverdy Johnson, now minister plenipotentiary of the United States in England, made by him as the attorney for Peru in the year 1828, I take the following extracts:

"You ask me if the United States have any claims upon the government of Peru for damages, or indemnity of any kind, for the seizure of the two vessels Georgiana and Lizzie Thompson.

"First, upon principle, irrespective of judicial or other authority, can such a claim be maintained? I am perfectly clear that it cannot, and for these, to me, very obvious and controlling reasons: Until there is a recognized change in the condition of a government, such government is responsible to foreign nations for all wrongs committed within its limits upon the persons or property of their citizens or subjects. This responsibility has more than once been asserted and enforced by the United States.

"It is no answer to such a demand that the defaulting government was willing, but unable, to afford the necessary protection. The duty to protect implies and involves the ability to protect. It is the fact, the failure to perform the duty, not the cause of the failure, that imposes the responsibility. Every government assumes upon itself the obligation to secure other governments, and their persons and property, against domestic wrongs, and is therefore responsible for all the consequences of such wrongs. If, however, there exists an insurrection or rebellion, so marked and long-continued as to probably result in general or permanent success, it is for other nations, upon their own responsibility, to decide for themselves whether they will consider the rebellious as an actual government, deal with it as such, and hold it as such to every national responsibility. Until this be done the original government is to be treated as the only government, its 'foreign relations' are to be considered as 'undisturbed,' and its 'usual commercial relations' with other nations continue as before.

"These principles are too obvious to be disputed, and they, indeed, being admitted by Mr. Secretary Cass in his letter of May 22, can there be a doubt that for any wrong perpetrated on an American citizen or his property, or upon the honor of the United States by the insurrectionary chief, Vicaneo, or by his orders, the rightful government of Peru would have been liable? If so, must it not be, is it not equally apparent, indeed is it not a consequence, that for an injury or wrong done to Peru by the United States or by her citizens under cover and through the instrumentality of the same insurrection, the United States cannot shelter themselves from the responsibility of the same insurrection?"

Mr. John Nelson, one of the greatest lawyers of the United States, and employed as attorney in this case with Mr. Johnson, by the Peruvian minister at Washington, expresses his entire concurrence with the above opinion.

Mr. J. S. Black, at that time the Attorney General of the United States, in his dictamen on the same case, fully concurs in the liability of the government of Peru to pay for injuries to private citizens.

Thus it will be seen that the eminent attorneys on both sides of this question openly and clearly admitted the obligation of a government to pay for injuries inflicted on the rights of foreign citizens.

One or two cases may more fully elucidate this point:

In the case of the United States against Palmer, (3 Wheaton, 643,) it was decided that "if the government of the Union remains neutral, but recognizes the existence of civil war, the courts of the Union cannot consider as criminal those acts of hostility which war authorizes, and which the new government may direct against its enemy."

Let me remark that my government did not, through its representative here, nor by any expression of its officers, acknowledge the existence of civil war in this country during the time of the unhappy occurrences to which I have alluded, under the late revolution of General Pedro Diez Canseco, and which gave rise to the accompanying claims. Hence the resident citizens of the United States in Peru are entitled to regard this question as though no civil war had at that time existed.

Lord Palmerston's declaration before Parliament fully answers the honorable fiscal's argument in relation to the recent bombardment of Valparaiso. The noble lord says: "It is, undoubtedly, a principle of international law, that when one government deems it right to exercise hostilities against the territory of another power, the subjects and citizens of third powers, who may happen to be resident in the place attacked, have no claim whatever upon the government which, in the exercise of its national rights, commits these acts of hostility. For instance, it was deemed necessary for us to destroy Sebastopol. There may have been in that town many Germans, Italians, Portuguese, and Americans, but none of these parties had any ground upon which to claim from the English and French governments compensation for losses sustained in consequence of these hostilities. Those who go and settle in a foreign country must abide the chances that may befall that country, and if they have any claim, it must be upon the government of the country in which they reside; but they certainly can have no claim whatever upon the government which thinks right to commit acts of hostility against that state. Therefore we were advised, and I think rightly, that British subjects in Greytown had no ground upon which they could call upon the government of this country to demand from the government of the United States compensation for injuries which they received in the attack upon that town."

And I ask if the honorable fiscal's argument is fair or proper when applied to a civil war which did not obtain the recognition of any foreign power?

To show the importance attached by the United States to claims of similar character, and to the delay in the non-payment of the same, held justly by her citizens against foreign governments, I cite the message of President Polk, dated December 2, 1845, in which our war with Mexico is predicated on the reprehensible conduct of that country in this regard: "But though Mexico cannot complain of the United States on account of the annexation of Texas, it is to be regretted that serious causes of misunderstanding between the two governments still exist, growing out of unredressed injuries inflicted by the Mexican authorities and people on the persons and property of citizens of the United States through a long series of years. Mexico has admitted these injuries, but has neglected and refused to repair them."

"Such was the character of the wrongs, and such the insults offered to American citizens and the American flag by Mexico, in palpable violation of the laws of nations and the treaty between the two countries of April 5, 1831, that they have been repeatedly brought to the notice of Congress by my predecessors. As early as the 8th of February, 1837, the President of the United States declared in a message to Congress that 'the length of time since some of the outrages were committed, the repeated and unavailing applications for redress, the wanton character of some of the outrages upon the persons and property of our citizens, upon the officers and flag of the United States, independent of the recent insults to this government by the late extraordinary Mexican minister, would justify, in the eyes of all nations, immediate war.'

"He did not, however, recommend an immediate resort to this extreme measure, which he declared 'should not be used by just and generous nations confiding in their strength for injuries committed, if it can be avoided,' but, in a spirit of forbearance, proposed that another demand be made on Mexico for that redress which has been so long and so unjustly withheld. In these views, committees of the two houses of Congress, in reports made to their respective bodies, concurred.

"Since these proceedings more than eight years have elapsed, during which, in addition to the wrongs then complained of, others of an aggravated character have been committed on the persons and property of our citizens. A special agent was sent to Mexico in 1838, with full authority to make a full and final demand for redress. The demand was made; the Mexican government promised to repair the wrongs of which we complained, and, after much delay, a treaty of indemnity was celebrated between the two countries. * * * The claims were not paid at the due time, and Mexico applied for further indulgence, which was granted in that spirit of liberality and forbearance which has always characterized the conduct of this country towards that republic."

This was the cause of the Mexican war.

My government has carried the principle of protection so far that both houses of Congress, on two several occasions, passed acts to indemnify citizens of the United States injured by France, partly on the ground that our own government had not used sufficient energy and diligence in the prosecution of those claims against France, and that such inactivity was a stain upon the justice of our government.

(See French spoliation claims; messages of the Presidents and discussions in the Congress of the United States in the years 1846 and 1855; convention with Great Britain 4th of July, 1831, in which provisions were made for mutual claims. See amounts paid by Brazil to citizens of the United States, and treaty with Brazil in 1849; treaty with Great Britain, 1826; conventions with the same nation, 1853 and 1854; conventions with Peru in 1841 and 1863; conventions with Mexico in 1843; conventions with Portugal in 1851; conventions with Sicily in 1832; conventions with Spain in 1819; conventions with Texas 1838; all of which undeniably controvert the doctrine asserted by the honorable fiscal of the non-liability of the government of Peru for injuries done to foreign citizens.)

History is full of the liabilities of nations for wrongs done to their citizens, from the rape of the Grecian Helen to the present time. There is scarcely a quarrel or war that cannot be traced to such causes, yet the honorable fiscal says, in substance, that domiciled citizens must submit to the wrongs and outrages of the government of the country where they reside, and that such citizens "ought not to complain, but be contented with the same treatment as that accorded to natives of the country; that they cannot pretend to any prerogative in the proceedings, and that they are obliged to obey the law inasmuch as they are protected by it."

Let me inquire, first, whether natives of this country themselves may not be so inhumanely treated as to have the undeniable right to demand justice from the government, and, secondly, as they are obliged to obey the law, the honorable fiscal says they should be protected by it. This is all that we ask, protection and justice.

But the records in these cases now presented clearly show that an officer of the United States and several non-combatant American citizens, taking no part whatever in the late controversies, have been most cruelly treated, and their rights most unlawfully trampled upon. I refer particularly to Consul Mountjoy at Lambayeque, whose character stands unimpeached in the eyes of my government; Consul Weile at Tumbes, though not suffering in consequence of the late revolution, was still beaten and incarcerated without justifiable cause; Mr. Alexander Ruden, whose fine cotton estate was completely destroyed; John Henness, who was severely beaten, and so injured as to lose the sight of one eye; George Hill, who was shot, robbed, and imprisoned, and remains in consequence a cripple for life; John Talbot, who received such injuries at the hands of the soldiery at Baton Grande that he fell down in the streets, and died in consequence; James Johnson and Francis Grannan, whose health from the same cause has been ruined for life, and who are in want from their incapacity to earn their daily bread; together with a number of others, whose cases I might also cite.

The honorable fiscal, quoting M. Rouher, one of the French ministers of state, where only one police officer and a dress-maker appear upon the stage, says, that he (M. Rouher) "never had heard that the pecuniary responsibility of the government could be compromised by the acts of its agents."

This is good law and logic, but I must be pardoned in supposing that there is a broad difference in a controversy between a dress-maker and an officer of police, and the overwhelming force of mobs, maddened by the passions of the hour. One case is completely in the hands of the law, while the mob rises above and defies it.

But from the honorable fiscal's stand-point, the officers and other offenders should have been punished for their crimes by the courts of the land; but I have yet to hear that a single officer, soldier, or civil authority, has been arrested and brought to punishment for any of the great crimes and misdemeanors which the Grand Marshal La Fuente, late minister of the interior, has so eloquently and so forcibly described.

I will be excused, I know, for indicating that the other cases cited by the honorable fiscal, of Taylor, injured by the liberators of Sicily, and the cases of Naples and Tuscany, will be found, when properly understood, very like that of the police agent against the dress-maker, to have little or no relevancy to the question at issue.

I have not the authorities before me, but feel well assured they cannot sanction the doctrine asserted by the honorable fiscal.

Again he says that the department under his charge "has opposed every claim for illegal indemnification that has come under its notice."

This, under the logic of the honorable fiscal, means, necessarily, all claims made by foreigners, as he denies them their legitimate rights under the laws of nations. At the bottom of all statesmanship lies the principle of simple and impartial justice, and I regret to say that I have never heard of one single report, made by the honorable fiscal, favorable to a foreigner whose rights had been injured.

The honorable fiscal, continuing, says that "it has been solemnly declared that the state is in no manner responsible for the payment of losses and damages occasioned by civil wars," and refers to the decisions of the councils of state of September 11, 1834, February 9, 1859, and other laws of Peru.

Yet it must be well known to him that many such claims have been admitted and paid by Peru since that date. He has entirely overlooked the mixed commission that met here, and adjusted many cases of that description in 1863; and that the sacking, in Callao, of establishments belonging to foreigners, by national troops, was admitted to be wrong by the late congress, and a commission appointed to adjust the claims for said injuries.

Since I have had the honor to represent my country in Peru, I have made no direct diplomatic claim against your excellency's government. Such claims should, if possible, be avoided, as they usually end in controversy, and the friendly feelings of the two countries are often weakened.

In this view I now informally present to your excellency what I believe to be the just demands of my countrymen, and sincerely hope to avoid anything like formal diplomatic claims, believing that his excellency the President of Peru will do prompt and ample justice to all who may have been unjustly wronged, and I appeal to his excellency for no other class of men.

I may be pardoned for saying that since I arrived in Peru I have been one of its firmest and best friends, not of men, but of the republic. Your excellency, and the members of the former cabinets, are aware that what I now say is the simple statement of facts. I cannot enlarge upon this point.

In this view I know his excellency the President will pardon a few plain, blunt words which are intended to benefit all concerned.

Constant practice as well as sound policy demands that damages should be promptly paid for all injuries done to foreigners by intestine commotions, because, by so doing, peace and friendship are preserved. To the people of your own country this does not apply with the like force, since it is the policy of all progressive nations to invite immigration and capital. From such resources alone can the American republics hope to become powerful and wealthy.

But the payment of the present claims of the citizens of the United States against Peru can be urged with more force than those of any other people or nation, since, in my opinion, we have been a better and a truer friend to this republic than any other foreign nation has proved herself to be. This is no boast, but only the simple truth. But for the action of the United States, there can be no doubt that long since the Chincha Islands would have been in the hands of Spain. This is made patent by reference to the "Correspondencia Diplomática relativa a la Cuestión Española," No. 292, p. 369, and No. 293, p. 370.

The injuries received by citizens of the United States during the late struggle at Checlayo and the troubles at Lambayeque, to which I have referred are of such a character as, being ordinarily beyond the price of payment in money, would have caused immediate reprisals or war between my country and any powerful European nation.

Your excellency will observe, on reading the statements, that the injuries done to my countrymen have not been confined to private citizens only.

If your excellency will have the kindness to examine the statements and proofs impartially, I feel assured that the strong common sense of your excellency's government, and the manly, straightforward, soldier-like instincts of his excellency the President, will lead Peru to admit what I am thus painfully compelled to say.

In this country my government views every action in the most favorable light, because we sincerely hope that the republics of South America will be our sisters and our friends through all time to come.

But we must preserve and protect the rights of our citizens, otherwise our nation itself would soon lose the respect of our friends at home, and of the world abroad.

Like Rome, in ancient days, we cannot allow one lash to be unlawfully laid upon the back of an American citizen by another nation.

No nation can, at all times, control its entire people, especially when war is raging. Such command is impossible, but true policy and justice demand that those who are wronged, in such times, should be satisfied and indemnified with the least possible delay.

Should it be inconvenient at this time to pay for the said injuries in money, evidences of indebtedness, in some tangible form, might be substituted, as some of the claimants are now absolutely destitute, and delay will only add to their misfortunes.

At this time your excellency will understand that I make no formal diplomatic demand, and trust that his excellency the President will pardon any remarks that may offend, as my strong and anxious desire is to protect my countrymen, and add to the friendly relations now happily existing between our two countries.

To conclude, let me state what I believe to be the arguments, conclusions, and effects of the honorable fiscal's position, if they are carried into execution by the government of Peru.

First. All domiciled citizens of Peru are denied the right of international support.

Second. The authorities cited by him are not justified by the laws of nations, and those relating to the action and doctrines of the United States misconstrued or entirely misunderstood.

Third. The policy announced, if put into effect, would involve untold difficulties, and give pain to every true friend of your excellency's country.

Hoping that the government of Peru may see, with the views I have informally presented, both justice and policy in the immediate settlement of the inclosed claims without further diplomacy, I will say no more, but leave the whole matter in the hands of your excellency's government, trusting that I will soon be informed of a favorable adjustment of the claims of my countrymen.

I have the honor of assuring your excellency of my most distinguished consideration.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: Your dispatches of the 22d of August, No. 144, and of the 28th, No. 145, have been received. The appalling calamities which have befallen Peru, and the Spanish American republics, have deeply moved the sympathies of the President and the people of the United States. Your own proceedings, in connection with Rear-Admiral Turner, in relieving the sufferers, are entirely approved and commended. I give you a copy of the President's reply to Mr. Garcia, in which the President has alluded to the sad events you have described.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

President Johnson's reply to Mr. Garcia.

MR. GARCIA: I receive with much satisfaction the letter in which the newly elected President of the republic of Peru has confirmed and sanctioned your mission in the United States, and I cordially reciprocate the fraternal sentiments which you have expressed.

While the condition of internal peace is advantageous to all states, whatever may be their form of government, that condition is essential to the safety, prosperity, and welfare of republics. I sincerely hope that the republic of Peru may henceforth be without a foreign enemy or a domestic revolution.

Mr. Garcia, we are pained by the reports which reach us of a great calamity which has fallen, not only upon Peru, but also upon the adjacent countries of the Pacific coast. It is to be hoped, indeed, that these first reports may prove to be highly exaggerated; nevertheless, the calamity, in its lightest possible aspect, is sufficiently severe to excite universal sympathy, and justly engage the charity of Christian nations.

I pray you to assure the President and people of Peru of my profound sympathy with them in these overwhelming afflictions.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 14th of September, No. 147, has been received. It contains a very full and careful account of the devastations which were produced in the republic of Ecuador, by the terrible earthquake of the 13th of August. Losing no time in giving publicity to the painful narrative, I sincerely hope that it may excite not only the sympathies but the active charity of all the civilized nations.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, October 14, 1868.

SIR: As a significant sign of the feelings of the politicians of Peru, I have the honor to herewith transmit the original and translation of a proposition presented in the house of deputies on the 12th October, 1868. This law was proposed by the speaker of the house, and seconded by Dr. Rafael Velarde. The first, Dr. Aviedo, is a well-known lawyer, and formerly minister of justice and of foreign affairs. The second is also a lawyer of prominence, and was one of the commissioners appointed by the Canseco government to decide upon the Callao claims.

It will be observed that this proposed law is but the sequence of the doctrines contained in the opinion of Doctor Areta, the attorney general of Peru, referred to in my dispatch No. 150, dated 30th September last.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

PROPOSITION.

The congress of the republic of Peru, considering—

1. That the nation is not and cannot be responsible for the damages and injuries inflicted on the interest of private persons, by a force superior to it;
2. That, setting aside this principle, sustained by the principal nations, indemnification has been demanded for several foreigners;
3. That it is the duty of congress to put an end to these abuses, making the proper declaration—

The following law is declared :

ARTICLE 1. No privilege is conceded to foreigners to demand from the government of the republic, as indemnification, compensation, or any other pretext, the injuries or damages suffered by their interests in consequence of political commotions, tumults or other causes, only excepting the case where such injuries have been caused by legitimate authorities.

ART. 2. Foreigners who may be injured have their right acknowledged to take legal steps against the injurer, in all kinds of indemnity, and in conformity with common law, and in the cases prescribed by it.

Let it be communicated.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, October 28, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copies of a resolution of thanks passed by the Peruvian congress on the 19th instant, together with the note of his excellency the minister of foreign affairs, and my reply thereto, (inclosures Nos. 1, 2, and 3.)

The sympathy lately expressed by the journals of the United States, in relation to the sufferings caused by the late terrible earthquakes in Peru and Ecuador, has created the warmest demonstrations of gratitude towards our country. Every article of the least importance has been translated and published in the newspapers of Peru, and it is ardently hoped that our congress may act towards this country as it did for Ireland in days gone by.

Thousands have been reduced from competency to absolute suffering, and the terrible visitation still continues in several parts of the country. In Caldera, (Chili,) and Cuzco, severe shocks were felt on the 15th instant, causing, it is said, considerable damage, but the full details have not yet been received.

Between earthquakes, yellow fever, and revolutions, Peru, for the last few years, has been sorely afflicted, and the hourly expectation of like calamities has thrown a dark shade over the country, and paralyzed its energies.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

LIMA, October 23, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit to your excellency the authentic copy of the vote of thanks passed by the national congress to the republics of Chili and Bolivia, and the representatives of the United States and France, for the generous conduct observed by them towards the people of the south of Peru who suffered the consequences of the earthquake of 13th of August last.

The celerity and zeal with which your excellency and the estimable officers of the American navy hastened to relieve the necessities of the south, in the most pressing moments, fully justify this solemn manifestation of gratitude, which causes me such pleasure and honor in communicating to your excellency.

Reiterating, on my part, in the name of the government, the assurance of the same feeling, I am your attentive and very obedient servant,

SIR: I have the honor and pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 23d instant, transmitting the resolution of thanks passed by the congress of Peru on the 13th October, and for which honor I beg your excellency to convey my sincere thanks to the proper authorities.

The flattering manner in which your excellency has thought proper to allude to the action of myself and the officers of the navy of the United States gives me great pleasure. I only regret that we could not have done more at the time for suffering humanity, but ardently entertain the hope and conviction that my country and countrymen will further evince the sincere regard which they hold towards Peru.

SIR: This evening I had the honor to receive your excellency's dispatch dated the 21st instant, which you have pleased to send, for the information of my government, copy of the correspondence exchanged between the department and the minister plenipotentiary at Lima, on the occasion of some reclamations of American citizens, originating in the last civil war of Peru.

Not having any official knowledge of the facts to which the dispatches of the said plenipotentiary, and of the consul of the United States at Lambayeque allude, I limit myself to expressing to your excellency that by the first mail I will transmit to my government the documents communicated by your excellency.

I avail of this occasion to renew to you the assurances of my high consideration, and subscribe myself, your very obedient servant,

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Señor Garcia.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, March 25, 1868.

SIR: This department has been furnished by Mr. Thornton, her Britannic Majesty's minister here, with a copy of a letter from S. C. Montjoy, esquire, United States consul at Lambayeque, Peru, addressed to Mr. Jorningham, British chargé d'affaires at Lima. From that communication it appears that two British subjects, named Thomas Tells and Thomas A. Batt, residing at Lambayeque, have been grievously and without provocation injured in their persons and property by the authorities there. Mr. Montjoy alleges that the persons referred to had been entirely neutral during the late revolution in that quarter.

Although it is not unlikely that this subject has already been brought to the notice of the Peruvian government, I will thank you to inform that government that, as friends of the republic of Peru, it is painful to us to receive such communications, and to express a hope that due inquiry will be made into the particular cases adverted to, with a view to such redress as the result may call for, and that all practicable efforts will be made to prevent a recurrence of such acts.

I avail myself of this occasion to offer to you, sir, a renewed assurance of my high consideration.

SIR: I have the honor to communicate for your information a copy of a circular of yesterday addressed by the department to ministers of the United States accredited to the governments of the several belligerents, suggesting that, preliminary to a definitive peace, a formal armistice be agreed to by Spain on the one side, and Peru, Chili, Ecuador, and Bolivia, on the other.

I avail myself of this occasion to offer to you, sir, a renewed assurance of my high consideration.

LEGATION OF PERU,

Washington, April 1, 1868.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the note of your excellency, in which you inform me that Mr. Thornton, her Britannic Majesty's minister to this republic, had communicated to you a copy of a letter of Mr. Mountjoy, consul of the United States at Lambayeque, addressed to Mr. Jerminham, British chargé d'affaires at Lima, from which it appears that two English citizens have been seriously injured in their persons and property by Peruvian authorities, without any provocation on their part, and who were entirely neutral in the late revolution of Peru, according to the statement of Mr. Mountjoy; and your excellency begs of me to make known to my government that that of the United States, as a friend of Peru, regrets to receive such communications, and hopes that a proper investigation will be made in the cases referred to, in order that amends may be made according as the circumstances require, and that all possible efforts be made to avoid the repetition of these occurrences.

I cherish the sincere conviction that my government, moved by the spontaneous consciousness of its own duty, admitting the truth of the acts complained of, which is not evident to me, will have ordered their judicial investigation and the conviction and punishment of the delinquents. I am likewise certain that the steps of Mr. Jerminham, with regard to acts of the nature of those referred to, as unfortunate as they can be in moments of political commotion, of which no country is exempted, will be attended to according to justice. However, I shall transmit to my government, to satisfy the wishes of your excellency, a copy of the note to which this is a reply, and I have no doubt that it will take it into due consideration.

I improve the occasion to renew to your excellency the assurances of my high consideration.

LEGATION OF PERU,
Washington, April 2, 1868.

SIR: I was pleased to receive, along with your attentive note of the 28th ultimo, a copy of the circular sent by your department to the ministers of the United States accredited to the governments engaged in the war of the Pacific, proposing the adoption of an armistice as a preliminary to a definitive peace between Spain and the republics of Peru, Chili, Ecuador, and Bolivia.

By yesterday's post I had the honor to transmit to my government the circular alluded to, and, while awaiting its reply, I may undertake to assure that the people and the government of Peru will duly appreciate the friendly sentiment which has inspired this new overture of peace on the part of the government of the United States.

I embrace this new opportunity to renew the assurances of my high consideration, and of the respect with which I subscribe myself

Your very attentive servant,

JOSE ANTONIO G. Y GARCIA.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Garcia to Mr. Seward.

[Translation.]

NEW YORK, April 14, 1868.

SIR: The war which the allied republics of the Pacific saw themselves compelled to declare against the government of Spain has assumed a character which can only be qualified, with propriety, as an imperfect peace. The active hostilities which terminated on the 2d of May, 1866, have been succeeded by a period of real tranquility, during which the opposing parties in the conflict, far from renewing acts of force, have visibly modified their policy and removed serious obstacles in the way of reconciliation. This is the historical period of contests between Spain and America. The capitulation of Ayacucho, signed in Peru on the 9th of December, 1824, was the starting point of forty years of imperfect peace—imperfect in form although real in feeling and in the practice of mutual relations. The 2d of May, 1866, likewise appears to be called to mark one of these characteristic terms, since it has been followed by two years of quiet which, if they do not express a covenanted cessation of hostilities, may at least be considered as years of reflection and oblivion.

The United States, in common with all other nations of the world, of their own free will deemed themselves released from all obligations of neutrality during the peace de facto which ensued after the war of independence between the new American republics and their mother country, and entered fully, with all of them, into the relations of a state of peace, in obedience to a sound principle of common justice and to the requirements of those great interests of the commerce and industry of the world which cannot tolerate indefinite wars.

It would have been better had no other occasion presented itself for the practice of this principle of positive consuetudinal right, for this would have proved that there had been no renewal of those unfortunate causes which make its application indispensable. But the truth is, this has occurred, and it becomes the duty of the government of the United States to renew the declaration of that doctrine, which has already been taken into consideration by the federal Congress in a resolution now before the House of Representatives, and which essentially declares this principle.

It is publicly known that in January last the belligerent governments of Chili and Spain, through their diplomatic agents at the court of London, conjointly asked permission of her Majesty's government to remove beyond the jurisdiction of that kingdom armed vessels for the military service of both. It is also known in a reliable manner that Lord Stanley, after mature deliberation, and having consulted with the crown attorneys, who expressed the opinion that there was nothing in the case in violation of the principles nor contrary to the precedents of that government in matters of neutrality, granted their petition, notwithstanding a protest presented by the Peruvian minister, who did not deem it his duty to assent to an arrangement for which he had no authority.

This incident, which I recall not as an example of authority, but on account of the grounds which led not only to the joint action of Spain and Chili, but also to the policy of the British cabinet, amply justifies the clear and essential purpose of this communication, since it distinctly manifests that by express agreement, nay more, that by accomplished public, official acts, a stop has been put to the state of war; that the diplomatic act concluded in the office of a foreign government has expressly abrogated all the limitations imposed on non-belligerent states by the duties of neutrality; and finally, that the state of war having in this way ceased, all other governments have, although a formal peace may not have been celebrated, the right to restore both to the allied republics and to Spain the liberty of doing within their territories all such things as are lawful in the normal condition of international affairs, and for other purposes than for those of that interrupted war.

With these antecedents, which I doubt not will be accepted by your excellency as exact and conclusive, I take the liberty of asking your excellency to be pleased to inform me if, in consequence of the indefinite character which the war between the allied republics and Spain has assumed, your government considers itself with respect to said nations in the same relations as in a state of peace, and if they may, consequently, once again enter into free and unrestricted commerce with the United States without offense to their laws, which Peru with the other republics have ever observed and still propose to respect, or if you shall deem it your duty to maintain the position of a neutral, whatever time may elapse before a treaty of peace is made in the Pacific.

In view of the considerations which I have had the honor of submitting in this dispatch, I incline to believe that there can be no difficulty in your excellency's government arriving at a resolution in the former sense, for it would be but in conformity with its previous conduct, and would at once be accepted by Spain, who having in fact herself annulled the state of war, and being at this moment occupied in fitting iron-clad vessels in the ship-yards of other nations, could not object to it without offense to her own character, nor without presenting her own conduct in flagrant contradiction.

I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

CLARENDON HOTEL,
New York, April 18, 1868.

SIR: In accordance with the announcement which I had the honor of making to your excellency in my dispatch of the 27th of February, I sent my government a copy of the correspondence between your department and the minister plenipotentiary of the United States in Lima, occasioned by certain claims of American citizens arising from the civil war which took place in Peru during the latter months of the past year of 1867.

My government, duly appreciating the high and laudable spirit of justice of which your excellency has just given a new proof in the instructions relative to these matters sent to your plenipotentiary in Lima, as well as the generous interest evinced in the stability and future of the other republican states of America, takes pleasure through me, as its organ, in acknowledging in all sincerity its gratitude to the United States. I should have performed this pleasing duty in person, by reading to your excellency a communication from the minister of foreign affairs of Peru, had it not contained another point which it will be easier and more convenient for your excellency to take into consideration, having before you said dispatch, together with the documents to which it refers, and of which I inclose authenticated copies, numbered from one to seven inclusive.

The qualification of de facto, given by your excellency to the government which at present rules the destinies of Peru, has not been accepted, nor can it be assented to by an administration, established and existing under the ægis of the national constitution. In the hope of rectifying the opinions which governed your excellency in forming a judgment as to the present order of things in Peru, my government submits to your excellency certain serious considerations, which present in a clear and definite manner the truth of the matter; but should they not suffice for that purpose, I shall be happy to fulfill the duty with which I have been charged of explaining the case, either by writing or at a special conference, as may be most agreeable to your excellency, and of making known to you in detail all the circumstances and legal grounds applicable to the same.

I feel persuaded, nevertheless, that new resolutions have been taken by your excellency's government, so constantly in harmony with justice and the ever-complaisant friend of Peru, which will reconcile the principles and precedents of the United States, applicable to cases differing from the one under consideration, to the titles which warrant the Peruvian government in trusting that all other nations will recognize its existence de jure. The renewal of the friendly offices of the United States for the settlement of peace between Peru and Spain, recently recommended by your excellency to his excellency General A. P. Hovey, bind anew direct diplomatic relations between the governments of the United States and Peru, and involves the implicit official recognition of the right with which the latter assumes, within the sphere of its legal attributes, to represent the national sovereignty, since in no other way would your excellency have drawn up initiatory propositions of peace, the acceptance of which, as well as all other international acts resulting therefrom, can have no significance either moral or political, nor be legally binding upon the Peruvian people, if the government to which your excellency has been pleased to communicate them, in exercising the regular duties which pertain to the public power with which it is invested, be not acting with legitimate authority emanating from the constitution of the country. I therefore believe I have grounds for feeling convinced that your excellency will expressly assent to what your own course through positive acts has already signified, and that it will accordingly be unnecessary to enter into any discussion upon facts and principles which are within your excellency's knowledge.

I avail myself of this new opportunity to subscribe myself, with the highest respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

J. A. GARCIA Y GARCIA.

LIMA, March 21, 1868.

No. 23.]

SIR: I have received your note No. 37 of the 27th of February last, with the accompanying papers.

Before all, I must say to you that under date of the 18th instant General Hovey wrote to me asking leave to send me a copy of Mr. Seward's dispatch, which, I having answered him yesterday, he has this day done, not only sending a copy of the dispatch, but also of the consular protest made at Lambayeque. The notes exchanged in this matter you will find in copy herewith inclosed—Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4.

By copy No. 4 you will see that the government of Peru has fully appreciated the conduct of the American cabinet, which, in refusing from a very justifiable spirit to authorize the presentation of claims which have not been previously qualified in Washington, in full knowledge of all the circumstances and of the persons making them, manifests that it has understood the necessity of coolly and at a distance studying matters which are not always impartially judged by a minister, however anxious he may be to keep within the limits of what is just.

As to the latter part of Mr. Seward's dispatch, referring to the general policy of the government of the Union towards the American republics, it is worthy of the eminent statesman who signed it, and to whom, perhaps, more than to any one else in that country, is due that cordiality which to-day is the distinctive character of the relations between the United States and the other republics of the continent.

With regard to the claims of American citizens, I will commence by saying that this government has no knowledge of those of Americans resident in Lima, referred to in Mr. Hovey's note; those of foreigners who suffered in Callao by the incidents of 6th November, 1865, will be laid before the next congress, in the manner shown in (copy No. 5) the agreement relative to this matter entered into with certain foreign representatives. If, for reasons with which you are acquainted, the American minister took no part in this agreement, his fellow-citizens will not on that account fail to enjoy benefits thereof from the moment in which the American government sees fit to adhere to the arrangement.

Neither does this government know of the damages which, it is said, were suffered by certain American citizens in Lambayeque; but be that as it may, the judicial power is the only one to qualify the crimes committed and the responsibilities resulting therefrom. The principal party accused, who was the sub-prefect of Lambayeque, Don José Tomas Tello, has been ordered to be tried; and, as you will see by copies Nos. 4 and 6, in the case of an English subject, who asked for indemnity, it was decided that he must make good his rights before the respective tribunal.

This government, in matters of diplomatic claims, is therefore pursuing the principles prescribed by international law—its own fundamental laws and certain resolutions which exist upon such matters.

I now pass with regret to treat of the qualification of de facto given by the Hon. Mr. Seward to the government at present ruling in Peru. However decided the opinion of the American government may be as to the non-recognition of governments springing from revolutions until the legalization of their acts by a congress, there is no ground for that opinion in the present case. General Canseco was by right called by the constitution to govern, after the events which resulted in the fall and expatriation of Pezet. So true is this, that, as you will see by copy No. 7, General Hovey himself, under date of 20th November, 1865, asked Don José Manuel La Puente, then minister of foreign affairs of General Canseco's government, for an audience in which to present in person his credentials to the President of the republic. Owing to the occurrences at the end of that month, the audience did not take place, but the precedents of this recognition does not for that reason any the less exist. The legality of the government being then interrupted by the establishment of a dictatorship, which General Canseco, respecting the constitution, declined to accept, General Hovey, on being invited to recognize Colonel Prado's government, did not do so because the title of the chief of the state had been changed, as appears from the following extract from the Report of Foreign Affairs, presented to the so-called constitutional convention, (congress:)

"On the inauguration of the transitory government of General Canseco, General Alvin P. Hovey, who had arrived to succeed Mr. Robinson as envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, was in Lima. Both had asked for an audience to present their respective letters when the political change of the 28th of November took place. Mr. Hovey then let me know, that notwithstanding his sympathy for the new order of things, from which he hoped much for the prosperity of the country, he had doubts whether his credentials, which were addressed to the President of the Peruvian republic, could be properly presented to the chief of the nation, who had not the title of President, but that of supreme chief; that he had accordingly consulted his government on this point, and that until the latter should decide the question, he must abstain from asking to be recognized in his political character."

It will be easy for the honorable Mr. Seward to note the difference between the two cases. Whilst Colonel Prado destroyed the constitution and arrogated to himself arbitrary powers, General Canseco re-establishes the constitution, and in conformity therewith takes lawful command of the republic solely for the purpose of carrying out the prescriptions of the fundamental law, as but a few days after his return to Lima he orders popular elections.

Mr. Seward, who at a conference had with Mr. Barreda, as appears in the latter's note, number thirty-five, of the 30th May, 1866, expressed "his disgust that recourse should have been had to a dictatorship and the constitutional way been set aside," cannot but agree that the present government of Peru is absolutely not in the same position as those which may with reason be styled governments de facto.

You are authorized to treat with Mr. Seward on the points contained in this note, and to read and give him a copy of same should he desire it.

God preserve you.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, Peru, March 18, 1868.

SIR: The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America near the government of the republic of Peru, has the honor to make known to his excellency the minister of foreign affairs of the government of Peru, that he has, by the last steamer from the north, received an important dispatch from his government, in which he is directed to ask leave to send a copy of the same informally to the de facto government of Peru.

Upon receiving his excellency's reply, informing the undersigned that said copy will be so accepted, the same will be immediately transmitted.

The undersigned has the honor to assure his excellency, the minister of foreign affairs, of his most distinguished consideration.

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

His Excellency Señor Dr. Don JUAN M. POLAR,
Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Government of Peru.

Señor Polar to Mr. Hovey.

[Translation.]

LIMA, March 20, 1868.

The undersigned, minister of foreign affairs of the government of Peru, has the honor to say to his excellency the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America, in answer to his dispatch of the 18th instant, that, without accepting in any manner the name of government de facto, given by the government of the United States to the government of Peru, (which I have the honor of serving,) will be pleased to receive in the manner indicated in your excellency's dispatch, a copy of the important dispatch of Mr. Seward, the contents of which I have already had the satisfaction of learning through the representative of my government in Washington.

The undersigned takes the pleasure of reiterating to his excellency, General Hovey, the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

JUAN M. POLAR

His Excellency General ALVIN P. HOVEY,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States.

Señor Polar to Mr. Hovey.

[Translation.]

LIMA, March 21, 1868.

Inclosed in your excellency's dispatch of to-day, I had the honor of receiving a copy of the dispatch of the honorable Mr. Seward, the one to which your excellency referred in your dispatch of the 18th instant, together with the protest of the foreign consuls, residents in Lambayeque, in reference to the incidents that took place in said province in the beginning of January.

As regards the official document of the honorable Secretary of State of the United States of America, I make known to your excellency that my government has seen in it a new proof of the spirit of justification that always emulates the American government, and that eminent statesman, whose conciliating and sagacious policy cannot but produce propitious results in the relations of both governments and countries.

Of the aforesaid protest, I deem it convenient to inform your excellency that D. Santiago Feely, a British subject, has presented, through the British legation, a document soliciting the suspension from his duties of the sub-prefect of Lambayeque, D. José Tomas Tello, and to be indemnized for damages, &c. I have the honor to inclose an authentic copy of the decree issued to that effect.

I avail this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

JUAN MANUEL POLAR.

His Excellency the ENVOY EXTRAORDINARY AND MINISTER PLENIPOTENTIARY of the United States of America.

Mr. Hovey to Señor Polar.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Lima, Peru, March 22, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note No. 2, dated March 20, 1863, informing me that your excellency, without accepting in any manner the name of government de facto, given by the government of the United States to the government of Peru, will be pleased to receive the copy of the dispatch of the honorable William H. Seward, Secretary of State of the United States, (the contents of which your excellency has already had the satisfaction of learning from the representative of Peru in Washington,) in the manner indicated in my note of the 18th instant.

Your excellency will find inclosed a copy of the dispatch referred to in our communications, together with a copy of the consular protest, signed at Lambayeque.

I beg to assure your excellency that I have not the least desire to raise any questions as to the form of the existing government of Peru. Whether it be a government de facto or de jure, or both, the constitution and laws of Peru, together with the laws of nations, must decide; but your excellency will see by the inclosed dispatch that I have simply complied with my duty, by communicating with what my government is pleased to call a government de facto. If the government of Washington had regarded the present government of Peru as a government de jure, there would have been no necessity for any informal correspondence. The high estimation in which my government holds his excellency Sr. D. J. A. Garcia y Garcia, now the representative of Peru in Washington, together with the ardent desire to cultivate lasting relations of friendship between our respective governments, has been the cause of placing within his knowledge the facts contained in the said dispatch.

Hoping that such confidences may always exist between our respective governments and representatives, I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

His Excellency Sr. Dr. Don JUAN M. POLAR,
Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Government of Peru.

LIMA, February 29, 1868.

It having been ordained by a supreme resolution of the 19th of the present, published in the official bulletin "Peruano," No. 10, that the sub-prefect of the province of Lambayeque, Sn. José Tomas Tello, be suspended from his duties and held for trial, in order to investigate the acts of which he is accused, by repeated complaints made to the government; remaining expedite the right of the applicant to place before the respective courts the accusations held in this solicitude; return this solicitude to the charge d'affaires and consul general of her Britannic Majesty, with the corresponding documents.

Rubric of his excellency,

POLAR.

Mr. Hovey to Señor Puento.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Lima, November 20, 1865.

The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the United States of America to the republic of Peru, has the honor to request that your excellency will appoint a time and place at which he may present his original letter of credence, in person, to his excellency the President of the republic of Peru.

An official copy of said letter of credence is herewith inclosed.

The undersigned has the honor to offer to your excellency the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

ALVIN P. HOVEY.

DR. JOSÉ MANUEL LA PUENTO,
Minister of Foreign Affairs.

Mr. Seward to Señor Garcia.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, April 20, 1868.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a note which bears date on the 14th instant, from Mr. J. A. Garcia y Garcia, minister plenipotentiary of the republic of Peru near this government.

In that note Mr. Garcia expresses an opinion that the war which four allied republics of the Pacific coast heretofore declared against Spain has at last assumed a character of imperfect peace.

In support of this position, Mr. Garcia observes that active hostilities between the belligerents ceased on the 2d of May, 1866, and they have not been renewed since that day. Mr. Garcia further states that it is publicly known that in January last the belligerent governments of Chili and Spain, through their diplomatic agents in London, jointly asked permission of her Majesty's government to remove beyond British jurisdiction armed vessels for the military service of both. Mr. Garcia further mentions that it is also reliably known that Lord Stanley, after mature deliberation, and having consulted with the Crown attorneys, granted the petition of those ministers, notwithstanding a protest was presented by the Peruvian minister, who did not deem it his duty to assent to an arrangement for which he had no authority.

Upon these grounds Mr. Garcia, in the name of Peru, one of the belligerent republics, asks that the government of the United States will now feel itself at liberty to make a declaration to the effect that a state of war is no longer recognized as existing between the republics of Peru, Chili, Ecuador, and Bolivia on the one part, and Spain on the other.

The undersigned has the honor to reply that the government of the United States has no official or authentic information of the proceedings to which Mr. Garcia refers as having taken place at London. This government is, on the other hand, well advised that Spain continues to assert in a collateral correspondence with the United States of Colombia the continued existence of a state of war between herself and the heretofore allied belligerent republics. So far as is known to this government, no transaction has recently occurred within the United States by which occasion has been given to this government to make an authoritative declaration upon the question which Mr. García now submits, namely, whether the state of war between the belligerents ought to be deemed as still continuing, or whether by the intermission of mutual hostilities it is to be deemed as having come to an end. Any declaration which this government might make, under present circumstances, upon that question would be unnecessary and gratuitous, and it might ultimately prove to have been prematurely and erroneously made. The United States, constantly desirous of the establishment of perfect peace and friendly relations between the belligerents, can entertain no question presented by one belligerent without giving a hearing upon the same question to the other belligerent parties. For this reason the undersigned will think it proper to furnish a copy of this note to the Spanish government, and also to the governments of Ecuador and Chili.

The undersigned avails himself of the occasion to offer to Mr. García a renewed assurance of his high consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Señor Don JOSÉ ANTONIO GARCIA Y GARCIA, &c., &c., &c.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, April 27, 1868.

SIR: I transmit for your information a copy of the reply* of this department to a note of Señor Don Ignacio Gomez, the minister plenipotentiary of the republic of Nicaragua, upon the subject of the good offices of the state of Central America towards putting an end to the war between Spain on the one side, and Ecuador, Peru, Bolivia, and Chili on the other.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's note of yesterday, inclosing the reply of your department to a note of Mr. Ignacio Gomez, the Nicaragua plenipotentiary, communicating to your excellency the offer of his government to intercede between the allied republics and Spain to effect a permanent peace.

The sincere and friendly interest which your excellency has ever shown for the conclusion of that war, and which you repeat in your reply, will be highly appreciated by my government.

On renewing to your excellency the assurances of my personal consideration, I subscribe myself your attentive servant,

CLARENDON HOTEL, New York, May 8, 1868.

SIR: I have had the honor of receiving your excellency's note, bearing date 20th ultimo, in which you are pleased to reply to my communication of 14th of same month, stating that any declaration your government might make, under present circumstances, upon the question of neutrality, would be unnecessary and gratuitous, and might ultimately prove to have been prematurely and erroneously made.

Referring to some of the considerations submitted by me, your excellency bases your conclusions upon the ground that the government of the United States has no official or authentic information of the arrangement made in London between Spain and Chili for the removal of armed vessels of both nations, while on the other hand your government knows that Spain continues to assert, in a correspondence with the United States of Colombia, the existence of a state of war between herself and the allied republics. Your excellency also adds that no transaction has recently occurred within the United States, giving occasion to your government to make an authoritative declaration as to whether such state of war ought to be deemed as still continuing, or whether by the intermission of neutral hostilities it is to be deemed as having come to an end.

Although the object of my communication of 14th ultimo is evident, your excellency will permit me to explain it fully. Peru having, as your excellency knows, interests of great value on her coasts, and islands to watch over and protect, was desirous of obtaining some vessels of war with which to augment her standing squadron, without special reference to the interruption in her relations with Spain, and for that purpose found a very favorable occasion in the public offer made by the Secretary of the Navy of this country for the sale of a large number of vessels. That a formal state of war no longer exists between the allied republics and Spain, but, on the contrary, a condition of imperfect peace, has been expressly recognized by other nations which, in their relations with them, have resumed the normal condition of affairs, and this proof would have been enough to persuade Peru that she might freely equip and remove from beyond the jurisdiction of this country such vessels as she may have engaged, had not the profound respect she has ever paid to the laws of other nations, and the particular friendship and high consideration she entertains for the United States, impelled her to seek from your excellency a declaration deliberately and explicitly releasing yourself from all obligations of a neutrality inconsistent with the existing state of affairs before carrying into effect her intention of sending to Peru the vessels which she has acquired, and which she will certainly defer doing until the declaration asked for shall have been made, or the consent of the government of the United States been given. Such is her firm resolution with due regard to the position assumed by the United States, whose strict neutrality commenced twenty months prior to the formal declaration of war, and is still continued two years after the cessation of hostilities. In the years 1865 and 1866, Peru obtained in France and England, with the knowledge of their respective governments, the vessels which she sent for to the United States, but whose neutrality would not permit her to secure, and, in 1868, Chili and Spain have obtained like benefits, undoubtedly because the present situation has been deemed identical with the former.

The example which I had the pleasure of recalling to your excellency's mind, of the conduct observed by the United States and other powers subsequent to the war of independence between Spain and the new American republics, is so analogous to the events of the present time, and its significance so great, that the necessity of putting an immediate stop to the obligations of neutrality in consonance with the de facto cessation of war, can only be ignored by condemning the five nations involved in the Pacific difficulties, and the neutral states to which they are bound by the ties of commerce and industry, to all the restrictions of a state of war which does not exist, and for an indefinite period which an unhappy precedent might prolong to another forty years. When the new American republics triumphed over their adversary, obliging her to abandon the continent of America, in 1824 and 1826, not only were they recognized by the United States, Great Britain, and other nations, but they at once found all markets open to them for the purchase of vessels, armaments, and whatever else they needed, notwithstanding they had made no treaty with Spain, and in spite of the latter's persisting in defending as natural her right to reconquer her lost colonies. The policy which inspired such a course was prudent, humanizing, and productive of great good to civilization, and it is to-day demanded by the same great interests suffering from a similar state of affairs.

Differing from the past, there now exists in support of my opinion the agreement made in London between Spain and Chili for the removal of their war vessels, which clearly and of right annuls the state of war. Your excellency has, nevertheless, not taken that significant event into serious consideration, because, as you are pleased to say, it is not known to your government in an official or authentic manner.

A fact so notorious, the publicity of which commenced in the British Parliament, and which has been repeated by the press throughout the world, would of itself place beyond doubt the truth of its existence; but your excellency has, in the United States legation at London, the sure means of acquiring that information which may also be obtained from the representatives of Spain and Chili in Washington, and of the truth of which I now formally assure your excellency. I permit myself to insist on this point, as it shows that the wishes of my government are in strict conformity with the conduct of Chili and Spain, and that it is due to justice to acknowledge that in seeking to increase their respective navies, which during the past four years have suffered considerably, all are yielding to the same peaceful inspirations, and to the same motives of convenience, and the requirements of their home service.

It would not be just to deem an act of Peru vituperable, which has a precedent in the doings of the other two nations, when they declare that what they do is in the exercise of a perfect right. The acts being identical, it is in the nature of things to qualify them alike; it cannot be wrong for Peru to acquire vessels in the United States, and right and praiseworthy for Spain and Chili to obtain them in England.

The fact of Spain's continuing to assert in a collateral correspondence with the United States of Colombia the existence of a state of war, cannot be a reason to guide the government of the United States in its resolutions. That fact, if it proves anything, shows an open contradiction in the conduct of Spain. To ask from the British government, conjointly with one of the republics allied against her, permission to remove armed vessels, allowable by international law only in time of peace, and to assure another government, in furtherance of different interests, that a state of war still exists, your excellency will permit me to say, is, at least, not logical. Moreover, a state of war cannot be maintained by mere written declarations. Should so absurd a doctrine be recognized, smaller powers unable to carry on an effective war against strong nations, or the latter, should they wish not to waste their time and means in fighting weaker countries, would prefer to carry on a paper war, as being both easier and cheaper than those which are settled by arms, as well as more disastrous to the commerce and industry of the world. For the simple act of hostility, termed a blockade, the law of nations requires the employment of an effective force sufficient to keep the ports closed: with how much more reason, then, should it be claimed, as but just, and as demanded by common sense and the requirements of other countries whose interests suffer so greatly by the ravages of international wars, that all hostilities should also be effective, so that they may be brought to a speedy termination, and not mere written manifestations, which would make wars all the more lasting and disastrous according to the obstinacy of the belligerents, or of the one who had the least to lose in the struggle.

Nor is the London agreement the only act which proves the cessation of a state of war. The acknowledgment of such cessation is also found in public official acts done in the United States by the agents of Spain, acquiesced in by the national authorities, and not objected to by the allied republics. The Spanish war vessel Gerona arrived in this port in the beginning of the present month, and after exchanging salutes with the forts of this harbor, took out her guns, entered a dock, repaired her bottom, painted her hull, and examined her machinery, &c. The iron-clad Tetuan is now en route for this port for like repairs. A manufacturer in the State of New York is manufacturing arms for Spain, and is to-day preparing forty thousand of Bordeaux rifles for the military service of that nation. None of these acts would be lawful if it were deemed that a state of war exists. When the Spanish frigates Carmen and Isabel la Catolica arrived at this port for repairs early in 1866, I announced to your excellency, in compliance with my duty, that war had broken out between the allied republics and Spain, and solicited from you a declaration of neutrality. Your excellency was pleased to make such declaration, and the above-mentioned vessels left New York without doing that for which they came, notwithstanding the statement published in the newspaper, which serves as the organ of Spain here, that the free use of the Brooklyn navy yard had been tendered to them. But now the allies have neither protested, nor has the government of the United States of its own motion prevented an act which international law forbids a belligerent's doing within neutral territory. Thus perfectly have all coincided in their estimate of the actual condition of things, and which it would be necessary to invest with characters it does not possess, to qualify in any other way than that of an imperfect peace.

If for want of any preceding act the government of your excellency has hitherto found no occasion for the declaration which I asked for, as to the suspension of neutrality, the present offers one worthy of all consideration. It will serve not to define past occurrences, but to authorize future doings, permitting Peru to equip and remove from within the jurisdiction of this republic, for her service, two vessels which she will otherwise keep in your waters until she can lawfully send them away without offense to your laws. Peru has no intention of changing the existing condition of affairs in her relations with Spain by renewing hostilities to which she may not be directly provoked, and much less does she propose to attack or invade the colonies of that nation. In completing her fortifications on land, and her naval defenses, she has no special view as to the war with Spain nor any other power. Taught by the events of the past, she merely wishes to supply herself with all the means which a nation should possess, at the present time, in order to make her autonomy and her rights respected, as an independent nation, against any unjust aggressor who may attempt to attack them.

These declarations, which your excellency should accept upon the faith of my government, furnish the most ample security as to the use which it proposes to make of the military elements it now possesses within its own territory, and of those it has subsequently sought in this and other countries.

If, in order to accede to the request which I have thus expressed, it should be necessary to give you a positive promise that the vessels which leave the United States will go direct to Peru, without attacking or in any way molesting those of other nations, without any exception whatever, and without injuring or threatening their possessions, I thereunto pledge the honor of the government of Peru to that of the United States.

I avail myself with great satisfaction of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of the high respect and esteem with which I subscribe myself your excellency's most obedient servant.

JOSE ANTONIO G. Y GARCIA.

CLARENDON HOTEL,
New York, July 28, 1868.

SIR: Complying with your excellency's desire, it affords me pleasure to resume in this communication the subject of which we treated in our interview of the 10th instant, and, for this purpose, to submit to your excellency's impartial judgment a few more considerations which I deem it not amiss to recall to your mind, in view of the importance of the matter which has occasioned this correspondence.

I had the honor to inform your excellency in my note of 8th May last, that Peru had purchased two monitors in this republic, and that in the exercise of what, in the actual condition of her international relations, she deems a perfect right, and with the consent of your excellency's government, she proposes to send those vessels to the Pacific.

Pending the receipt of a definite answer to that communication from the Department of State, I have received especial instructions to carry the aforesaid purpose into effect, the favorable season for the navigation of those vessels being close at hand, and for that purpose, as I explained to your excellency at the interview already referred to, to solicit the previous and explicit consent of the United States government, which is now free to grant such permission, inasmuch as all obligations of neutrality have ceased with the interruption or cessation of hostilities in the war on the Pacific.

The only cause which could now in any way abridge the right of Peru freely to procure naval armaments in this or any other country would be the existence of an effective state of war identical to that in which said republic and Spain were placed by the official declaration made at Lima on the 14th January, 1866, and which terminated on the 2d of May, of the same year, with the signal victory of the Peruvian arms, which compelled the naval forces of Spain not only to abandon the Pacific Ocean, but also to desist from every military operation or any subsequent act of hostility against the four nations allied for the common defense. That situation has remained unchanged for the last two and a half years, and so notable a circumstance would of itself suffice to prove that at present a state of war exists but nominally, and that all other nations, therefore, are authorized to consider it as terminated so long as the belligerents do not renew it by continued and effective acts of war, were there not in addition thereto innumerable other acts of deep significance performed indiscriminately by the various parties engaged in the quarrel, and even by other nations having relations with them, to confirm in an irrefutable manner the truth of that situation.

Your excellency will recollect that on the defeat of the Spanish squadron in the waters of Callao they at first sought neutral ports, and then those of their own country, in various divisions and distinct routes, to repair the disasters of that engagement. Two and a half years should have sufficed for that purpose or to send a new expedition to carry on the campaign, had the Spanish government, taught by its recent experience, not formed the deliberate intention of considering as terminated by that deed of arms all the unhappy projects which had sent its flag to South America. The complete inactivity maintained by Spain since that memorable event, the unequivocal evidence which she has on different occasions given of her desire to settle her differences with the allied republics by means of treaties rather than by arms, her abdication of the rules of war, of which I have spoken to your excellency in previous dispatches, by entering into an agreement at London with one of her adversaries for the removal of armed vessels of both nations from British ship-yards, the use which she officially asked and obtained of both private and naval docks and ship-yards in the United States, in which to repair the frigate Gerona and the iron-clad Tetuan, restoring their offensive powers and consequently fitting them for the services and fatigues of a campaign, acts in open contradiction to the principles of international law, and which your excellency's government would certainly not have permitted had Spain recognized the existence of an effectual state of war between herself and the allies of the Pacific, and, finally, the respect paid by her vessels of war, at present stationed on the coasts of Colombia, to the flag of one of the allied republics, under which two sailing vessels are now not only passing them almost daily, but on one occasion, while engaged in matters of commerce, received assistance from the said Spanish steamers, having been towed by them; all these confirm the belief that in abandoning active hostilities, Spain, who was the aggressor, has renounced the rights of an effectual state of war, and consequently relieved all other nations from the obligations of a neutrality which, under existing circumstances, is purposeless.

That the allied republics, comprehending the position in which Spain was placed by the battles and obstacles she encountered in the Pacific, have accepted her withdrawal, and the attitude at present maintained by her, as an implicit desistance from war, is confirmed by numerous acts. To them the situation is plain; war exists in principle, and so long as a solemn treaty of peace is not entered into may be renewed at any moment; but de facto it has ceased, and all of them respect the actual condition of affairs in consideration of their true interests and of the upright intentions which animate them. Thus, Chili entered into the agreement at London, already commented on by me, took out two iron-clad corvettes in May last, and is now building a monitor at the same place. The President of that republic, in his last message to the national congress, states that the extraordinary powers conferred upon him to carry on the war with Spain are now no longer necessary, and asks that they may be annulled, inasmuch as that war has ceased in fact, and there is no reason to fear its renewal. Animated by the same conviction, that government, with the Peruvian, have dissolved the allied squadron, and both countries have suppressed the command in general, and the naval divisions of a state of war, and their vessels have returned to their ordinary stations. Nothing of this would have occurred, especially when it would have been so easy for them with their iron-clads to attack and destroy the wooden vessels which Spain has at the Philippines and on the eastern coast of South America, as also to prey upon Spanish commerce by means of privateers. Nor would the return of the exiled Spaniards to the territory of those republics have been allowed had the actual condition of affairs been otherwise considered by them, and were they not animated with the sincere desire to alter it in no way on their part unless provoked thereto by new aggressions, or unless unhappy causes should occur to render it unavoidable.

The situation created by the nature and incidents of the war, and by the temporary difficulties which have hitherto prevented an understanding by which to arrive at a solution of this question, constitutes an anomalous state which, in principle, is evidently one of war for the belligerents, although it be in fact an uncovenanted truce or a de facto peace, which they alone have the right to change into a new war by the simple renewal of hostilities and prior notification thereof; but so long as this does not take place, all authorities on the law of nations restore to other states, in view of the existing order of affairs, full liberty to exercise all those rights which are abridged or limited by an actual war.

Hautefeuille's opinion, by its precision and truth, is decisive on this point. "The duties," he says, "imposed on neutral nations by a state of war, refer expressly and essentially to that state. Whenever, for any reason, this ceases, although it be but temporarily, the duties of neutrals likewise cease, and peace, so far as they are concerned, is perfectly re-established during the suspension of arms. They then recover all rights which had been modified by war, and may exercise them during the time fixed for the duration of the truce, if such term has been fixed by agreement, or until the renewal of hostilities shall have been officially notified to them, if the suspension of arms has been indefinite."

On the other hand, the celebration of treaties is not an essential condition of peace. War may terminate by the mere suspension of all acts of force, and this offers to neutrals the same guarantees and assures to them the same rights which they could derive from the stipulation of an express covenant. Pinheiro-Ferreira, although he does not elucidate this doctrine, recognizes it in these words: "It is seldom that war terminates with the mere cessation of hostilities. There is ordinarily a covenant, more or less express, which constitutes the treaty of peace." Heffter, a very respectable authority among writers of international law, puts forth this doctrine: "That belligerents are not obliged to put an end to hostilities by means of formal conventions, although custom and expediency may counsel such proceeding;" and he adds, "they may, on the contrary, by a sort of tacit agreement, suspend hostilities and re-establish reciprocal relations of friendship, in which case no third power is allowed to act as if hostilities were continued."

"The statu quo accepted by the belligerents on the suspension of hostilities will naturally serve, in such a case, as the basis for the re-establishment of the relations of peace."

This opinion is corroborated by the example, given by Von Steck, of the war between Sweden and Poland, which terminated de facto with the cessation of hostilities in 1716, although the de jure restoration of peace was not recognized until ten years later, by letters mutually exchanged between the sovereigns of both countries. The prolonged and bloody struggles between Spain and the new American republics, although decided on many a battle-field between 1809 and 1826, have only been slowly and gradually settled by written treaties during the course of forty years, and two of said republics are this day, after the expiration of half a century, still in a state of de facto or imperfect peace, never having settled by treaty the condition of their relations with the mother country. The war entered into under the name of Italian unity, between that kingdom and the Pontifical States, in which the former by force of arms took possession of some important provinces of the Holy See, has, notwithstanding the lapse of years, never been brought to a close by any treaty between the sovereigns of the two nations; the ravages of the invasion ceased by means of treaties celebrated with a third power clothed with the protectorate of those states. Lastly, the invasion of Mexico by the joint armies of England, Spain, and France, and the persistent intervention of the latter in the internal affairs of that republic, present the most decisive example in confirmation of the principle which I have laid before your excellency. Those doings gave rise to a formal and positive state of war between Mexico and the three nations aforementioned, which was recognized by the United States as well as by other impartial governments, and which imposed upon them the duties consequent to that situation. The contest terminated by the withdrawal of some of the invaders, and the expulsion of the others. No treaty has been celebrated between the late belligerents; the interruption of all official intercourse between them still exists, and, notwithstanding this, the war is considered as de facto terminated, and all obstacles, political, commercial, and otherwise, incident to that abnormal state of affairs, have been voluntarily removed by the United States, as also by all other nations similarly situated.

The actual state of affairs, when notoriously established, is the only rule by which, in view of a strife between two or more nations, to define the position which of right belongs to non-belligerent powers. It is the only possible guide—the only legitimate one—when treating of so sad and disastrous an event as war. Those belligerents which, from impotency, exhaustion, or for any other reason, cannot or do not wish to continue hostilities, have no right to impose upon other nations, to the interests, the restrictions and burdens of a situation which they themselves have abandoned.

The contrary doctrine would give a nominal or paper war, so far as neutrals were concerned, all the rigors of a struggle in which victory is purchased with the blood of the belligerents. But, fortunately, this is not the case. Common reason, the law of nations, and the practise of all enlightened governments have marked out a very clear line of conduct for neutrals. Whenever a political or military act is evident, they have the right to proclaim it so, and to act accordingly; the rule of their action depends therefore upon the doings or in the attitude of the belligerents. To recognize a fact is but to declare the truth as it exists, and this is not only a right but an imperative duty, which on the other hand cannot in the least affect the position nor the rights of the disagreeing parties.

The annals of diplomacy furnish striking examples, which by analogy completely illustrate the present case. Queen Elizabeth recognized the independence of the Netherlands, who revolted against Spain in the sixteenth century, and England entered into a treaty in 1585 with the United Provinces, in spite of the protests of Spain, upon the ground, aside from the reasons of convenience, that the independence of said provinces was an accomplished fact.

In answer to the representations made by England against the recognition of the independence of the United States by France, the latter, among other considerations, stated "that her declaration to the court of London, dated 14th of March, 1778, concerning that recognition, was based on the unanswerable fact that the Americans were in possession of their independence when the treaties of alliance and commerce were concluded on the 6th of February, 1778, and that according to the equally unanswerable doctrines of public law, that fact was sufficient to justify the King's entering into his engagements without examining the question of the legality of that independence." "That is sufficient for his Majesty's justification that the colonies, which by their population and the extent of their territory formed a considerable nation, had established their independence, not only by solemn declaration but also in fact, and that they had maintained it against all the efforts of England, and such was the position of the United States when the King negotiated with them."

Speaking of the desolating and unfruitful war maintained by Spain against her former colonies in America, and initiating the recognition of their sovereignty, the President, James Monroe, in a special message to the Congress of the United States, dated 8th March, 1822, said as follows:

For the last three years the government of Spain has not sent a single corps of troops to any part of that country, nor is there any reason to believe it will send any in future. Thus it is manifest that all those provinces are not only in the full enjoyment of their independence, but, considering the state of the war and other circumstances, that there is not the most remote prospect of their being deprived of it.

When we regard, then, the great length of time which this war has been prosecuted, the complete success which has attended it in favor of the provinces, the present condition of the parties, and the utter inability of Spain to produce any change in it, we are compelled to conclude that its fate is settled, and that the provinces which have declared their independence, and are in the enjoyment of it, ought to be recognized.

In proposing this measure, it is not contemplated to change thereby, in the slightest manner, our friendly relations with either of the parties, but to observe in all respects, as heretofore, should the war be continued, the most perfect neutrality between them. * * * The measure is proposed under a thorough conviction that it is in strict accord with the law of nations; that it is just and right to the parties; and that the United States owe it to their station and character in the world, as well as to their essential interests, to adopt it.

The Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, through Mr. Russell, presented to that same Congress, on the 19th of March, a very luminous report which, among other doctrines, contained the following:

The political right of this nation (United States) to acknowledge their independence, without offending others, does not depend on its justice, but on its actual establishment. To justify such a recognition by us, it is necessary only to show, as is already sufficiently shown, that the people of Spanish America are, within their respective limits, exclusively sovereign, and thus in fact independent. * * * Whatever may be the policy of Spain, however, in respect to her former American colonies, our recognition of their independence can neither affect her rights nor impair her means in the accomplishment of that policy. We cannot for this body be justly accused of aiding in the attainment of an independence which has already been established without our assistance. Besides, our recognition must necessarily be co-existent with the fact on which it is founded and cannot survive it. While the nations of Spanish America are actually independent, it is simply to speak the truth to acknowledge them to be so. * * Should Spain, contrary to her avowed principles and acknowledged interests, renew the war for the conquest of South America we shall indeed regret it; but we shall observe, as we have done between the independent parties, an honest and strict neutrality. But, on the other hand, should Spain, faithful to her own glory and prosperity, consent that her offspring in the New World should enjoy the right of self-government equally with their brethren in the Old, we shall sincerely rejoice; and we shall cherish with equal satisfaction, and cultivate with equal assiduity, the friendship of regenerated Spain and of emancipated America.

There is, therefore, in the matter of which I treat, the most complete harmony between the recognized rules of the law of nations and the practices observed by the most cultivated peoples between the suggestions of an enlightened reason and the precedents which the traditional policy of numerous governments have converted into precepts of positive right. That doctrine may be summed up in these two principles: a war may terminate not only by means of treaties, but also de facto by the cessation of hostilities, and, in the latter case, although the belligerents have the right to renew it, all restrictions and the obligations of neutrality cease, who are de facto restored to the relations of a state of peace with the former, so long as the situation is not changed by formal and effective acts of force previously announced to other nations; the actual recognized state of affairs, be it in treating of the cessation of a war, or the struggles of a people seeking to achieve or recover their independence, or, finally, of any international situation not clearly established by express treaties, fully and legitimately authorizes all other nations at once to resume every right which may have been abridged by war, without, in so doing, in any manner qualifying the motives or controverted rights of the belligerents.

The application of these rules, which your excellency will find in conformity with the principles of your government and the laws of this great nation, and in harmony with the just demands of the law of nations and universal interests, is obvious and conclusive in the present position of the United States with regard to the interrupted or de facto terminated war between Spain and the allied republics, and decides in a manner satisfactory both to your excellency's government and to that which I have the honor of representing, the pending question of the speedy departure for the Pacific of the Peruvian monitors, at present lying in the port of New Orleans. I believe myself authorized to trust that your excellency, giving immediate attention to this matter, will be pleased to decide it in the favorable manner warranted as well by the incontrovertible right of my government to solicit permission to take out those vessels, as by that of the United States to grant it.

The foregoing would undoubtedly suffice for the end in view, when addressing an upright and enlightened government, such as that of your excellency's; but the government of Peru voluntarily and deliberately desires to offer to yours the most perfect security as to the rectitude of its intentions in sending those vessels to the coasts of the republic, and for that purpose has instructed me to reiterate expressly in its name, to the United States government, the formal promise that the monitors will leave for the Pacific without attacking or in any way molesting any vessels or possessions of Spain, and without committing any act of hostility, directly or indirectly, against the flag of that nation, either at sea or on land, to which they may not be provoked. The honor of the Peruvian government, I again repeat on this occasion, guarantees to your excellency the strict fulfillment of this solemn promise.

Trusting that this dispatch, which the gravity and great importance of the matter have made too long, will merit the favorable reception which my government has well-founded reasons for expecting will be given by that of your excellency's to the subject which has occasioned it, I have the honor of subscribing myself, with the highest consideration, your excellency's most humble and obedient servant,

JOSE ANTONIO G. Y GARCIA.

WASHINGTON, September 7, 1868.

MR. SECRETARY: I am pleased to inform you that his excellency Don José Balta assumed the presidency of Peru on the 2d of August last, constitutionally elected to that important position by the national will, and that he has formed his cabinet of the following persons: Doctor Don Pedro Galvez, president of the council of ministers, minister of government, police, and public works; Doctor Don José Antonio Barenchea, minister of foreign affairs; Doctor Don Luciano Benjamin Cisneros, minister of justice, public instruction, beneficence, and worship; Colonel Don Juan Francisco Balta, minister of war and marine; and Doctor Don Francisco Garcia Calderon, minister of finance and commerce.

The new government of Peru is formed of men who are distinguished for their patriotism and intelligence, and I can assure you that the international policy of the new administration will continue to be just and courteous in its relations with other governments; and that the nation which I have the honor to represent will make it a special duty to cultivate and strengthen its present friendliness with the government of the United States.

I repeat the assurance of my distinguished consideration,

JOSE ANTONIO G. Y GARCIA.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Señor Garcia.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, September 8, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 7th instant, in which you inform me that his excellency Don José Balta assumed the presidency of Peru on the 2d of August last, having been constitutionally elected to that important position by the national will. By dispatches received at this department, I have been advised that Mr. Hovey, United States minister to that republic, having been so directed, already formally recognized the new government. His proceedings have been approved.

I am glad to learn that peace is now prevailing in Peru, and that the new administration seems to be well established. I sincerely trust that that interesting and friendly republic may continue to enjoy the benefits of internal tranquillity and wise administration.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my high consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Señor Don JOSÉ ANTONIO GARCIA Y GARCIA, &c., &c., &c.

Señor Garcia to Mr. Seward.

CLARENDON HOTEL,
New York, September 10, 1868.

SIR: Having been honored by your excellency at our interview of the 8th instant with the official notification that Peru is at liberty to remove her vessels of war from within the jurisdiction of the United States without restrictions or conditions of any kind, I deem it my duty to anticipate the expression of the high esteem and satisfaction with which my government will receive this new proof of consideration which the United States government has been pleased to extend to it, by thus giving deserved attention to the important case which was the object of my endeavors with your excellency, and by deciding it in accordance with the rights of Peru. Great is the honor cast upon your excellency's government by this transcendental act, destined as it is, from its nature, to strengthen the authority of really sound principles of the law of nations, and to invigorate and give renewed impulse to those valuable commercial and industrial interests of the American people which a vague and uncertain situation was seriously compromising.

In accordance with your excellency's suggestion, I conferred on the same day, the 8th instant, with the Hon. Secretary of the Treasury and with the Assistant Secretary of the Navy as to the instructions to be communicated to the collector of customs and to the commanding officers of the navy yard and forts of New Orleans, and I had the satisfaction of learning the tenor of the orders sent to those officials.

Tendering to your excellency on this occasion the assurances of my personal gratitude, I have the honor of subscribing myself your excellency's most obedient servant,

J. A. GARCIA Y GARCIA.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Señor Garcia to Mr. Seward.

CLARENDON HOTEL, New York, October 12, 1868.

SIR: In compliance with your excellency's wishes, I commit to this dispatch the information which, by express order of my government, I had the honor of communicating to your excellency at our interview of the 8th instant.

Your excellency is acquainted with the causes of various kinds which have until now delayed an agreement on the part of the allied republics of the Pacific, with regard to the various propositions of meditation and good offices, which mutual friends of the belligerent governments, for the sake of peace, and animated by a feeling of deference and special kindness, have been pleased to tender. Those causes being removed, and the initiatory having been taken by Ecuador, by sending her plenipotentiary Señor Antonio Flores on a special mission to Lima for the purpose of seeking a way for the re-establishment of commercial relations with Spain, two of the allied governments, those of Peru and Ecuador, have freely and explicitly accepted the opening of negotiations suggested by your excellency's note, bearing date the 27th of March last.

The representative of Bolivia has also joined in that action, subject to the final decision of his government, and there is no reason for doubting that Chili will shortly accede to the views of the majority of her allies. To this end Peru has addressed a special communication to her government, and the plenipotentiary of Ecuador was to start immediately for Santiago.

The annexed protocol of the conference held in Lima on the first day of the month of September last, by the diplomatic representatives of the four allied republics, will inform your excellency, in a correct manner, of the course of this negotiation and the favorable aspect which it bears for the plan proposed by your excellency.

I have the honor of subscribing myself, with the highest consideration, your excellency's most obedient servant,

J. A. GARCIA Y GARCIA.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Protocol of the conference held September 1, 1868.

There met in the office of the minister of foreign affairs of Peru, at 2 o'clock p. m., the undersigned, José Antonio Barrenechea, minister of foreign affairs, Juan de la Cruz Benavente, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Bolivia, Antonio Flores, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Ecuador, and Joaquin Godoy, chargé d'affaires of Chili. After the reading of the protocol of the conference of 19th August last, the minister of foreign affairs called to mind the fact that the adjourned meeting which was to have been held on the 22d of that month did not take place, owing to the delicate attention of Mr. Benavente, who, through his secretary, had expressed his opinion that he did not think it becoming to hold the conference at a time when the government had just received news of the destruction occasioned by the late earthquake, and was preparing to remedy the evil so far as possible.

He then went on to explain that the object of this meeting was to discuss the propriety of giving an answer to the proposal of mediation made by the government of the United States.

The minister plenipotentiary of Ecuador observed that the undersigned should endeavor to come to an understanding as to the necessity of putting an end to the actual condition of our relations with Spain, and as to the means to be employed for that purpose, and that the protocol of the conference held by him with his excellency Mr. Barrenechea on the 18th of August might be adopted as the starting point for the discussion.

This suggestion having been accepted by Mr. Barrenechea, he read the protocol, and inquired what, in the opinion of the gentlemen present, was the way of attaining the end proposed, all present having recognized the necessity thereof.

Mr. Flores replied that his determination to accept, in behalf of the government of Ecuador, whatever way the other allies might deem proper, was already known.

Mr. Godoy stated that his government's opinion is expressed in the note of 26th of March, addressed to that of Peru, giving its reasons for preferring the proposition for an indefinite truce made by France and England, to that of the United States for mediation, which was then pending and referred to in a communication of Mr. Kilpatrick, annexed to the note of 26th March; that before giving a definite reply to the mediatory powers, it was necessary for the allies to communicate with each other the conclusions they might have arrived at as to the various propositions for an arrangement, in order to come to some determination; that the government of Chili, with that object in view, had made a frank exposition of its opinion and of the grounds upon which it was based; that the government of Bolivia, duly appreciating the reasons given, had expressed itself as agreeing in opinion with the government of Chili; that he thought the government of Ecuador, in view of its determination to accede to whatever the other allies might resolve, would not opine differently; and that, consequently, the agreement might be unanimous, and an indefinite truce decisively resolved upon, if the government of Peru had not reasons for thinking in a different manner.

Mr. Flores remarked that his government did not wish to stand in the way of any resolution of the allied governments, and would subscribe to any agreement, provided it be conducive to the re-establishment of commercial relations; but that he had, from his very first conference, stated in a positive manner that Ecuador, for her part, explicitly accepted the American mediation.

Mr. Barranechea, accepting the manner in which the honorable Mr. Godoy had stated the question, recapitulated the different proposals of mediation made in consequence of the Spanish question, as follows: In the year 1866 the French and English governments tendered their good offices, which were accepted on principle by the government of Chili; but those governments having presented bases for an agreement which were inadmissible, the government of Chili, in the name of the allies, declared them unacceptable. Another negotiation of good offices, initiated before that of France and England, by the United States, and for which the bases were not even framed, also fell through. Subsequently the government of the United States presented to the allies, as the bases of a new mediation, those agreed upon on the 17th of December, 1866, by the House of Representatives. But even before the formalizing of those bases, the government of Peru, which had known the general terms which the announced new mediation of the United States would contain, ever since November, had said to its representative at Washington that it unreservedly accepted the proposal of that government. This resolution of Peru having been communicated to her allies, was accepted by Bolivia, and, with a modification as to the choice of the arbiter, by Ecuador. But the government of Chili did not deem it well to accept this proposition without certain previous conditions, which, having been fixed with the concurrence of Peru, were made known by the government of Chili to the American minister at Santiago. According to Mr. Kilpatrick's note, which was annexed to that of 26th March, referred to by the honorable Mr. Godoy, those modifications have not been accepted by Spain, which puts an end to that negotiation.

Mr. Barranechea then read the new proposition of the United States, contained in a circular note of Mr. Seward to the American diplomatic agents in the belligerent countries, and which consists in proposing an armistice, and this being accepted, the appointment by those nations of plenipotentiaries, to meet at Washington, in order to negotiate a positive peace.

He then proceeded to expound the antecedents of the indefinite truce, which, from the first, was accepted neither by Peru nor Bolivia, and touching which nothing was said by Ecuador. He added that so long a time had elapsed since the proposition was made, it ought to be considered as abandoned, and this seemed to him true, in view of a dispatch from the minister of foreign affairs of France to Mr. Vion, which the latter had shown to him confidentially, wherein it was said that the government of that empire would have satisfaction in seeing the proposition of the United States accepted. To recur now to the indefinite truce might, therefore, be looked upon as an inopportune suggestion, besides which the truce could not be looked upon as a true solution of the question.

He terminated, stating that, if it be deemed indispensable to put a stop to the actual situation, in his opinion, it should be done by accepting the American mediation. Mr. Flores insisted in his government's desire to have the situation defined, and said that the government of Chili had been the first to express the same wish.

Mr. Barranechea said that the government of Peru, although it had no reasons for hurrying a solution, would not place itself in opposition to its allies in this particular.

Mr. Godoy, replying to what his excellency Mr. Barranechea had said with reference to the truce, offered the following considerations: The government of Chili has no greater interest than any other of the belligerents in putting a stop to the actual situation, but believes that it is manifestly proper to define that situation, in order to furnish commerce with the guarantees and security which she requires for her development and prosperity; the idea of a truce could not be considered as abandoned by the mediatorial powers which had proposed it, but on the contrary, without an express act to that effect, ought to be held as still pending. If it be certain that a long time has elapsed since it was proposed, this fact is but one more reason showing the necessity of answering the proposition which contained it. Mr. de Moustier's dispatch proves no such abandonment, but his desire, above all, that the existing situation should cease. Therefore, any negotiations tending to accept the truce would in no event have the appearance of an inopportune suggestion or be unseemly on the part of the allies. The reverse of what occurs with the proposition for an indefinite truce happens to the peace proposition; the latter could not be accepted without first establishing the conditions already prefixed by the government of Chili, and not accepted by the government of Spain, as appears by the dispatch already referred to of Mr. Kilpatrick, which makes it supposable that Spain declines to discuss them, perchance because she deems it incompatible with her dignity to initiate pacific propositions; and what Spain, the provoker of the war, considers indecorous perchance, could illly appear decorous to the allies who were the provoked. On the other hand, it would be more than difficult to frame proposals for peace which, our honor and interests being consulted, would at the same time be acceptable to Spain. An indefinite truce differs from peace, in that it demands no conditions, explanations, or reservations; to obtain that object no discussion whatever is necessary; except it, and everything is said, nothing remains to be added; it has all the advantages offered by peace with none of its inconveniences. For these and other reasons the government of Chili has been in favor of a truce, and would accept the same from any of the mediatorial governments.

Mr. Godoy added to the foregoing that whatever be the course adopted, whether peace, a truce, or a continuation of the existing state of affairs, the most important thing, that which is indispensable before all else, is to establish a uniformity of views among the allies in order that their deliberations may weigh with the mediatorial powers.

Mr. Flores observed that no end could be reached in the present conferences, since Mr. Godoy had already stated that he lacked powers to modify his government's opinion, and from which that of Peru dissented. That to arrive at any agreement it would be necessary that all should be clothed with full power.

Mr. Godoy answered that he had simply exposed his government's opinion, which opinion was not unknown to any of the allies, and which had been expressly accepted by one of them; that the view expressed by his government, far from being any obstacle to the attainment of the wished-for result, did nothing more than excite to it; that justly seeking the decision of its allies, the government of Chili had solicited their judgment, and commenced by expressing its own without any reservation; but that not for this did it pretend to exclude different views, nor to avoid the discussion of the opinions which might be presented, however divergent they might be.

In order properly to fix the terms and spirit of the American proposition, Mr. Barranecchia read it anew, and called attention to the fact that it contains two parts—an armistice, and, this being accepted, a meeting of plenipotentiaries to negotiate a peace, without any mention of arbitration, which was the cause of the failure of the previous proposition, and the government of the United States limiting itself, in case its counsels should be asked, to make impartial efforts to procure due attention to the claims of all parties.

Mr. Benavente remarked that all were agreed as to the end, and for the purpose of reaching the same unanimity as to the means, he would like to know what course the government of Peru preferred.

Mr. Barranecchia said that it would prefer to answer, accepting the American mediation, and that he would give its reasons therefor.

Mr. Benavente compared both propositions, and after duly considering them in view of all the antecedents, he said that the opinion of the government of Chili, which had been accepted by that of Bolivia, recommended itself by the practical sense in which it was conceived; that Chili and Bolivia wished to reach the only possible point in the actual state of the Spanish question, and that they had therefore accepted the "indefinite truce;" that that combination which conciliates the exigencies of the commerce of the belligerents, and all the respect due by the allies to neutral interests, would leave to the action of time the lessening of those passions which the fruitless war had created for the government of Spain, and deferred the celebration of a treaty of peace for the restoration of diplomatic relations to another time and for other men, who, free from every susceptibility, would end by recognizing that the demands of Castilian dignity are only reconcilable with the strict justice due by the Spanish government to the Pacific alliance; that, nevertheless, and agreeably to what the honorable Mr. Godoy had said, he was very desirous of arriving at a common agreement, and that for a purpose so worthy of the good relations of the allies, he would listen with attention to the reasons which the honorable Mr. Barranecchia had offered to give.

After calling attention to the fact that the government of the United States had foreseen the inconveniences pointed out by his excellency Mr. Benavente, and that said government had doubtless framed the proposition in the terms which are known in order to avoid the same, Mr. Barranecchia stated the reasons which exist for paying consideration to that government whose solicitude has never changed since the beginning of the war. Those reasons are contained in the note of 4th of November, 1866, which Mr. Barranecchia read, and addressed by him on that date as sub-secretary of foreign affairs, to Señor Don José Pardo, the then minister of Peru in Santiago, saying to him, first, that scarcely had hostilities between Chili and Spain broken out, when the American government, through its representative in Santiago, offered its good offices and even its arbitration to Chili, which suggestion was repeated in Washington to Mr. Asta Buruaga; second, that under date of 24th May of the aforesaid year, the American minister, General Hovey, renewed the offer of mediation on the part of his government, which offer he was authorized to make before his government was aware of the triumph of the 2d of May, and to which Peru replied that it highly esteemed the offer, and would listen with the greatest deference to any propositions which the President of the United States might think proper to make for the purpose of attaining an honorable and fair peace; third, that, finally, the American government initiated the negotiation already spoken of, on the bases proposed by the House of Representatives.

Mr. Barranecchia added, that not to accept the mediation now under discussion would be to cast a slight on the government of the United States as unfounded as it would be inopportune; that, moreover, whilst Peru had, as already shown, manifested itself in favor of the American mediation, it had been opposed to the truce, and knew no reason for changing its opinion now; whilst Chili is free to accept the pending proposition, inasmuch as it does not contain the arbitration clause, and facilitates the celebration of an armistice or truce, to which Chili is inclined.

Mr. Godoy observed that the proposition of the United States does not, in his judgment, offer that indefinite truce which Chili had favored, but only an armistice or momentary truce, as a preliminary step, to be followed at once by negotiations for peace, concerning which he had already given his views. He added that his government, after learning the contents of Mr. Seward's circular, had found no plausible grounds for changing its opinion, as is seen by the answer which it gave to the dispatch of the government of Peru transmitting said circular to the Chilean; that, besides, it seemed to him that the armistice proposed by the government of the United States as the first step, if not followed at once by peace, would leave us in our present position, and we should have advanced nothing.

Mr. Benavente said that the reasons which he had just heard had modified his opinions, and that without contradicting himself, he believed preference should be given to the American proposition, if for no other grounds than that of deference to the especial considerations mentioned by his excellency Mr. Barrenechea; that by accepting that proposition, with the explanation that the "armistice" shall have the formal character of an indefinite truce, the difference between this and the English and French proposition would be a mere accident; that the former leads at once to the negotiations of peace, and the latter defers them to the lapse of time; that although he entertained the unfortunate conviction that Spain would not accept the conditions presented by the alliance for the adjustment of peace, that noble end was embraced in the American proposition, and perhaps it might not be in accord with the honorable aspirations of the allies not to show some deference in such a case, sure as they are of their right and of their power; that at all events the situation would only be defined in its commercial aspect, and if the peace negotiations should be frustrated by new refusals on the part of Spain to obey the mandates of her own decorum and duty, the world would have another proof of such aberration, which would increase the sympathy with which it already honors the pacific alliance, whose moderation is proportionate to the valor with which it conquered its unjust aggressor; that he promised, himself, that his government, notwithstanding it had accepted the opinion expressed by Chili, would give all its attention to this conference, and he hoped the cabinet of Santiago would not be less complacent in estimating it in its real importance, for the purpose of establishing the necessary uniformity between the two nations principally interested.

Mr. Flores comparing the two propositions, found that of the United States decidedly the most advantageous, inasmuch as it at once established the truce, and did not exclude peace negotiations, which, in his opinion, ought not to be rejected a priori. He noted that a favoring of the American mediation were the contents of Mr. de Moustier's dispatch.

Messrs. Barrenechea, Benavente, and Flores being thus agreed as to the advantages offered by the proposition of the United States, and Mr. Godoy insisting on his government's reasons for preferring the indefinite truce, Mr. Flores suggested the necessity of having a conference of plenipotentiaries to decide definitively as to the course to be adopted; that he, for his part, was invested with full powers for every kind of arrangement.

Mr. Benavente said, that notwithstanding his character of plenipotentiary, the laws of Bolivia would not allow him to make any arrangement not ad referendum, and that consequently he must first ask instructions from his government.

Mr. Godoy promised to send Mr. Flores suggestion to his government. He repeated that the government of Chili in order to take a decided stand, had endeavored to obtain the opinion of her allies; that already having Bolivia's, and as Mr. Flores was to make known to it that of Ecuador, his government only needed that of Peru; therefore if Mr. Barrenechea would be pleased to give an answer to the dispatch before alluded to of 26th March last, a great step would be taken towards the attainment of the desired end.

Mr. Barrenechea promised the honorable chargé d'affaires of Chili to answer the note of 26th of March in conformity with the views just expressed by him.

With what has been set forth the conference terminated, of which the present protocol has been made in four copies of like tenor, signed by the undersigned, and sealed with their respective seals.

NEW YORK, November 24, 1868.

Yesterday I addressed the following telegram to the Secretary of the Treasury: "Steamer Havana, chartered by me as tender to the Peruvian monitors, has been detained by direction of Collector Smith at the moment of sailing for New Orleans. I request your orders for her liberation at once."

Having received no answer yet, and the delay being very prejudicial to the interest of my government, I beg to call your attention to this matter, and request your assistance. I have reason to believe this is the proceeding of one who has personal enmity to my government, and has represented this vessel as destined on a filibustering expedition, but you know her destination, and consequently that charge is false and malicious.

Peruvian monitors Alakualapa and Manco Copao left this port the 6th instant.

Two Spanish men-of-war are cruising off Balize, and is reported in yesterday's newspaper, there are two iron-clads under same flag watching out. As I have pledged the honor of my government not to molest in any way the monitors, the Spanish flag at sea or on land, I deem it of my duty to anticipate to you, that if the presence of said Spanish vessels is intended to provoke or attack our monitors, the responsibility of consequences may happen if hostilities are resumed in this occasion, cannot befall upon Peru. NEW ORLEANS, December 18, 1868.

After chartering steamer Havana, from New York to Southwest Pass, I purchased her under conditions to be delivered at last port to Peruvian navy officers.

After the transfer according to the laws of the country, I sent her former register to New York to be cancelled at the custom-house in the formal way, as I am fully satisfied it has been done. Peruvian colors were hoisted and a navy officer put in command.

I informed, personally, Deputy Collector Gray, that our transport, needing repairs in its engine, was to come up to the city if there was no objection, as none could honestly be opposed.

Since the transport arrived here many questions have been moved by direction of Collector Fuller. A custom-house officer was sent on board this morning, notwithstanding the official colors hoisted by the transport, and after full explanation confidentially given to the collector yesterday, to my great surprise. I am confidentially informed in this moment, 5 p. m., that there is the intention to attempt the seizure of the vessel to-morrow morning. I submit to you this urgent case that may prove so injurious to the honor, the rights, and interests of Peru, and which, therefore, requires the immediate action of your government.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San Salvador, December 22, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 26, November 4, 1867.

Since my last dispatch I have spent some time at the annual fairs held in different parts of the republic, chiefly for the sale of indigo and the purchase of foreign merchandise.

The principal fair this year, as for many years past, was at San Miguel, in the eastern department, a town of some fifteen to twenty thousand inhabitants. Before the introduction of our steamer line connecting with Panama, this fair was of great importance, and collected its tens of thousands of people from this, and the neighboring republics. Now, however, the regularity and certainty of communication with other countries have lessened its value and greatly diminished its trade. At the late fair, however, about half the indigo crop was brought in by the large and small producers, in packages of all sizes and qualities, the best selling at one dollar the pound, and the poorest as low as fifty cents. The concourse of people, though I am told less than in former years, was certainly very great, and the trade in foreign merchandise, I believe, quite satisfactory to the merchants. The country continues perfectly tranquil. The yield of coffee, the crop of which is now being gathered, is reported as unusually abundant.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. S. WILLIAMS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San Salvador, February 6, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 15, of date December 27, 1867.

The regular session of the legislative chambers was opened with the customary ceremonies on the 22d ultimo. The President read his message to the joint convention of the chambers. I inclose herewith pretty copious extracts, both from the message, (marked A,) and from the report of the minister of foreign relations and of public instruction, (marked B,) which may serve to exhibit the progressive condition of the republic, and the earnest disposition of the present administration to improve the material, moral, and educational status of the people. The endeavors made to extend primary education is particularly noticeable and commendable. Hitherto but little has been done in that regard, and the great mass of the rural population, and of the villagers, have been living in profound ignorance of books, and with not a few of the peculiar traits, habits, and modes of life of the aboriginal people of America. Such a population, as bigoted and superstitious as ignorant, furnish ready materials, as the history of these republics shows, for the operations of discontented, revengeful, or interested ambition, and for the evil exercise of venturesome talents, or unscrupulous shrewdness, whether of church or state.

That the present government has been able to awaken a general interest in education, and to do so much to set in motion any liberal system, and that its disposition is so earnest for universal instruction, even to the extent of enforcing attendance upon schools, furnish the most gratifying signs for the future peace and prosperity of the republic, and especially so if we add to these favorable indications the important influences of an increasing demand for labor, and steady employment, consequent upon the many new agricultural enterprises that now engage the attention and enlist the peaceful sympathies and efforts of intelligence and capital.

It is understood that the legislative chambers are almost unanimously in sympathy with the executive government. There would seem, therefore, no probability at present of any serious opposition to the administration of President Dueñas, nor any violent interruption to the admirable progress the public is making in the development of its agricultural riches.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. S. WILLIAMS.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

* * * * *

Peace, the indispensable basis of the progress and well-being of nations, has suffered no change nor molestation with us during the year, and I have reason to believe will not be disturbed for time to come, for it is founded on the justice and equity with which public affairs are administered, and on our convictions and experiences of past misfortunes.

The political institutions are respected and faithfully observed by the executive and other public functionaries, to which circumstance we owe the regularity with which the national powers move in their proper spheres without conflicts; a point of difficulty with all governments which, like ours, are divided into absolute independent prerogative and duties undisturbed by grave political questions, we have been permitted to give our attention to other interests of no less importance—to the regulation of the finances, public instruction, important internal improvements, and to an impulse of all those matters which produce positive benefits to the people. To these topics I shall confine myself in this brief discourse.

The friendly relations which the republic maintains with all the powers of Europe and America have been cultivated with the greatest assiduity, and it is with much satisfaction I have to inform you that no misunderstanding has occurred with any, but, on the contrary, the government has received constant proofs of sympathy and consideration. We have extended our political and commercial relations by the appointment of additional ministers and consuls, which represent us now in almost all foreign countries.

With the adjacent republics the greatest cordiality has been preserved. The compacts which unite us, and the obligations of national vicinage, have been religiously observed.

The ecclesiastical authority has worked in harmony with the civil power, and has contributed with the means it possesses, by its high social position and by its ministry, to preserve order and morality among the people.

The supreme tribunal of justice, and the inferior courts, have labored during your recess with a regularity and independence which have contributed to the conservation of good order.

Higher instruction has made greater progress than in the preceding year. The national college and university are supplied with good teachers, excellent instruments and books, and with whatever is necessary for the better education of the youth. The revenues assigned to this branch have increased, and are now sufficient for the payment of the employés, for repairs of the buildings, and for the purchase of useful objects.

The academies of drawing and painting make additional progress daily.

A considerable expansion has been given to primary education, so that there is now no village, however small, that does not possess its public school regularly provided.

Equal care has been taken for the education of the female sex, and the progress made in the schools for girls is very marked.

REVENUES AND EXPENDITURES.

* * * * *

The total product of the revenues for the fiscal year was $832,150 79, the expenditures, including payments of unconsolidated debt, $745,375, leaving an existing balance of $86,775 15 in the treasury. A comparison of these figures with those of last year show an increased revenue of $48,437 26. There is no foreign debt. The interior debt, which consists of circulating bills at six per cent. interest, reaches the sum of $694,380, having undergone a considerable reduction during the year last past. During the present season the harvests have had a regular augmentation, and commerce a rapid extension. Increased wealth and increased revenues may be expected during the current year. An arrangement has been entered into for the establishment of a bank, which will give much impulse to commercial transactions. Our money currency possesses defects in depreciation from long use, which render its circulation difficult, and the kind known as "clipped money" (Macuquina) should be wholly retired.

The government, through the proper department, will submit the project of a law to provide a remedy.

At the same time will be presented a new tariff-bill to correct the many errors and inaccuracies, and to supply the deficiencies of the existing law.

The public works have been carried forward with activity. The most important roads are kept in good condition, and new wagon roads have been opened, productive of great benefits to commerce and to the people. The work on the national palace continues without interruption. It is of considerable magnitude, and cannot be pressed forward as rapidly as might be desired.

* * * * *

In the department of war many reforms have taken place, and arms and materials have been purchased, which will be detailed in the report of the minister. The store-houses are well provided, and care is taken that they shall be kept prepared at all times for such emergencies as may arise.

The work of recompilation of the laws has been concluded, though not yet inserted into our codes. It will be presented to you for your approbation by the minister of the interior.

The laws, decrees, and orders enacted by the last legislature have been carried into effect.

The respective ministers will submit for your information certain projects for supplying defects in existing legislation, and for other objects of known utility. Your accredited patriotism, and your enlightened intelligence will best instruct you in the line of your high commission, and I invoke the Omnipotent to grant you the requisite success.

SAN SALVADOR, January 22, 1868.

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

During the past year no question has arisen to interrupt tranquillity and good relations with any of the countries of Europe or America.

With the republics of Central America we preserve perfect harmony, and especially with Guatemala, Honduras, and Nicaragua, boundary states of Salvador, our relations have been most cordial and friendly. Our government has endeavored to pursue a line of conduct that could give no cause of complaint to our neighbors, and there has been a corresponding reciprocity on their part.

Under the shelter of this pacific and friendly condition, our commerce with these countries has greatly enlarged, and with intimate commercial relations unimpeded, harmony and fraternity among the respective people have been more and more cemented, local feeling removed, and a community of interests created, all of which is leading to a possible realization of a unification, not in the mode formerly attempted by the unjust, inefficacious, and destructive force of arms, but by those pacific means which are in consonance with justice, humanity, progress, and civilization. With some of the other republics of Spanish origin we maintain friendly relations, and the government has watched with anxiety the progress of deplorable occurrences in several of those states. We cannot be indifferent to the fortunes of these countries, with which we have a community of origin, of religion, of language, and of customs.

The great republic of the north, whose political institutions have served as a model for ours, has always given us proofs of sympathy and friendship. Our legation near the government of Washington continues established, and furnishes to the country important services. It has always been well received by that government.

At the beginning of the past year the President of the United States was pleased to accredit near this government, in the capacity of minister resident, Mr. Alpheus S. Williams, who was received by the President of the republic with all the consideration due to his official character. He continues in this country, discharging his functions in the most perfect accord and good intelligence with the government.

The government of the United States has also established consulates in various commercial places of the republic, to the incumbents of which corresponding accreditation have been given.

With the powers of Europe with which we have treaties no occasion of disagreement has occurred. These treaties have been faithfully observed by both parties.

This government takes care that strangers shall enjoy every class of guaranty to their persons and property, even those with whose respective governments we have no express compacts.

The Italian government has been pleased to accredit to this government a chargé d'affaires, giving the appointment to the Duke of Licignano, with whom the undersigned, under the authority of the President, is about to conclude a treaty of extradition, which will be submitted in due time for your consideration.

The government of her Britannic Majesty, with which our relations are perfectly frank and friendly, has accredited Mr. Edwin Corbett in the quality of consul general and chargé d'affaires.

Both Mr. Corbett and the Duke of Licignano have presented their credentials to the department in my charge, and were cordially received by his excellency the President of the republic.

Our legations in France, England, and Rome continue to the satisfaction of the government, and our relations with those countries remain on a footing of cordiality and good understanding. The government has thought advisable to appoint chargés d'affaires in Italy, Belgium, and Prussia, and has named for those posts Señores Julio Thirion, D'José Maria Torres Caicedo, and D'Adolpho Lindemann, citizens who under all aspects have merited the entire confidence of the government. For the purpose of better attending to the exterior interest of our international affairs, the government has thought it advisable to establish consulates in several commercial places of Europe and America, where the want of this class of employés has made apparent. A separate list of the ministers and consuls will be transmitted.

Such, Señores Representatives, is the actual condition of our foreign relations, which the government has striven to preserve in a satisfactory state by every endeavor compatible with the honor, the interests, and the dignity of the nation, and which policy we see now no reason to change.

A small state is constantly exposed to find itself involved in unpleasant and grave questions with other countries, but this government recognizes as a fact that its very weakness may serve as a condition of guaranty and security when it does all in its power to mark its policy with the stamp of good faith and of integrity.

PUBLIC INSTRUCTION.

Public instruction, necessary and useful to all countries and in all times, is indispensable in a state which, like ours, calls through its institutions all citizens to take part in the direction of its public affairs. A people exercising an act of sovereignty of the highest importance, that of choosing its agents selected from among all classes of society, without other essential conditions than knowledge and virtue, can never properly discharge that duty without the qualifications obtained through the instrumentality of public instruction.

From this conviction in the government springs its earnest endeavors to improve and extend the education of the youth.

The university, an institution which already does honor to the country, and which is especially charged with the direction of the professional courses, furnishes daily evidences of improvement and better results. In the capacity of its immediate chief, I have been able to observe and know the progress made. During the last year several studious and moral youth have concluded their respective terms, giving proofs of valuable acquirements (elementary though they may be) in many branches of the sciences.

As to the professional studies, professorships have been established in conformity to the university statutes, with the single addition of a professorship of land-surveying.

The studies of the faculty of sciences and letters are arranged according to the requirements of the ordinances, but especial attention has been given to make more effective and advantageous the study of living languages as well as those of natural history and chemistry, so necessary to the practical uses of life, especially in our epoch. With this object, several apparatus, instruments, and other useful articles have been provided, without abandoning the purpose of making still further important additions and improvements in this regard for the university.

The national college, as I had the honor to say in my report of last year, was in a deplorable condition. The government, comprehending that this decline proceeded essentially from the organization of the establishment, gave it a new form, from which the most beneficial results have followed. A significant proof of its improved condition is found in the increased number of students. At the end of 1866 there were not more than from twenty-five to thirty collegiates. In the past year, in which commenced the new system, there were nearly one hundred, and it is believed with confidence that in the present year that number will be greatly increased.

In conformity with the provisions of the university statutes the council of public instruction has permitted the establishment of departmental academies, where could be pursued the studies which correspond to the faculty of sciences and letters, and with conditions that the students should be subjected to an examination in the university as to the validity of their course of studies.

As to the primary instruction, the purpose has been to extend it to every village. This education, gratuitous, as is that of the higher schools, can never produce its full benefits until it is made obligatory. In that way we may succeed in generalizing among the most ignorant class a knowledge of reading and writing, of the elements of morals, of arithmetic, and of the grammar of our language.

The education of the female sex has not been neglected. Several schools for girls have been established, and to others pecuniary aid has been given. For the purpose of giving the female youth an education superior to what hitherto could be given in this country, the government has arranged to bring from Europe instructors to found a female college.

We have encountered many difficulties in our endeavors to sustain the primary instruction, at least in the form and extension in which it actually is. The funds destined to this branch are deficient in some of the departments. To meet the most urgent of these necessities the government found itself obliged to make provision from the fund for extraordinary expenses.

The inspection and superintendence of the schools for drawing and painting having been put under the control of the secretaryship in my charge, it is my duty to inform you that both establishments have made great progress in both branches. The natural talent of our youth to comprehend the delicate harmonies of the fine arts is so remarkable that we may well indulge the hope of possessing in a short time artists who will do honor to the country, and who will demonstrate that the solicitude of the government to furnish this artistic institution has not been fruitless.

If this brief relation gives you no notice of diplomatic labors on the part of the government to adjust difficult and disagreeable questions, nor that new systems of public instruction (which, perhaps, might soon prove inadequate) have been introduced, it will at least demonstrate that the government has endeavored faithfully to fulfill its obligations, has executed the laws with religious solicitude, and has striven to maintain intact the good name of the republic, and that it strives constantly to establish a system of public instruction as perfect in its extent and character as the peculiar circumstances of the country will permit.

GREGORIO ARBIZIR.

SAN SALVADOR, January 29, 1868.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Seward.

No. 38.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San Salvador, March 6, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of January 25th ultimo, No. 16, and also three volumes of the Diplomatic Correspondence for 1866.

The regular annual session of the legislative chambers was closed on the 26th ultimo, with the customary formalities, and an exchange of addresses between the president of the chambers and the President of the republic. The former, in recounting the four epochs which, in his view, marked the political history of this republic, spoke of the "beneficent influence of the government of the North American republic, which, like a colossal tree, spreads its immense healthful shade over the whole continent of Columbus," and he referred in grateful terms to the important part it had contributed to break the yoke of colonial bondage, and to their independence, which led to the assembling of the first Salvadorean congress, March 14, 1824.

The acts of the present chambers, so far as made public, are not of noticeable interest, except in one particular. Extraordinary powers, limited to the legislative recess, were conferred upon the President relative to all the important measures he had recommended to the attention of the chambers in his annual message.

He is authorized by the vote of both houses—

1. To decree such changes and improvements in the department of finance as he may deem necessary to augment the revenues and facilitate their administration, and especially to correct the defects of the present tariff system.

2. To make such reforms in the administration of justice as, on consultation with the supreme court, he may think necessary.

3. To make such improvements and reforms in the military branch as he may think proper, and to decree regulations for a navy.

4. To employ on commissions the members of the legislature during the recess.

5. To regulate the mode of admitting "denouncements" of church lands and unoccupied lands.

6. To remove existing faults of the circulating money, and to determine the alloy, weight, value, and character of the coinage, "in such a manner as he may deem most suitable to facilitate the exchanges and transactions which the general interests demand."

The President is required to give an account to the next session of the chambers of the use he has made of these extraordinary powers. The preamble to this act recites "that these important changes and reforms cannot be made without a protracted examination, requiring a considerable time, and that, the actual President meriting the highest confidence of the people and representatives of Salvador, for having demonstrated in an unequivocal manner his spirit of patriotism, and his skill and discretion, by which the prosperity of the nation has been promoted, they have thought best to decree these ample and extraordinary powers to the supreme executive." Two or three matters of local interest mainly seem to be worthy of notice.

1. The organization of a company under a charter granted last year, to construct an iron wharf or jetty, (muelle,) to extend beyond the surf at the port of La Libertad. The whole capital stock ($125,000,) was subscribed here a short time since, and the work will be at once put in construction by engineers, I understand, from the States. It is an important improvement for the growing commerce of the principal port of the republic.

2. An arrangement (with a liberal subsidy) whereby the original contract with Don Crisanto Medina has been transferred to the North American Steamship Company of New York, for a direct steamer line between the Central American ports and San Francisco. Permission has been granted to make the southern terminus at Panama or San Juan del Sur, in the option of the company. This line would greatly facilitate and increase the trade between these States and California and our other Pacific States and Territories.

With this gratifying prospect of an additional market, especially for the rapidly increasing sugar product here, there are mingled some apprehensions that the provisions for free sugars in the treaty with the Sandwich Islands, now under consideration by our government, may operate to exclude from that convenient market the duty-paying sugars of Central America.

3. Following the succession of natural disturbances which have been so disastrous in many places, the eastern part of this republic has been the theater of severe earthquakes. In the port of La Union, which for many years has been almost wholly free from these phenomena, more than one hundred and fifty shocks were felt within a period of two or three days, some of them of alarming violence. It is now reported here that the volcanic peak of Conchagua, which lies close to that port, on the promontory between it and the sea, has opened an active crater on the seaward slope of the mountain. We are yet without reliable particulars. The town of San Miguel, also, some fifty miles in the interior from La Union, has been alarmed by similar subterranean commotions, and the volcanic peak, at the base of which the town lies, has again, after a quietude of many years, been in pretty active operation.

This capital, which in past times has suffered so severely, and rarely passes many months without severe earthquake shocks, has been unusually exempt during these natural demonstrations elsewhere. The active volcano of Izaleo, sixty miles westward, near Sousenate, has, however, been operating with unwonted vigor.

I record these facts because they may have an interest in connection with similar phenomena in other parts of the globe. The political aspect of the republic is tranquil, and the people seem generally contented and prosperous.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, your obedient servant,
A. S. WILLIAMS.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 17, of February 6, has been received, and is exceedingly interesting.

The extracts from the President's message to congress, and the report of the minister of foreign relations and public instructions accompanying it, exhibit the progressive condition of that republic, and furnish gratifying proofs of the earnest disposition of the government to improve the material, moral, and educational advancement of its people.

ALPHEUS S. WILLIAMS, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Williams to Mr. Seward.

No. 39.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San Salvador, March 20, 1868.

SIR: The publication of the report of the minister of interior, finance and war, made to the legislative chambers in their recent session, places the aggregate of imports and exports of this republic, for the last fiscal year, at a larger figure than that given in my dispatch of November 6th last, (No. 34,) which was made up from the custom-house reports published in the Official Gazette. The difference in the two statements grows mainly out of an unexpected increase in the business of the frontier offices, which was estimated in the Gazette reports.

The minister's report states as follows the aggregates of exports and imports:

Exports of products, 1867	$2, 895, 606 23
Imports of foreign goods, 1867	1, 876, 444 10
Excess of exports	1, 019, 162 13

This shows an increase of exports over 1866 of $460,804 73, and of imports, $232,099 59. The minister anticipates a yearly increase of the exportable products of the country from the fact that "in all the departments of the republic agriculture is assuming larger proportions, especially in the cultivation of coffee and sugar." He looks also with confidence to the advantages which are to spring from the bank, recently chartered, for a most favorable influence upon new and useful enterprises.

In connection with this subject, I venture to make a brief reference to the official estimates of the revenues and expenditures for the current year, as not without interest in presenting the sources of the revenues, and the kind and extent of the expenditures, for a comparison with those of States of similar magnitude elsewhere. The minister estimates the revenues for the year at $744,123 68, and from the following sources:

From the custom-houses	$381, 419 18
From sales of aguadiente franchise, (privileges granted by districts to make and sell)	140, 414 38
From export duty on indigo	39, 168 68
From ramo de tajo, (excise on slaughtered animals)	22, 597 86
From stamped paper, (used in all notarial documents and proceedings in courts)	19, 329 14
From 4 per cent. and 5 per cent. tax on sales of real estate and certain personal property	18, 137 57
From sales of powder and saltpeter, (a government monopoly)	18, 321 70
From post office department	12, 011 52

Fines, debts due, rents and sales of real estate, and a few other small items, make up the total of the estimated revenues.

It will be observed that the revenues are derived almost wholly from the customs, or privileged monopolies. There is no direct tax on real or personal property, for State or municipal purposes. In some of the larger towns a small sum is collected upon each box or bale of imported goods, without regard to value, and for purposes not clearly defined.

But municipal assessments, and taxes, and municipal governments, except as the creatures of the general or central government, seem not to be known. And in this connection with the subject of taxation, it may not be inappropriate to add, that for years in this republic the church has been deprived of the right, which still obtains in others of these republics, of collecting tithes and "first fruits" (diezmos y primicias) for ecclesiastical purposes. The church is now wholly supported by annual legislative appropriations, and by the customary fees and voluntary contributions.

The expenditures for the year are estimated at $713,382 50. The following are the principal items:

For legislative expenses	$11,444 50
For executive expenses	19,976 00
For judicial expenses	35,480 00
For ecclesiastical expenses	15,000 00
For diplomatic expenses	20,000 00
For army expenses	200,000 00
For pensions	8,500 00
For primary education	22,000 00
For university	15,000 00
For department expenses, including eleven governors and their secretaries	15,180 00
For rural police, and town and fair guards	28,780 00
For roads, and other improvements	50,000 00
For existing contracts	50,000 00
For construction of government house	30,000 00
For subsidy to steamboats	12,000 00
For interest on public debt	42,000 00
For supplemental for last year	40,000 00
For hospitals	4,900 00
For government printing office	4,476 00
For purchase of powder	7,000 00
For unlooked for and extraordinary expenses of the government, for which "minister is to render a detailed account to the legislature"	20,000 00
For "ordinary or general expenses of administration"	13,000 00
For general post office, "besides other provisions of law" ..	4,480 00

The balance of the estimates are for salaries to general treasurers, special treasurer, judge of treasury, auditors, administration of powder, clerk-hire, and the like. The expenses of the three seaport custom-houses, including salaries, are estimated at $14,600. It is a noticeable fact that the small "military force and rural guard" (not over eight hundred men) absorb quite one-third of all the estimated expenditures.

These statements lose their significance unless the fact is kept in mind that territorially the republic of Salvador is about the size of the State of New Hampshire, and that its estimated population (for in truth no reliable census has ever been taken) is six hundred thousand souls.

The inhabitants of aboriginal descent are sufficiently civilized to be pretty steady cultivators of small farms, and to an extent that is quite remarkable. In the larger part of the republic the traveler finds chacras, or thatched ranchos, thickly spread over the country, and not, as in most Spanish American countries, aggregated in towns and villages. The portion which is clearly an exception to this remark, is the comparatively small strip along the coast between the ports of La Libertad and Acajutta, known as the "Balsam Coast." Here the natives live in a country of almost unbroken forest, and chiefly from the production of the balsam tree known to commerce as the balsam of Peru.

I shall venture in a future dispatch to continue this subject of population, soil, climate, and productions of this little republic, in spite of some apprehensions I feel of giving an undue importance to matters that the department may not care to be troubled with.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. S. WILLIAMS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of March 6, No. 18.

Since my last dispatch Señor Don José Salinas, especially empowered for that purpose by the government of Nicaragua, has concluded a treaty of amity and commerce with this republic. I am assured that this treaty embraces no more than the ordinary provisions, and nothing in the way of alliances offensive or defensive, which have been heretofore so prolific of discords and wars between these Central American republics. No treaty, not even of amity, existed between these contemninous republics, and this new one, I am assured, is solely intended to supply this deficiency, and to manifest a mutual good feeling between the two governments. The measure must, however, have excited the jealousy and inflamed the bad feeling that has existed in Nicaragua for some time between the partisans of the late President Martinez and the existing government of Señor Guzman. I am told that the steamer just arrived brought up a gentleman of intelligence and influence, a secret agent of the Martinez political party, whose double purpose is to neutralize, if he cannot enlist, the influence of this government in the contemplated revolutionary measures, and to purchase arms and ammunition, with the intention of a forcible overthrow of the Guzman administration. I very much doubt if the cautious judgment and peaceful disposition of President Dueñas can be enlisted in any enterprise or purposes that are intended or calculated to disturb the existing governments of neighboring states, and thereby endanger the tranquillity and peace of his own republic. Any violent purposes of the discontents of Nicaragua must assuredly fail of finding countenance or support from the government here. Besides the treaty above referred to, the Duke of Leignano, chargé d'affaires of Italy, has recently concluded, on the part of his government, a treaty of extradition with this republic.

I venture respectfully to suggest that such a convention or treaty with our government is much to be desired.

The increasing facilities of intercourse with our country, and especially that which probably will soon be furnished by means of the direct steamer line from this to California, will make such an arrangement for reclaiming fugitive criminals of importance to both countries. I make the suggestion with more confidence as I am aware that provisions of extradition were embraced in a treaty made in 1862 between the two governments, and which failed of ratification from some slight amendment in our Senate, and the delays of the Barrios administration here to ratify the amended treaty, previous to its overthrow.

I venture further to suggest that in addition to this extradition treaty a consular convention between the two countries is much to be desired, as provided for in article thirty-four of the existing treaty. Some additional consular powers in regard to estates of our citizens dying in this country, without heirs or legal representatives here, are especially needed. I have reason to believe that propositions for these conventions would be very favorably received by this government.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. S. WILLIAMS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of April 30th last, No. 20. Also two packages—one addressed "to the government of Salvador," and one "to the gentleman who, at the time of the death of President Lincoln, held the office of minister of foreign affairs," both of which I will see delivered on the return of the government to the capital.

The President, accompanied by the ministers of state and finance, the chief military officers, and a considerable party of ladies and gentlemen, left here on the 22d ultimo, on a tour through the western departments of the republic. He has been received everywhere with enthusiastic demonstrations of respect.

I was kindly invited to accompany the President, but the condition of my health would not permit the exposure and fatigue of a horseback journey. I, however, availed myself of an opportunity to make an excursion by steamer, of a few days' duration, down the coast, and had the pleasure to meet our minister in Nicaragua, Mr. Dickinson, at Corinto, and our minister, General Lawrence, at Puerta Arenas, on his return from the States. The United States steamship Ossipee, Captain Emmons, which touched at the ports of this republic some few weeks ago, I found at anchor in the port of Coriento (Realejo,) and I had the pleasure of a long interview with Captain Emmons on board his ship. I am informed that the United States steamship Saranac, Captain Fraily, is also at this time touching at the ports of the Central American coast.

These occasional visits of our naval vessels are not without beneficial effects in keeping alive in the minds of these people some appreciation of the naval strength and vigilance of our country. It would be better, perhaps, if these visits could be made with more frequency and with greater regularity.

This republic continues tranquil, and prosperous in all branches of its productions.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS OF SALVADOR,
San Salvador, June 14, 1868.

The undersigned, minister of foreign relations of Salvador, has had the honor to receive two packages (encomendadas) delivered by the honorable General Williams in the name of the government of the United States; one directed to the government of this republic, and the other addressed "to the gentleman who at the time of the death of President Lincoln held the position of minister of foreign affairs."

His excellency the President of the republic and the undersigned, who at the time referred to discharged the duties of minister of foreign relations, present their most expressive thanks to the government of the United States for the presentation of a work which records the universal sentiment caused by the assassination of President Lincoln.

The undersigned avails himself of the occasion to reiterate to his excellency the honorable General Williams the protestations of his distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
San Salvador, September 22, 1868.

SIR: Referring to the circular of the department, dated January 17, 1867, relative to the Coolie trade, and calling the attention of the representatives abroad to the supposed abuses of this traffic, I have the honor to inclose herewith, for the information of the department, the translation of a decree of this government, granting an exclusive privilege to one

Señor Poncio Darnaculleta to introduce here one thousand Chinese laborers within a period of four years. It will be seen that this decree provides for a voluntary engagement by these laborers in their own country, which fact must be certified by the authorities of the place where the contracts are made. It also provides that the transfers of these labor contracts in this country shall not extend beyond the term of the original agreement.

I have great doubts if these Chinese laborers can be successfully introduced here. Labor is yet, nominally at least, too cheap and abundant in this country, though it must be said, of such an indolent, uncertain, and indifferent character that it much needs the incentive example of a more industrious and patient class of workmen. In all mechanical branches the labor of the country (from the universal custom of weekly contracts, seldom renewed by the same laborer) is almost useless. The same laborer cannot be kept long enough to be taught the simplest matter of mechanical work.

For the successful working of the machinery which is now being extensively introduced, more constant and more skillful labor must be sought elsewhere—not, I think, however, among Coolie laborers.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
A. S. WILLIAMS.

MINISTERIO DE FOMENTO, GOVERNMENT HOUSE,
San Salvador, August 8, 1868.

Upon the petition of Señor Don Poncio Darnaculleta, a native of Spain, soliciting an exclusive privilege to import Chinese laborers into this republic, and in consideration that an augmentation of the labor force of this country would be of much utility, now that agriculture is notably progressing—

The supreme government decrees:

1. To concede to said Señor Darnaculleta a privilege for four years, during which period he may import the number of one thousand Chinese laborers, who shall voluntarily contract in their own country, and shall be brought directly to this, which condition shall be duly attested by the public authorities of the place where the laborers are enlisted or contracted. (Le haga elgananche.)

2. Such contracts and transfers as Señor Darnaculleta may make with the planters or other agriculturists of this country shall be considered as valid, and the fulfillment of them will be enforced by the authorities.

3. The payments which Señor Darnaculleta may receive from planters, or other agriculturists, by virtue of the contracts and transfers referred to in article 2, shall be understood as a compensation for the costs and expenses of the embarkation and transportation of said Chinese laborers, and said contracts and transfers shall not be made to extend beyond the time stipulated in the original enlistment or engagement of said laborers.

4. Said Señor Darnaculleta shall pay, for the benefit of the public hospital of this city, one dollar for each individual Chinese brought here by virtue of this concession, as a remuneration for the privilege granted.

Rubricated by the President.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, December 10, 1867.

SIR: I beg to inform the department that we arrived in this city on the evening of December 6, making the trip from New York to La Guayra in eleven days.

When we arrived at St. Thomas, we found that the recent earthquake, on the 18th of November, had so disabled the vessels in the Atlantic squadron at that point that it was impossible for Admiral Palmer to comply with the order from the Secretary of the Navy to send me in a government vessel to La Guayra, consequently I made the trip in a small yacht.

On the 9th instant I addressed a note to the honorable Jacinto Gutierrez, minister of foreign affairs, announcing my arrival, and informing him of my being a bearer of a sealed letter from the President of the United States of America to the President of the republic of Venezuela, (an open office copy of which I forwarded to him at the same time,) and asking him to designate a convenient time and place when I could have an audience with him and place the same in his hands.

A copy of this note I inclose, marked inclosure No. 1.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS N. STILWELL,

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Stilwell to Señor Gutierrez.

[Inclosure No. 1.]

Mr. Thomas N. Stilwell has the honor to present his compliments to the honorable Jacinto Gutierrez, minister of foreign relations of the United States of Venezuela, and to inform him of his arrival in the city of Caracas, bearing a sealed letter, an open office copy whereof is herewith transmitted, addressed by the President of the United States of America to the President of the republic of Venezuela, accrediting the undersigned as minister resident of the United States near the government of Venezuela.

Mr. Stilwell, in pursuance of his instructions, begs to request the honorable the minister of foreign relations to designate a convenient time and place at which he may have the honor of presenting such original letter of credence in person to his excellency the Supreme Chief of the United States of Venezuela.

Mr. Stilwell takes the advantage of this, his first opportunity, cordially to salute the minister of foreign relations, and to tender him the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, December 17, 1867.

SIR: Since the date of my second dispatch, of the 10th instant, the minister of foreign relations for the United States of Venezuela, in a very polite note, of the 13th instant, advised me that the President had been pleased to name Monday, the 16th instant, at 2 o'clock p. m., for my reception. I replied on the same day of receipt of his note, forwarding a copy of the remarks which I proposed making in my reception, (a copy of which I inclose herewith—inclosure No. 1.)

Yesterday, at the hour named, I presented myself at the government buildings, and was immediately received by honorable Jacinto Gutierrez, minister of foreign relations, who at once introduced me to the presence of his excellency Juan C. Falcon, President of the United States of Venezuela, who was surrounded by his cabinet and the principal military men of the republic, to the number of nearly, if not quite, one hundred persons. After the delivery of my remarks, to which his excellency replied, (a copy of which remarks I inclose, marked inclosure No. 2,) a very pleasant conversation of a few minutes followed, in which not only the President but the different members of his cabinet spoke in the most eulogistic terms of my government, its present administration, and its distinguished Secretary of State.

Following the custom inaugurated by my predecessors, to-day I have visited the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary for Brazil and the several chargés d'affaires representing foreign powers near the government of Venezuela, and it is with much pleasure that I advise you that, as the representative of the United States, I was received with great courtesy and distinguished consideration.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS N. STILWELL.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

[Inclosure No. 1.]

YOUR EXCELLENCY: Having the honor to deliver to you personally the autograph letter of the President of the United States of America, accrediting me as minister resident, near the government of Venezuela; it affords me profound pleasure to assure your excellency, for the President and the people of the United States of America, that they desire and hope that the fraternal and friendly relations heretofore existing between the sister republics of the United States and Venezuela may not only remain unbroken, but that their future intercourse and relations may be such as to unite them more friendly together.

The President of my country has instructed me to say to your excellency, that it is with much pleasure that he learned that you have been able to suppress all factious opposition, and to maintain and preserve your government against all of its enemies.

The United States having just passed through a war unparalleled in magnitude successfully for the preservation of its laws, its Constitution, its government, and entered upon a career of grandeur and glory unsurpassed in recorded history; the President congratulates you on your like success, and the ability with which you have presided over the republic of Venezuela.

In assuming the duties of the mission to which the President of the United States has been pleased to assign me, permit me at this my first opportunity to tender you my own sentiment of great respect and consideration for your excellency, for the success of your government and the happiness of your people.

[Inclosure No. 2.—Translation.]

MR. MINISTER: It is with pleasure that I receive from your hands the letter accrediting you as minister resident of the United States of America to those of Venezuela.

A diplomatic representative of the most ancient and illustrious of the sister republics must always be sure to command a very kind reception in this nation. She remembers gratefully that when visited in 1812 by a terrible calamity, the Congress of the American federation hastened to her relief in a generous and spontaneous manner. That was the first source of the ties of affection which bind both peoples in close amity. In the process of time, their relations have grown and become stronger by means of treaties and a constant and never changing intercourse. My government has given sufficient proofs of the high esteem in which it holds its good understanding with yours. In that direction it will at all times be met.

Fortunately I have brought to a speedy termination the revolts which during my term of office have threatened the public tranquillity. In so doing I have but responded loyally to the expectation of the people, but the satisfaction I derive from fulfilling my duty is increased by the congratulations of the high magistrate who sends you here; and they inspire me with renewed confidence in the future success of my efforts. I hope that no factious attempt will be able to triumph over the order established for the welfare of the republic.

Yours has taught us that even the most wide-spread and powerful rebellions give way to perseverance in the good cause, and fall at last prostrate at the feet of justice. At that issue, which I doubted at no time, I have rejoiced with all my heart. Would to God that domestic dissensions, only once felt during a life extending through almost a century, should never more recur in that country; wonderful even amid its misfortunes! It will, no doubt, continue prosperously its career of grandeur and glory.

I am most thankful for the felicitations of your President. No less favorably am I impressed with the marks of kindness evinced by you towards the Venezuelan people and government, and towards myself. You are welcome to this friendly republic.

Mr. Stihell to Mr. Seward.

No. 6.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, December 26, 1867.

SIR: On my arrival in Caracas, judging from the tone of El Federalista and El Porvenir, the only newspapers published in Caracas, and the statements of gentlemen on whom I supposed I could rely, my impressions were, that the rebellion against the established government of Venezuela was at an end, and that peace, order, and quiet had been fully restored. I regret to have to advise you that my information was incorrect, and that a formidable rebellion is now in progress.

The government have about six thousand soldiers in the field, and are increasing the number daily by compulsory enlistment and otherwise. The insurgents have not so many, probably not over four thousand.

The government had advices, on the evening of the 24th instant, of an engagement within about twenty leagues of Caracas, in which the insurgents were routed. It was rumored some days since that the rebels had taken Valencia, a city, next to Caracas, the largest in population of any in the republic, but the report has not been confirmed.

* * * * *

While it may be possible that President Falcon will be able to suppress the rebellion against his government, and to restore peace and quiet to Venezuela, for the present I am satisfied the relief will be of short duration, and that in the end his government will have to give way to an administration no better, and perhaps worse for the people, than his own.

* * * * *

The country demoralized from constant rebellions, business almost suspended, and the money of the country, if any, garnered up and secreted, no one knowing what hour the government may demand it and take it, by force if need be, unless quietly given up.

The better and more intelligent class of people, and in fact almost every one, have a hope that the American genius of statesmanship will develop some plan by which they may be relieved from perpetual rebellions, revolutions, and dishonest and weak-minded officials, and instead thereof a government of law and order.

The purchase of the islands of Saint Thomas and Saint John's by the government of the United States has led this people to hope that the great republic of the north, in extending its domain and power, may some day, not far distant, add Venezuela to the galaxy of States which constitute the great Union.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
THOMAS N. STILWELL.

No. 8.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, December 28, 1867.

SIR: In 1826 Samuel Hill, a citizen of the United States, and a native of Philadelphia, came to Venezuela in the employ of the Messrs. Dallets, of Philadelphia. He continued in Venezuela and in their employ until his death, which was some time during the year 1833.

When Mr. Hill came to Venezuela in 1826, he brought with him his family, among which was one son, Joseph Hill, then about nine years of age. The son, Joseph Hill, from the date of his arrival till the present time, has continued to reside in Venezuela. A number of years since he married a Venezuelan woman, by whom he has had two sons, aged respectively eighteen and twenty years.

Mr. Hill claims—and it is a fact which can be substantiated, I have no doubt, by excellent proof—that he has never done or performed any act in Venezuela to sever his citizenship from the United States. His sons have been drafted and placed in the ranks of the Venezuelan army, by the compulsory process which this government has adopted of taking recruits wherever they can find them.

Mr. Hill has called upon me several times, and requested my interference with the government of Venezuela for their discharge from service in the Venezuelan army, upon the ground that they are American citizens.

Desiring to act correctly in the premises, I made an examination into such rulings as the State Department at Washington had made in similar cases in Venezuela. I find by dispatch No. 22, of the State Department, bearing date 16th of March, 1860, to the honorable Edward A. Turpin, then minister resident near Venezuela, in response to an inquiry made by him to the State Department dispatch No. 25, of date February, 1860, that General Lewis Cass, then Secretary of State, held that children born in Venezuela of a father who was a citizen of the United States "are declared citizens of the United States." In a later case, that of Thomas Idler, referred to in dispatch of honorable E. D. Culver, then resident minister to Venezuela, No. 47, date of December 15, 1863, the State Department at Washington, dispatch No. 58, of date January 25, 1864, held that it was "apprehended that it will not be expedient for us further to interfere in behalf of Mr. Thomas Idler, as it has uniformly been held in this country, and especially in several recent cases, that the children of foreigners born here are citizens of the United States."

While I have declined to take any steps in regard to the release of the sons of Mr. Hill until fully advised what course to pursue by my government, the question is an important one in Venezuela, as there are many persons here, born in Venezuela, sons of citizens of the United States, who are now seeking the protection of my government from military duty. They have always acted upon the theory of being citizens of the United States.

I understand that nearly, if not all, the foreign powers represented at this court hold and protect as citizens the sons, although born in Venezuela, of fathers who are citizens of their respective countries. At all events, the question should be definitely settled.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS N. STILWELL.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, January 27, 1868.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of December 28, 1867, No. 8, in relation to the claim of two minor sons of Joseph Hill, born in Venezuela, the one twenty and the other eighteen years of age, to be citizens of the United States and exempt from compulsory service in the army of Venezuela. Their father and grandfather, it appears from your statements, emigrated in 1826, and none of the family would seem during the long period of more than forty years to have returned to this country to resume the native allegiance of the grandfather and father.

The young men in question, according to authoritative expositions of our law, were born with the capacity to elect, when they shall arrive at full age, whether they will retain the citizenship in Venezuela to which their birth there seems to entitle them, or will resume their allegiance to the United States which their father's emigration, while an infant, and their own foreign birth, have kept in suspense. Every presumption is now in favor of their intention of continued residence abroad. Should they hereafter give unmistakable evidence of their design to reside permanently in the United States, and subject themselves to the duties and obligations of citizenship, a case will arise in which we may discuss the right of Venezuela to exact military service from them during a temporary sojourn within the jurisdiction of that republic.

No. 11.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, February 6, 1868.

SIR: Since my dispatch of the 26th of December the affairs of this government have become each day more gloomy and uncertain; the rebellion more formidable, and apparently with a much better show of success. The government without one dollar in its treasury, and with no credit whatever, seems less able to suppress the revolution than a month since. The oligarchists, as those are styled who formerly were the adherents and supporters of General Paez, and his administration, during his presidency, constitute about seven-eighths of the wealth and respectability of Venezuela, (and perhaps the proportion is much larger,) favor quietly and secretly the revolt against the government. The federalists—those who sustain the government—consist of those in office—those who think they are making money out of the patronage of the government, and perhaps the army.

* * * * *

Early in January President Falcon broke up his family residence in Caracas, and sent his family and furniture to Coro, his residence at the time of his elevation to the presidency. This act of itself created great distrust in the minds of the federalists, as it was believed that he himself had lost confidence in his ability and power to sustain the government, and in the same ratio the oligarchists were inspired with new hopes and courage.

On the 12th of January President Falcon reorganized his cabinet. As this is done so often that it is almost impossible for the foreign representatives accredited to this government to tell who are and by what name to address the ministers of the different departments of the government, it is not thought that this act will give any additional weight or permanency to his administration. In fact, his new minister of finance, after having held his position for a few days, resigned on the 4th instant, for the reason, as it is stated, that it was impossible for him to attempt to discharge the duties of that office without money, without credit, and without any present available resources whatever, the government indebted to every one almost, who annoy him at all hours and at all places. His place has not yet been filled.

On the 16th of January President Falcon left Caracas, as it was said, to take command in person of the main body of the federal army, which is now at or near Valencia. Recent advices say he is at Port Cabello, and it is thought that he had no intention of taking command of his army, but that the announcement was a pretext to enable him to leave Caracas, and that he will remain at Port Cabello, where he keeps a war steamer, or in the vicinity, so that in the event of a failure to suppress the different factions which now threaten his government, he can escape without much risk to the Island Curaçoa. In the mean time General Miguel Gil, the Vice-President, is discharging the duties of President.

* * * * *

Some time since the claims due French citizens were adjusted, and it was agreed upon the part of the government of Venezuela that seventeen per cent. of all import duties received at the port of La Guayra should be paid directly to the chargé d'affaires of France, each month, to be applied in payment of the amount heretofore adjusted. At a later period, some time in October last, the government made a forced loan, of one hundred and eighty thousand dollars, of some of its citizens in Caracas; and for the purpose of giving it the appearance of an honest transaction upon the part of the government, and a determination to refund the money with interest, the government agreed and pledged thirty per cent. of all moneys received at La Guayra for import duties, the same to be paid directly to the commissioners of said loan.

On the 19th of December last, again requiring more money, the government being absolutely bankrupt, its soldiers without rations for ten days and more, the clerks in the various departments unpaid, or only partially paid, for months, forced another loan for two hundred and twenty thousand dollars of the merchants and business men of Caracas, pledging the faith of the government that thirty per cent. of all the import duties received at the port of La Guayra should be paid to the commissioners of the loan to secure the payments of this loan, and interest as in the former case. Soon after this loan had been made, and on the 2d day of January, 1868, the government issued a public order, or proclamation, directed to the collector of customs at La Guayra, reciting the fact of its promises, pledges, and assignment, of the three several sums, for the purposes before indicated, and instructing him to pay over from time to time such sums as might accrue under these several pledges and agreements to the persons authorized to receive the same, and yet within a few days thereafter secretly issued an order to the same collector of customs to furnish no statements to any one of the amount received for import duties. The result has been, that the collector refuses to furnish any statement of amount of money received for import duties, or to pay over the amount which the government had pledged. The government, on the other hand, refers the parties in interest to their published proclamation and the collector; while the fact is apparent to every one that the government is daily using the entire receipts of customs without regard to any promise or pledge.

This transaction is only in keeping with all of their public promises and business engagements.

The results of all such double dealing have been, that government securities could not be negotiated at ten cents on the dollar; those having money are sending it to England or France to get it out of the way of the government. Business of every kind is prostrated. The bank of London and Venezuela, and the only one in Caracas, discontinued business and closed its doors on the 1st instant, as the business of the country had so fallen off as to render it impossible to sustain even one bank in Venezuela profitably. More than one-half the improved lands of Venezuela untilled and lying waste; for as long as this rebellion lasts, no one is safe in attempting to cultivate the lands in the interior; then, again, were it safe in other respects, it is impossible to procure labor, as all the farm-laborers of the country, almost without any exception, have been impressed into the army.

I have said nothing as yet about the movements of the army. It is a matter that is almost impossible to tell anything about; the government suppresses everything. It is said they are fighting at some distance from Valencia, and that several fights have taken place in Aragua and Carabobo, with what result is not known, or the number of men engaged.

I had intended and had commenced a dispatch upon the financial condition of Venezuela; but as an official report is being prepared to present to congress, which convenes on the 20th of this month, I have delayed my dispatch upon that subject, for the reason that nearly all my facts and figures would have to be taken from the official reports of last year, and would not be so correct as if delayed until after the meeting of congress.

* * * * *

The mails for this legation I find the department forward by the Dallet line only. This makes the receipt of our letters very irregular, as the Dallet line does not pretend, as I am informed by their agent here, to run with the same regularity as formerly. We would receive our mails much quicker, and much more regularly, if forwarded by the Brazilian line of steamers from New York to Saint Thomas, in closed bags, to the care of the United States consul, by him to be forwarded; and if not too much trouble, it would be much more satisfactory to receive our mails by both lines when their days of sailing are not too near together. We have had but one mail since the 6th of December. I respectfully call your attention to this matter, trusting entirely to your judgment in the matter.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS N. STILWELL.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

This evening, and before mailing the foregoing dispatch, I am advised by the honorable Rafael Seijas, secretary of foreign affairs, that the honorable Jacinto Gutierrez, minister of foreign affairs, had during the afternoon of to-day tendered his resignation. I did not learn that he assigned any reason for his resignation.

I have just learned that the honorable Manuel Murillo, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from Colombia to Venezuela, had arrived during the afternoon at La Guayra from Saint Thomas, on the yacht Galgo.

Yours, &c.,

STILWELL.

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, CENTRAL BUREAU—
No. 142.

CARACAS, 10th of March, 1868, 5th and 10th.

SIR: The undersigned, minister of foreign affairs of the United States of Venezuela, has the honor to inform Mr. Minister Resident of the United States of America, hoping that through his organ it may come to the knowledge of the government and citizens of his nation that the national executive, as appears from the annexed copy of the decree, has declared on yesterday closed and in a state of blockade the part of the Venezuelan coast that extends from the mouth of the river Ulnare to Conoma Point, in the State of New Barcelona.

With such motive the undersigned renews to Mr. Stilwell the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

God and federation.

J. G. OCHOA.

Mr. THOMAS N. STILWELL,
Minister Resident of the United States of America.

[Translation.]

I, Miguel Gil, general-in-chief, primer designado, charged with the national executive office—

A revolt having taken place in New Barcelona against the political institutions which the nation has given itself, and it devolving on the national executive to make use of force and other legal measures in order to re-establish constitutional order—

DECREE.

ARTICLE 1. The coast of the State of New Barcelona, from the mouth of the river Unare to Conoma Point, is declared closed.

ART. 2. The same extent of the coast is also declared in a state of blockade.

ART. 3. If any vessel shall approach any point of the coast mentioned, the blockading force shall notify her of the existence of the blockade, noting in its navigation papers the day and the place, or the bearings in which she was found, and also the notification made. In case of the vessel insisting in her pretension to enter, notwithstanding the notice, or if she presents herself again at said points, she becomes liable to be seized and detained for the corresponding trial.

ART. 4. For the seizure and detention of ships that attempt to sail from the blockade coast, the previous notification prescribed in the foregoing article will not be needed. But if the vessels that attempt to sail from the port of Barcelona should have entered it before forming the blockade, their departure shall not be impeded.

ART. 5. Vessels that convey effects contraband of war, for the coast of Barcelona, or for the insurgents, shall also be seized and detained; unless their captains should agree to deliver them up to the captor, and the latter be able to take the same on board without difficulty.

ART. 6. The commanders of the blockading vessels shall proceed with the ships detained for violation of the blockade, or for carrying contraband goods, in the manner it is provided for in the ordinances respecting privateering of 1822, wherein it is not opposed to the foregoing dispositions, being bound to bring them captured to the port of La Guayra, in order that the federal high court may try them.

ART. 7. This decree shall be notified to whom it may concern, and the minister of war and marine shall take care of its publication and fulfillment.

Given in Caracas on the 9th of March, 1868, 5th of the law, and 10th of the federation.

MIGUEL GIL.

For the acting national executive:

ANTONIO MATA.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, March 16, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of dispatches Nos. 7, 10, 11, and 12, of January 25, 27, and 28.

It affords me no ordinary pleasure to know that my remarks on presenting my letter of credence to his excellency the President of Venezuela has met with your approval.

I will submit to Joseph Hill the substance of your dispatch (No. 10) relative to the citizenship of his sons; and unless they furnish evidence of their intention to return to the United States to make it their permanent home, no further action will be taken in their behalf.

No. 27.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, April 15, 1868.

SIR: By the constitution of Venezuela, the congress of the republic is to meet on the 20th day of February of each and every year.

This year, however, they failed in organizing the two houses until the 2d day of April, owing to the fact that they were unable to procure the constitutional number for a quorum, although a less number had met and adjourned from day to day, from the 20th of February till the date of their final organization.

On the 3d day of April, the day following the organization of the two houses of congress, a large number of soldiers, disguised in citizens' dress, entered the lobby of the house of representatives, for the purpose, as it was thought, of intimidating those members who were supposed to be hostile to President Falcon and his administration, and thereby secure the election of a first designado, (an office similar to that of Vice-President of the United States,) who should be the friend and in the interest of President Falcon.

The president of the house of representatives, who had been elected the day previous, by a majority of one vote over the candidate brought forward by Falcon, as soon as he made the discovery that the president intended to control the action of congress by force and threats, declared the house adjourned.

President Falcon returned to Caracas on the 25th day of March from Puerto Cabello, but he did not in fact resume the duties of the presidency until the 7th day of April, when, by an arrangement with those in sympathy with the revolutionists, he agreed to reorganize his cabinet by the appointment of gentlemen less objectionable to the opponents of his administration.

In pursuance of this arrangement, on the 8th instant President Falcon announced the following-named gentlemen as composing his new cabinet, viz: Minister for the department of interior and justice, and of public works, citizen Rafael Arvelo; for foreign affairs, José G. Villafañe; minister of finance and public credit, citizen Antonio Varejo; minister of war and marine, General Francisco Mejia. These gentlemen apparently are men of more popularity, ability, and character than their predecessors, and their appointment and acceptance have led the people of Venezuela to hope for a better state of political affairs. I have no faith, however, that the change will lead to any good results.

From the 8th, the date of the organization of the new cabinet, till the 13th instant, when the two houses of congress reassembled, negotiations were constantly going on between President Falcon and his friends on the one side, and those who represent the revolutionary interest on the other. It is thought that some understanding has been reached that will lead to some kind of a compromise and settlement of the pending troubles and difficulties. This conclusion is only warranted, however, by the reassembling of congress, and the appointment of commissioners upon the part the government of Venezuela and the insurgents, to agree upon some general basis of settlement, by which the revolution shall cease, which commission is now in session at Valencia.

Congress has done no business as yet, waiting, as it is thought, for the commissioners to conclude their labors at Valencia.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS N. STILWELL.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Stilwell to Mr. Seward.

No. 34.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, May 27, 1868.

SIR: On the 17th day of April, and within two days after the date of my No. 27, the new cabinet resigned, assigning as a reason, that the acceptance of their several appointments was with the distinct understanding that congress were to proceed with their labors with a constitutional quorum. The indications being that such was not to be the fact, they surrendered their portfolios.

The same day the President promptly accepted their resignations, and the secretaries of the different ministers charged with their respective duties ad interim, until the formation of a new cabinet.

From the 17th until the 28th of April the condition and affairs of the government became each day worse, the rebels stronger and more aggressive in their movements on Caracas.

On the 28th President Falcon announced the formation of a new cabinet, it being understood and agreed, prior to its appointment, that one of their number should be elected first designado, a power given by the constitution to the cabinet in the event of the failure of congress to elect, and the person so elected to assume the duties of President; President Falcon agreeing to retire to Coro.

In accordance with this arrangement, on the 29th the new cabinet elected General M. E. Bruzual, the minister of war, first designado, who at once entered upon the discharge of the duties of the presidency, General Falcon leaving on the morning of the next day for Coro.

The rebels, as soon as the new order of things was announced, became more active, and from the 1st of May up to the morning of the 10th, skirmishes occurred almost daily between them and the government troops near Caracas. On the morning of the 6th, General Colma, who was in command of the government forces, marched out of the city with about six hundred men, and gave the rebels battle at or near Las Adjuntas, a place about nine miles, from Caracas. After a few hours' fighting, he fell back to Caracas, the rebels claiming to be victors. The total loss to both sides is variously estimated at from two to four hundred.

Other fights of not much moment occurred on the 7th, 8th, and 9th, the rebels each day approaching more nearly the city.

On the evening of the 9th the rebels, with about three hundred of their forces, came in and took a position on Mount Calvary, within the city of Caracas, apparently without opposition. On the morning of the 10th, soon after six o'clock a. m., the government troops engaged them in battle, which lasted from an hour to an hour and a half, the rebel troops eventually retiring. The loss was about two hundred killed and wounded. It is thought, and perhaps it is true, that General Miguel Antonio Rojas, the commander of the rebel forces, could have taken Caracas had he so desired, as but a small part of his forces was engaged. At all events, it became evident that the rebels would eventually succeed. The result of the fight of the 10th was, that, on Monday, negotiations were entered into by General Manuel E. Bruzual, upon the part of the government, and General Miguel Antonio Rojas, commander-in-chief of the rebel forces, (as he claimed, but in fact of only the revolutionary forces raised and operated in the western part of the republic, General José Tades Monagas, ex-president of the republic, at that time being in command of a revolutionary force which was moving on Caracas, equally as large and more thoroughly equipped and armed, raised in the States of Barcelona, New Andalusia, and Bolivar, being the eastern part of the republic,) which resulted in a "convention of peace" between the government and the revolutionary forces under the command of General Rojas. By the terms of this treaty, it was agreed that General Manuel E. Bruzual should continue to discharge the duties of President, and that General Miguel Antonio Rojas, chief of the reconquering army, (as he styled himself,) should be commander-in-chief of the armies of the western, central, and eastern States, in which revolutionary movements had taken place, the government pledging itself to a remission of all penalties for political offenses, a strict compliance with the constitution, the protection and complete liberty of the elective franchise, and the payment of all debts incurred by the revolution, without regard to which party may have contracted them: the rebels (the patriots as now styled) acknowledging the constitutionality of the present government, pledging the devotion of their army towards its maintenance, their best efforts towards the end of restoring peace, the establishment of constitutional liberty throughout the republic, and a full guarantee of the protection provided by law.

In accordance with this treaty, the rebel General Rojas at once assumed the command of the army of the republic, which was consolidated with the forces previously under his command.

Commissioners were appointed, and dispatched at once, to confer with General Monagas; others to visit the States lately in rebellion to induce them to accept and acquiesce in the treaty. While no definite advices have been received from these several commissioners, the indications now are that the revolution may be said to be over for the present, or at least so weakened in strength and numbers as not to be able to accomplish anything under those who aspire to be its leaders, and to control its movements.

General Manuel E. Bruzual, the President, is a son of Blas Bruzual, who, for several years, represented Venezuela near the government of the United States, a man of fair ability, said to have been an able general, and is reputed to be an honest man.

General Rojas is a man unknown to fame, probably never heard of out of his own immediate neighborhood until the late revolution gave him notoriety as a guerilla chieftain, a man without education, and apparently without ability ; yet, it is said, he evinced great ability in the late revolution, and was much respected by his followers.

With no great faith in the permanency of any particular administration or treaty of the people of Venezuela, with whom revolution and rebellion against the established government have become chronic, it is to be hoped that the present convention of peace will lead to a more permanent result than those which have preceded it, and that Venezuela may yet be a land of constitutional liberty, of law, and of order ; and that its people, instead of being impoverished by its continual revolutions and fratricidal warfare, may be rich in the possession of a good and stable government, wisely and honestly administered.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

THOMAS N. STILWELL.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Pruyn to Mr. Seward.

No. 3.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, June 18, 1868.

SIR : In the dispatch of the minister resident, No. 34, dated May 27, 1868, there was expressed the hope that the treaty of peace then recently concluded between the contending factions in this country would be permanent. The result has been otherwise. This treaty was not accepted by General Monagas and the revolutionary party in the eastern States of the republic.

Having already in the field a considerable army, he continued his advance on Caracas, (not respecting the treaty which had been made without his knowledge or consent.)

It is reported that he is now within fifteen or twenty miles of the city, with an army of about four thousand men.

General Bruzual, the acting President, is making the most active preparations for the defense of the city. He has now at his disposal about two thousand five hundred men, and is expecting large re-enforcements from the eastern States of the republic, and will probably take the field in person. On the 15th instant he issued a proclamation, which, in effect, was a declaration of martial law. Since then very many of the able-bodied citizens have been seized and forced into the army, and all kinds of available property, including horses and cattle, have been appropriated by the government without scruple. I regret very much to inform you that the persons and property of foreigners resident here have by no means been properly respected.

Outrages of the most high-handed character have, as I learn, been committed.

No American citizens have suffered, that I am aware of. I promptly demanded and procured the release of two, who had been wrongfully arrested and taken to the barracks, to be forced into the ranks of the army. The government are preparing to hold the city to the last extremity. Barricades are building in several of the principal streets, and the government mansion itself is being made ready for defense.

Yesterday, the 17th instant, I attended by invitation a conference of the diplomatic and consular corps, called together by Señor Leal, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Brazil.

There were present the representatives of the Argentine Confederation,

Belgium, Brazil, Chili, Denmark, England, France, Italy, Spain, the United States of America, and the United States of Colombia. I was informed that the object of the meeting was to decide if the diplomatic and consular body should offer their friendly services to bring about an interview between General Bruzual, the acting President, and General Monagas, chief of the insurgent forces. Knowing full well that it was the settled and invariable policy of my government to abstain from all interference in the domestic affairs of other states, I, in common with the representatives of France and Chili, refused to discuss the question until I should be informed that the proposed offer of friendly services was desired by the government of Venezuela.

Thereupon the Brazilian envoy, and the consular officer charged with the interests of the United States of Colombia, were appointed a committee to find out in an unofficial manner the disposition of the government. They immediately made a friendly and informal visit to Mr. Urrutia, minister of finance, at his private residence, where they found also General Bruzual, who declared that he would be very much pleased to accept the proposed offer of friendly services, if made. As the consular officer of Colombia, above mentioned, is known to be on terms of the greatest intimacy with Mr. Urrutia, and as he and the envoy of Brazil went immediately from the conference to the house of Mr. Urrutia, it may be reasonably supposed, especially as they there met General Bruzual, that this government was really desirous of the friendly services of the diplomatic and consular body, although with real Spanish pride and reserve they were too haughty to come out and ask for them in a frank open manner. With this fact in view, I yielded my assent, together with the rest of the minority of the meeting, to the note, a copy of which is herewith inclosed, (marked inclosure No. 1,) offered by the majority, a translation of which is herewith appended, (marked inclosure No. 2.) Copies of this note, the meeting decided, were to be dispatched immediately to Generals Bruzual and Monagas. If either of them refused the offer therein contained, the offer was to be considered as withdrawn from the other. Together with the representatives of France, Chili, and some others, I took the strongest ground against any offer or attempt by the diplomatic and consular corps at mediation, intervention, or arbitration between this government and its citizens in armed rebellion. Then it was unanimously declared, as the sense of the meeting, that the offer of friendly services conveyed in the note was only to be considered as an offer to arrange an interview (both parties consenting) between the two distinguished gentlemen therein named. Such interview once established, it was declared that all action in the matter on the part of the diplomatic and consular corps, as a collective body, was to cease entirely. Committees were appointed to deliver copies of the notes to Generals Bruzual and Monagas, and the conference adjourned, subject to the call of the presiding officer, Señor Leal, envoy of Brazil.

If an interview between the opposing chieftains can be brought about, and the present troubles of the country settled without further bloodshed, thanks will be due, among others, to the diplomatic and consular corps at Caracas. Whatever be the result, they will have the consciousness of having used every exertion that their duty permitted in the cause of peace and humanity.

I will endeavor, sir, to keep you fully advised as to all that may transpire here during this important crisis, and meanwhile I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant.

ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

LEGATION OF BRAZIL,
Caracas, June 17, 1868.

The diplomatic and consular agents resident in Caracas, in view of the critical and delicate situation in which the country finds itself, and of the desires of an adjustment having been frustrated, by which both the government and chief of the eastern militias are animated, and in union with the friendly sentiments of their respective governments towards Venezuela, have authorized the undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of his Majesty the Emperor of Brazil, to tender the government of the republic, as likewise to General José Tadeo Monagas, their unanimous good offices tending to renew the conferences and negotiations for peace, and to avoid the effusion of blood between fellow countrymen.

The diplomatic and consular agents, assured of the elevated and patriotic views of the government and General Monagas, take pleasure in believing that there is only needed a conference in order to realize the pacification that is desired.

The undersigned, while making this announcement to the minister of foreign affairs, renews to him the assurance of his high regard.

FELIPE JOSÉ PEREIRA LEAL.

Most Excellent MINISTER OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS of the United States of Venezuela.

No. 4.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, June 26, 1868.

SIR: In dispatch No. 3, dated June 18, 1868, it was related that at a conference of the diplomatic and consular corps, held the day previous, committees were appointed to endeavor to arrange an interview between General Bruzual, acting President, and General Monagas, chief of the insurgent forces, then threatening Caracas.

The efforts of these committees were successful. An interview took place on the 19th instant at San Souci, the country house of the consul-general of Hamburg, about three miles east of this city.

Each chieftain was accompanied by a few followers and two confidential advisers. They discussed together nearly the whole day, but were unable to arrive at any agreement; so the affair was left to the arbitrament of battle. On the 20th and 21st instant preparations for immediate hostilities were everywhere visible, and at an early hour on the morning of the 22d the fighting began; the forces of government being estimated at two thousand three hundred men, those of the revolution at three thousand three hundred, all told.

On the 22d battle was given by the government troops at Chacao, a small village just east of Caracas, to the advancing enemy. The government forces were totally routed and fell back, in great disorder, to a strong position within the city lines, the square of the Candelaria, which was fortified with cannon.

On the 23d instant the fighting continued within the city with similar results, the government forces being steadily driven back from stronghold to stronghold, firing from behind fortified windows and barricades, which, in every case, were taken by the determined assaults of the enemy, who, regardless of the deadly fire poured upon them, advanced to victory with irresistible valor.

On the evening of the 24th nothing remained to the government forces, still commanded by General Bruzual, but the government square and the buildings facing on it, comprising, besides private edifices, the government mansion, the cathedral, and the archiepiscopal palace. All of these were fortified and defended. The whole of the night of the 24th the battle raged fiercely for the possession of these buildings, which were finally taken by the revolutionary forces, in every case by approaching them through the houses in their immediate rear. Before five o'clock, on the morning of the 25th, all was quiet. General Bruzual took refuge in the house of the chargé d'affaires of France, and escaped, in a few hours, to La Guayra. General Colina, one of his chief officers, was taken, wounded, into the British legation. General Aristiqueta, with the remnants of Bruzual's forces, fled to the barracks of La Trinidad, a strong position on high ground, on the northern edge of the city. Being surrounded he surrendered with his men, without firing a shot, on the afternoon of the 25th. The inhabitants of the city, who had remained shut up in their houses during the three days of the siege, came forth gladly on the morning of the 25th, and welcomed the conquering heroes who had delivered them from the unjust and tyrannical rule of the Bruzual government, and among whom were many of their relatives and dearest friends.

Since their entrance yesterday morning, the revolutionary forces have behaved in the most exemplary manner, and are working as hard as possible at burying the dead, removing barricades, cleaning the streets, and restoring the city to its normal appearance.

The inhabitants are busy nursing the wounded in the hospitals and private dwellings. Everything is being done to alleviate their condition. The killed and wounded of both armies are estimated at a total of over one thousand; of these the revolution lost probably three out of every four, owing to their men being exposed in taking the barricades and fortified positions of their opponents.

The city is now under the military rule of General José Tadeo Monagas, commander-in-chief of the revolutionary forces.

It is expected that in a day or two a provisional government will be declared, of which, if it occur, I will have the honor to inform you in due course.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, July 1, 1868.

SIR: On the evening of the 29th ultimo I received a circular (inclosure No. 1) bearing date June 28, 1868, from the provisional government, announcing, as you will see by the translation of the same, (inclosure No. 2, herewith appended,) that they had organized, in accordance with the decree of General José Tadeo Monagas, chief of the revolutionary forces, published in El Federalista newspaper, No. 1,450, Caracas, June 27, 1868. A translation of that decree will be found in inclosure No. 3. Inclosure No. 4 contains my reply to the circular of the provisional government above referred to. It will be observed that I merely formally acknowledge the receipt of the circular, as I have not as yet received the formal and solemn assurances I require of the intentions of this government to carry out in good faith its treaties and conventions with foreign powers, particularly those with the United States. The revolution has been a great success.

I think its permanent triumph is sure. It undoubtedly represents the popular will.

The new government is composed of men of great ability and the highest personal character, chosen without distinction of party, who will administer the affairs of the nation in a constitutional, just, and republican manner.

Bruzual, I hear, has escaped from La Guayra to Puerto Cabello, with one or two war vessels and a few hundred men, with a view, I suppose, of establishing himself there. General Monagas is about to follow by the interior, with a large and well-equipped army, flushed with victory and confident of future triumphs.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA, FOREIGN AFFAIRS DEPARTMENT, CENTRAL SECTION—
No. 1.

[Circular.]

CARACAS, June 28, 1868.

In conformity with the decree promulgated yesterday by the general and chief of the revolution army, and which was published in the Federalista, No. 1,450, the individuals appointed to constitute, as ministers, the national executive administration, have assembled to-day at the government house, and have declared it installed under the character of provisional, after having elected the undersigned to preside over them.

The new government intends to fulfill worthily the duties prescribed by the confidence which has been placed in it; and, being among the principal ones to cultivate the good relations of Venezuela with the friendly nations, is happy to inform the commercial agent in charge of the American legation that it will be very satisfactory to him to carry out this purpose.

The undersigned avails himself of this opportunity to present to Mr. Pruy the testimony of his distinguished consideration.

GUILLERMO TELL VILLEGAS.

COMMERCIAL AGENT

In charge of the Legation of the United States of America.

DECREE.

ARTICLE 1. The heads of the national executive administration shall continue being the same that the letter of the constitution establishes, and shall be presided over by one of the six ministers of the cabinet, whom his colleagues may elect by absolute majority of votes.

Proviso.—The vacancies that may occur in said ministry shall be filled by election and vote in absolute majority of the remaining ministers.

ART. 2. On the members of the ministry being appointed, the minister designated that shall preside over it, and thus reconstituted the national executive power, the latter shall proceed to urge the States to send their senators and deputies to the constitutional congress of 1869, the consequent popular elections being holden.

ART. 3. I appoint to serve the six ministers that the law establishes the following citizens, namely: For that of the interior and justice, Citizen Mateo Guerra Marciano; for that of the treasury, Citizen Marcos Santana; for that of war and navy, Citizen General Domingo Monagas; for that of the foreign relations, Citizen Doctor Guillermo

Tell Villegas; for that of the public works, Citizen Doctor Nicanor Borges; for that of the public credit, Citizen Doctor Antonio Parejo.

ART. 4. Immediately that the citizens appointed have accepted their offices constituting the council of ministers, and appointed who shall preside over it, the exercise of all administrative functions in national affairs ceases on the part of whatsoever other authorities de facto or de jure at present existing; and the revolutionary forces shall remain under the orders of the national executive, in such form reconstituted.

Proviso.—The actual general-in-chief of the armies of the revolution shall relinquish that character with which he has been invested by the people when the complete pacification of the country and the government thereof, conformable to the federal democratic system, shall conclude the task for the performance of which he has been called to that post.

Let it be communicated and published.

Given in Caracas on the 27th of June, 1868, fifty-eighth of the national independence, and the thirty-eighth of the republic of Venezuela.

JOSÉ TADEO MONAGAS.

[Circular.]

PUERTO CABELLO, June 29, 1868.

Fifth year of the law, and tenth of the federation.

CITIZENS! I have the honor to address you, and of informing you that the city of Caracas being invaded by factious commanded by General José Tadeo Monagas, to overthrow the constitutional government, the incumbent of the national executive of the Union, in conformity to No. 16 of the 72d article of the fundamental chart, decided on the removal of the federal district from the expressed city to this of Puerto Cabello, where it finds itself established, performing the functions and discharging the duties which the constitution and laws of the republic assign it.

By the accompanying official bulletin you will be apprised of the appointment of the ministry, and with the other resolutions and decrees issued by this government, that emanate from the events above expressed.

The national executive hopes that you will be pleased to transmit the corresponding notification to the government that you so worthily represent.

I avail myself of the opportunity to reiterate to you the assurance of my distinguished consideration.

God and federation!

I, Manuel E. Bruzual, in charge of the presidency of the United States of Venezuela, considering—

1. That the city of Caracas, appointed as the federal district, has been invaded by the factions commanded by General José Tadeo Monagas;

2. That, by the number 16 of the 72d article of the constitution of the Union, the national executive is authorized to remove transitorily, in such emergency, to the place he may designate; and,

3. That the President of the State of Carabobo has given his assent for the general government to continue exercising its functions in the city of Puerto Cabello—

Do decree:

ARTICLE 1. That, while the city of Caracas finds itself occupied by the mentioned factions, the city of Puerto Cabello shall be appointed as the residence of the national executive.

ART. 2. That the employés of the district invaded by the factions shall proceed to occupy their respective posts in the city of Puerto Cabello, and on not doing so shall be substituted without debarring any other proceeding which may have to be pursued against them, if they have incurred treason.

ART. 3. Let it be published and circulated.

Given in the dispatch hall of the national executive, in Puerto Cabello, on the 27th of June, 1868.

I, Manuel E. Bruzual, in charge of the presidency of the United States of Venezuela. In consideration that the port of La Guayra finds itself occupied by the faction that General José Tadeo Monagas commands, it being obligatory for this reason to impede all maritime commerce with said port, do decree:

ARTICLE 1. The blockade of the port of La Guayra is declared in all the extent embraced between the port of Colombia and Cape Cordera.

ART. 2. The chief of the national squadron remains charged to carry into effect said blockade, preventing with all the forces found under his orders the arrival of national or foreign vessels on the expressed coast.

ART. 3. The same chief of the national squadron shall make the corresponding notification to the captains of vessels that are bound to La Guayra; and in case that, notwithstanding the notification, they should pretend to violate the blockade, he shall seize them, taking them to Puerto Cabello, in order to be tried according to the laws of the matter.

ART. 4. If, on making the notification and visit to the vessels that attempt to violate the blockade, contraband of war should be found in them, notwithstanding that, by the documents presented, the procedure of the captains should appear justified, because they had not had in the port of their departure, nor in any other point of their transit, any knowledge of the present decree, they shall be in like manner seized and tried according to law.

ART. 5. Let it be communicated to whom it may correspond; let it be published and circulated.

Given in the dispatch hall of the national executive, in Puerto Cabello, on the 27th of June, 1868.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, July 9, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to report to you that the ninety-third anniversary of our national independence was duly celebrated and respected in this capital.

The flags of the various foreign nations represented here were displayed from their respective legations; also that of Venezuela from the government mansion.

Mr. Villégas, the minister of foreign affairs in charge of the executive power, and also the secretary, Mr. Seijas, together with the diplomatic and consular corps, called on the legation, and the American citizens generally here also paid their respects.

Late on the afternoon of the 4th instant I received a communication from the minister of foreign affairs, informing me that the executive would receive on the 5th instant, that being the anniversary of Venezuelan independence. A translation of the communication above referred to will be found in inclosure No. 1.

On the morning of the 5th, in company with General David M. Talmage, United States commissioner, and one or two other American citizens of distinction, I called at the government mansion, where I found the whole cabinet, presided over by Mr. Villégas, the acting executive, receiving in the grand saloon. I paid my respects to the government in the following terms:

MR. PRESIDENT: In felicitating the government and people of Venezuela, in the name of the government and people of the United States, on this great and joyous anniversary of Venezuelan independence, permit me to observe that this day, however precious to the people of this nation, and also to those of mine, has a far higher and more solemn import as being an anniversary, and one of most glorious, of the triumph of republican principles.

The capacity of the masses for self-government has been proved by the terrible ordeal of civil war in my own country, and also in yours, Mr. President. In both the result has been equally a triumph of liberal principles. And in the formation of this government, of which you, sir, are the distinguished head, the great doctrine of popular rights has been vindicated, and liberty and justice have been established here on a sure and enduring basis.

I need not tell you, Mr. President, that republican principles are slowly but surely, with irresistible force, spreading over the whole civilized world. The governments of Europe, while still preserving the name and appearance of monarchies, are rapidly becoming subservient to the will of the people, which they no longer dare resist. The great reforms in England, the consolidation of the German and Italian nations, and many other events, apparent to all, conclusively prove this.

Although republican doctrines may be found in the writings of extreme antiquity, yet, sir, before the advent of our Lord and Saviour, Jesus Christ, but little regard was paid by the powerful few to the rights and needs of the suffering masses of humanity.

The sublime example and teachings of our Lord have so purified and inspired the human heart that all men, worthy of the name of men, strive and pray that just and liberal governments may be everywhere established. "Give us," said the immortal Lincoln, "a government of the people, for the people, and by the people, in which all shall have equal rights, without distinction of race or color."

We, Mr. President, may soon pass away from this life, our nations and even our race may perish in the course of events; but, sir, the republican principles of equal rights and popular government, which we profess, will endure as long as human society shall exist, and the Christian religion prevail among men. Permit me, sir, to offer to you and your government the assurances of my most distinguished consideration.

Mr. Villégas replied briefly, in suitable and dignified terms, after which the interview terminated.

Later in the day the legation called on the surviving heroes who fought and bled for Venezuelan independence, Generals Monagas, Soublette, and Blanco, and also on the family of General Paez. This compliment was highly appreciated by them, and handsomely acknowledged by the public press.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

No. 11.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, July 20, 1868.

SIR: Having received, during the fortnight ending July 6, several communications from the United States consul at Puerto Cabello, both of an official and private character, in which were described the terrible state of affairs existing there, that the life and property of foreigners were in daily peril, and that there was an immediate necessity of a United States war vessel to protect our interests at that place, (as you have without doubt heard,) I wrote to the naval officer in command at Santa Cruz, informing him of these facts, and requesting that a man-of-war should be immediately sent to Puerto Cabello. I also mentioned to him the fact that the so-called Bruzual government had declared a blockade of La Guayra and the coast, which, even if legal, I had no idea they would be able legally to enforce. My information and opinions as to both of these matters were in accordance with those of all the foreign representatives and foreign merchants in Caracas, La Guayra, and Puerto Cabello. During the last days of June I had serious thoughts of sending a special messenger, in a vessel chartered for the purpose, to Santa Cruz and Saint Thomas for a war vessel, but as the cost of such a step would have been at least six hundred dollars in United States gold coin, I determined to wait a little longer for the regular packet of July 7, from La Guayra to Saint Thomas.

This packet the government ordered detained for twenty-four hours, until the evening of the 8th, and the special messenger to whom I had intrusted the mail of the legation, including the dispatch to the commanding naval officer at Santa Cruz, was in readiness to embark at that time. It so happened, however, that through some accident or neglect the government order was not obeyed, and the vessel sailed on the evening of the 7th; consequently the legation mail was left behind.

Reflecting on the serious state of affairs in this country, and also bearing in mind the fact that I had already delayed some ten days or more in sending for a war vessel, I determined that it was my duty, particularly as the state of affairs was becoming daily worse, to send at any expense or trouble for a war vessel. The case being so urgent I decided to go in person, everything being quiet in Caracas. I gave the legation in the hands of a confidential friend, an American gentleman of high character. I was not obliged to charter a special vessel, having, after some difficulty, made an arrangement to go to Saint Thomas in a small vessel of about forty tons, together with an agent of this government, who had business there of a pressing nature.

This was much less expensive than taking a special vessel. I left Caracas on the 9th instant, and La Guayra on the 10th. The vessel was of the most miserable and uncomfortable description, very slow and very dirty. She had a bad leak, and the pumps had to be worked very frequently. We arrived at Saint Thomas at six o'clock on the evening of the 14th, having suffered every inconvenience on the voyage.

I immediately saw the acting consul, Mr. E. B. Simmons, of the house of G. W. Smith & Co., who told me that there were no vessels of the United States navy either at Saint Thomas or Santa Cruz, and that the only places to which information could be speedily conveyed, where he thought any of our men-of-war might be found, were Jamaica and Aspinwall. I accordingly wrote dispatches to the United States consuls at both of those localities, conveying information as to the state of affairs in this country, and asking them to request the nearest officer commanding any United States war vessel to proceed hither immediately. These dispatches went on the 15th instant by the English mail steamer.

I left Saint Thomas on the 16th in the regular mail packet, and arrived at La Guayra late on the evening of the 18th. On the 19th I returned to Caracas and resumed charge of the legation, finding all in order.

I was absent from my post exactly ten days.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, July 21, 1868.

SIR: In dispatch No. 7, dated July 8, 1868, there may be found, in inclosure No. 10, a translation of a proclamation by the so-called Bruzual government of the "blockade of the Port of La Guayra in all the extent embraced between the port of Colombia and Cape Cordera." I beg to refer you to this, and to the original of the same, (marked inclosure No. 9, in dispatch No. 7,) dated Puerto Cabello, June 27, 1868, and signed "M. E. Bruzual," and also "El Ministro de Guerra y Marina, L. Arismendi." No attempt was made to enforce the blockade until July 11th, on the morning of which day the following war vessels, manned by the partisans of Bruzual, appeared off La Guayra, viz., the steamer Bolivar and the Goleta Mariscal, without giving notice of the enforcement of the blockade to any person. They remained before La Guayra until the evening of the 15th, when they left it, as is supposed, to return to Puerto Cabello, having captured during their stay only two small coasting vessels, loaded with fish and fruit.

On the 11th instant, the members of the diplomatic and consular body called, by informal invitation, at the government house, Mr. Villegas, the minister of foreign affairs, wishing to consult with them about the blockade. Mr. Villegas argued strongly as to its illegality, and appeared anxious that the representatives of foreign powers should declare that they would not respect it. But these gentlemen declined making any declaration on the subject, reserving to themselves the liberty to act as each might deem proper, under such circumstances as should arise.

On the 16th instant a dispatch in relation to the blockade was received at this legation from the minister of foreign affairs, which will be found in inclosure No. 1, and a translation of the same in inclosure No. 2.

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS—No. 82.

[Circular.]

CARACAS, July 16, 1868, 5 and 10.

The undersigned, minister of foreign affairs of the United States of Venezuela, has the honor to state to the incumbent of the legation of the United States, conformably to a resolution of the national executive, that the blockade decreed from the port of Colombia to Cape Cordera by General Manuel E. Bruzual is null and non-existent, as well from the want of legitimate power to decree it as from the lack of the requisites that the law of nations demands.

In unfolding the reasons that give rise to this declaration, the undersigned will add some of the arguments that justify him, according to the practice and principles generally admitted.

The capitulation has already been communicated to the incumbent of the legation of the United States, whereby the remainder of the forces of the government that existed in Caracas surrendered to the general-in-chief of the armies of the revolution, and bound themselves to the delivery of the towns of La Guayra and Puerto Cabello, and other points garrisoned by the national forces, of the vessels of the navy and of the elements of war that they might have. The chief of staff stipulated in the name of General Bruzual, who had spoken to several members of the diplomatic body of his disposition to surrender himself, desiring only guarantees for his person. The observation that Bruzual retains General Aristiguieta in Puerto Cabello in the same character of chief of staff, and of his not having contradicted the document which is treated of, gives more weight to this statement. From the instant, when, in virtue thereof, the combat ceased and the chief and the troops benefited by the capitulation remained at liberty, the government that was so called lost its character of a belligerent, without the violation of the word of honor pledged to the fulfilment of an act that all its circumstances rendered sacred, being able to restore it. It is just, then, to consider the faction of Puerto Cabello in the same case in which they would find themselves; for instance, the chiefs of the vessels, if they had risen up, on their own account, against the nation; and if in such mutineers no one would recognize the rights of belligerents, with like parity they must be denied to the others. Now, taking into consideration that they are reduced to one single point, already besieged by numerous forces, and opposed or without support in all the States of the Venezuelan Union; and that they cannot produce any other result than that of augmenting the misfortunes of the country, and prolonging the evils from which the revolution has sprung, with grievous injury moreover to foreign commerce, we are constrained to conclude that they have no authority to decree blockades, nor any other such measures.

As it relates to the blockade of General Bruzual, setting aside its illegitimacy, there would be wanting to it, in the first place, the diplomatic notification, which European powers have not though proper to preclude, as has been seen in the last wars of that continent. It will always be very useful to prevent the ignorance thereof from occasioning damages to the commerce of neutrals.

In the second place, the blockade of the coast being declared from the port of Colombia to Cape Cordera, it is not possible that the presence of one steamer and one schooner would be sufficient to impede effectually communication with the aforementioned coast.

In the third place, the decree commands the chief of the so-titled squadron to prevent the arrival of national and foreign vessels, when the blockade should have for its object to close as well their entrance as their departure; to render impossible, not only commerce, but every species of communication with the place blockaded. Only are vessels permitted to depart that might have entered before the blockade was established.

In the fourth place, it is ordered in the decree that the special notification of the blockade be made to the ships that are bound to La Guayra; but it is not provided that there should be entered on the papers of navigation of the same the day, and the place, or the latitude, in which they may have been found before being notified, as the treaty of Venezuela and France of 25th of May, 1843, in its 19th article requires, and also that which the republic and Denmark signed on the 19th December, 1862, article 17.

In the fifth place, vessels that pretend to violate the blockade shall be seized, and taken to Puerto Cabello, to be tried according to the laws of the matter.

The author of the decree forgot that the only tribunal called to take cognizance of prizes, according to article 89 of the constitution, is the high federal court, and that this body, appointed by congress, continues discharging its functions in Caracas. Any other tribunal whatsoever, created to take cognizance of prizes, would be unconstitutional, so much the more so since the executive has no power to establish them, nor to appoint judges.

In the sixth place, the same decree, which is being analyzed, recognizes, in some manner, in the 5th article, the necessity of the diplomatic notification that it has not before prescribed, and, moreover, orders the seizure and trial of the vessels that attempt to violate the blockade, and in which contraband of war is found.

Here the treaty of Venezuela with the United States is broken, according to which, in its 16th article, ships which carry contraband of war must be left at liberty to pursue their voyage, if their commander offers to deliver it, not being in quantity greater than what may be conveniently received on board the capturing vessel. By the same treaty contraband is declared an object of confiscation, but free and in no manner contaminated by the goods prohibited, the vessel loaded with them, and the rest of the cargo.

The same was stipulated by the treaty in force of this country with Denmark. Finally, the continuity of the blockade would not exist, because of the two vessels thereunto destined, the steamer is not well provided with coal, and in case of making seizures, having to take to Puerto Cabello the ships detained, they would have necessarily to withdraw.

Since the preceding was written, facts have come to confirm the exactness thereof. The supposed blockading vessels steered their course last night for Puerto Cabello, and to-day the steamer Talisman, hailing from Liverpool, has arrived at La Guayra, without any hindrance. More than sufficiently founded therefore, is the hope, that the government entertains that the diplomatic and consular bodies will not acknowledge the pretended blockade, extending the protests necessary for the effect, and acting in consequence thereof.

The undersigned, &c., &c. Union and liberty.

GUILLERMO TELL VILLEGAS.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, July 22, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to forward herewith, for the information of the department, a communication dated July 7 but received July 18 inclosure No. 1, with the translation of the same, inclosure No. 2, relative to the conduct of General J. M. Aristiguieta, the chief of staff of General Bruzual, before and during the recent siege of Caracas. In inclosure No. 3 will be found a copy of the argument between General Aristiguieta and General José T. Monagas, concerning terms of capitulation, &c., and inclosure No. 4 contains a translation of the same. * * *

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, CENTRAL BUREAU—
No. 75.

CARACAS, July 7, 1868.

Fifth year of the law and tenth of the federation.

The undersigned, minister of foreign affairs of the United States of Venezuela, has the honor to call the attention of the incumbent of the legation of the United States to the inclosed authorized copy of the convention which, on the 25th of last month, was entered into with General J. M. Aristiguieta, chief of staff of the forces of General Bruzual: a communication which had not been made heretofore, because it was still doubted that the convention, conceded by the generosity of the conquerors, would have been violated to the point of attacking neutral interests.

After the army of General Bruzual became completely conquered within this city, where it had intrenched itself in its rash resistance, those who had taken refuge in the barrack of Saint Carlos proposed to surrender themselves to the conquerors. Their surrender was accepted and guarantees were conceded to them under the stipulations of that covenant, wherein General Aristiguieta in his expressed characters bound himself by his word of honor to deliver up all the individuals of the troops and elements of war upon which the government counted, which he had defended, the town of La Guayra, and the forces there existing, and to give orders for the delivery of the vessels of war of the nation, the castle and town of Puerto Cabello, and other points garrisoned by national forces, together with all the elements of war that they might have.

Far from having fulfilled the convention, the conquered took away with them from La Guayra the garrison, armament, and ammunitions, not without first rendering useless the artillery, too cumbersome to transport, and, after seizing the vessels of war, went off to Puerto Cabello.

From the facts set forth, and others that are notorious, it is evidently deduced that no right assists the refugees in Puerto Cabello to decree blockades, nor any other measures hostile to the government of the republic.

As the national executive has information that the herein mentioned legation has received some note relative to the matter, he has deemed it opportune to convey this copy to it, as a new foundation for its ulterior proceedings, which, the undersigned hopes with reason, will be conformable to the principles of justice that have always distinguished the relations of friendly nations with Venezuela.

The undersigned, &c., &c. Union and liberty.

GUILLERMO TELL VILLEGAS.

[Translation.]

The general-in-chief of the armies of the revolution that have occupied the city of Caracas, to the end of causing to cease fraternal bloodshed, and the painful situation that afflicts the country, concedes to all the individuals who have sustained the government of General Manuel E. Bruzual the guarantees that the constitution grants; in consequence, if they should desire to go out of the territory of the republic, passports in that event shall be issued to them.

The same general-in-chief insures and guarantees to General Jesus Ma. Aristiquieta, chief of staff, his departure from the territory by sea, preferring therefor to make use of a national vessel, if there should be any in La Guayra, in which case General Natividad Mendoza shall be the chief of said vessel.

General Jesus Ma. Aristiquieta, in his character of chief of staff of the defensive forces of that government, shall deliver up to the general-in-chief of the armies of the revolution, or to whom may represent him, all the individuals of the troops which he commands, as likewise also the elements of war, upon which the government counted that he has defended.

The same General Aristiquieta, in the character he holds, shall also deliver up the town of La Guayra, with the forces that defend or garrison it, and shall give orders that the vessels of war of the nation, the castle, and town of Puerto Cabello, and other points garrisoned by the national forces, together with all the elements of war that they may contain, be also delivered up to the general-in-chief of the armies of the revolution, or to whom may represent him.

General Aristiquieta, for the fulfillment of what may correspond to him, according to the preceding articles, pledges his word of honor, towards which end, he signs the present act, which is extended in duplicate.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, July 23, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to forward you a communication, marked inclosure No. 1, with the translation of the same, inclosure No. 2, from this government, concerning certain Venezuelan war vessels now in the possession of Bruzual and his partisans. You will also be pleased to find in inclosure No. 3 a translation of a decree of this government, declaring that any sale, &c., of such vessels, or of any of them, on the part of Bruzual or his followers, to be null and void.

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, CENTRAL BUREAU—
No. 82.

[Circular.]

CARACAS, July 16, 1868, 5th and 10th.

The undersigned, minister of foreign affairs of the United States of Venezuela, executes an order of the national executive by communicating to the incumbent of the legation of the United States, in the hope that, through his respectable channel, it may come to the knowledge of the authorities and citizens of his nation, especially of those who reside in its colonies of the Antillas, the annexed decree, wherein the government notifies that all sales, transfers, or contracts that may be made, for account of the military mutiny of Puerto Cabello, in regard to the steamers Bolivar, Mapararia, and Pururechi, the schooner Mariscal, and whatsoever other vessels of those belonging to the war marine of the United States of Venezuela, are null and of no value.

Not only would such nullity result from the disavowal made by almost all those of the government that was, and that finds itself to-day reduced to the town of Puerto Cabello, this latter event being, nevertheless, in consequence of the infraction of the capitulation which their chief asked for and obtained, and which produced the interruption of the attack of the last barrack of the capital, but also from the following reason: The President himself of the republic, in full exercise of his powers, and without obstacle of any kind, has not, by the federal constitution, the least right to sell, transfer, nor obligate in any other way the national properties. It corresponds, solely and exclusively, to congress, on the strength of article 44, that grants to the legislature the power to pass laws of a general character that may be necessary. And as, according to its articles 104 and 105, all usurped authority is ineffectual, and the acts thereof null, all corporations or authorities are forbidden the exercise of whatever functions that be not granted to them by the constitution or the laws, it follows, without the least difficulty, that the executive is incompetent to sell, transfer, or contract, in regard to the property of the nation. How much more so will be the faction that has risen up with Puerto Cabello and the vessels by the means described.

Lastly, if the President of the Union has assigned in the constitution the power to make contracts of national interest conformably to law, it is under the express restriction of submitting them to the legislature, without whose approving vote they do not acquire any binding force.

The undersigned, &c., &c., &c.

Union and liberty!

GUILLERMO TELL VILLÉGAS.

CARACAS, July 17, 1868, 5th and 10th.

As it appears by the decree, whereof a copy is inclosed, that the provisional executive of the United States of Venezuela has opened the coasting trade to the foreign flags for the term of six months, it being possible that it may happen that some citizens of friendly countries may want to avail themselves of this concession that is proffered to them, the undersigned, minister of foreign affairs of the republic, hastens to inform you of such determination, in order that, being authentically assured of the existence thereof, you may be able to convey the same, if it should be deemed advisable, to the notice of your fellow-citizens, through the adequate medium.

The undersigned renews, &c., &c.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, August 6, 1868.

SIR: I herewith forward to you inclosure No. 1, a translation of a communication from the government of Venezuela. Inclosure No. 2 contains a paper accompanying the said communication, and a translation of the same may be found in inclosure No. 3. I have no particular comment to offer on the above communications. I believe that the ten per cent. offered is considered very little indeed by the foreign representatives and foreign merchants generally. As a President and a new congress are about to be elected, I venture to suggest to the department the propriety of instructing this legation to try to have some measures taken by them (the President and congress) to expedite the payment of foreign liquidation claims, particularly those of citizens of the United States. The minister of foreign affairs has desired me to request my government to accept the ten per cent. arrangement, stating that, as soon as congress meets, the present government will request that body to take measures calculated to facilitate the payment of foreign claims. The minister of foreign affairs has also requested me to ask of my government that they should instruct the representative of the United States at Paris to induce (conjointly with the representative of England, Denmark, the Netherlands, Italy, and Spain, if possible) the government of France to accept the ten per cent. arrangement above mentioned. All of which is respectfully submitted.

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, CENTRAL BUREAU—
No. 139.

CARACAS, 4th August, 1868, 5th and 10th.

The republic enters upon a new era. The nation, tired of seeing the most pressing necessities of all governments neglected, even those of its own existence and honor, showed itself discontented and distressed, clamored for the remedy, and her complaints not sufficing to obtain it, at last she rose up in arms and overthrew the rulers who had placed their will instead of the law. The reform of the public treasury is one of the principal objects of the triumphant revolution. It would not fulfill this part of its programme, it would not resuscitate credit without restoring its value to official speech, without paying the most profound respect to what is called public faith, without doing justice to all rights. Here is what the men charged provisionally with the general administration intend. As they proceed with perfect good faith, not pretending to undo to-morrow the work of to-day, they have devoted themselves to the study of the fiscal situation, and, after frequent and mutual consultation, have decided upon the plan contained in the basis annexed. It is what they are able to offer as the result of their investigations, and of their desire to discharge satisfactorily the duties that they have contracted. Scanty have been the receipts of the custom-houses, which constitute the only revenue of the union, and scanty will they continue to be; but such as they are, the executive will divide them integrally among those who may have a title to partake of them, in proportion to what corresponds to each one. If it were possible to satisfy them at once, nothing would afford greater pleasure. And to-day circumstances inevitably prescribe another course. The government delivers to its creditors what it has in order that they may go on paying themselves in a slow but sure way, without the fear of sudden and unexpected suspensions. The delay in the payments will become sufficiently compensated with the solution of the corresponding interest, as even great and opulent nations practice it, that, so long as they insure the interest on the capital loaned, do not think it important to provide for its redemption. It thinks that the principles of the strictest honesty prescribe such conduct as well to nations as to individuals; and that the creditors, in their equity, cannot but assent to the inclosed proposition. The government does not find itself in full and peaceable possession of the custom-houses, nor has the resistance terminated of the partisans of the fallen power. The expenses of the war are equally considerable and urgent. Nevertheless, even in the midst of their difficulties, the administration of the national interests turn their sight towards the conventions infringed, the foreign affairs neglected, bankruptcy, and want of confidence looked upon with indifference, and as if it were to form a permanent state; and as a consequence of all, the glorious name of Venezuela divested of the considerations which were once extended to it. To raise it up from this prostration, redeem its fame, insure the benevolence of friendly nations, this is the object aimed at. For so rational as just a purpose the co-operation and countenance of the contracting governments must be relied upon and they are relied upon, the which will not forget the crowd of old and new obligations that continue overwhelming the treasury, and which, if they remained buried and completely forgotten, would justify him who should bring against the revolution the charge of its not having realized the principles that it inscribed upon its banner, which inflamed patriotism, and led it on to victory.

On the other part it is evident that the effects of moral sentiments, of upright intention, of probity and a sense of honor, are always deserving of support.

We cannot refrain from doing that which, causing us no detriment, redounds to the benefit of others. What shall be our duty when we are asked for a thing that, if it benefits another, consults equally our own interests?

Such is the plan proposed, the adoption of which will effect, to the end of redeeming the liabilities of the republic, what is impossible to reach by any other means.

It will be put into execution when the embarrassments referred to terminate. Witness of the events of the republic, and endowed with the knowledge and impartiality necessary to judge of them correctly, it is to be hoped that the incumbent of the legation of the United States will present to the view of his government a faithful picture of the situation, which must, doubtless, have much influence in the manner of entertaining the annexed basis.

The undersigned, minister of foreign affairs of the United States of Venezuela, avails himself of this opportunity to renew to Mr. Pruyn the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

Union and liberty.

GUILLERMO TELL VILLÉGAS.

MR. ERASTUS C. PRUYN,
Incumbent of the Legation of the United States.

[Translation.]

Bases which are proposed :

First. The government of the republic, inspired with the desire of cultivating the most honorable and cordial relations with foreign governments, and the necessity of attending to international reclamations, already adjusted, or in the way of being so, that ascend to several millions of pesos, and after having taken into account that the ordinary revenues of the republic from imports cannot be calculated now for more than $4,000,000 per annum, and that the general arrangement of the treasury demands the equitable distribution of the national income, so that all the liabilities that weigh upon the treasury may be attended to as far as possible, at same time as the indispensable administrative service; believes it can only apply ten per cent. of said income for the reduction of international claims.

This assignment will produce at present about half a million of pesos per annum, but the preservation of peace would very shortly augment the figures. For the most urgent expenses of the public service sixty per cent. is required, with the remaining forty the different branches of the public debt are to be attended to.

As this can be graduated to $75,000,000, without including that arising from diplomatic conventions, and this latter will reach to $5,000,000, it is easy to comprehend the advantage that is conceded to it with respect to the other. It is proper, moreover, to bear in mind that in the thirty unities appropriated to the public debt of another character, foreigners will also have benefits, because some kinds of it belong to them entirely, and in the other they are interested for a large part.

Second. This basis being accepted by the foreign creditors, the government will proceed to settle and liquidate at once all reclamations pending, to the end that the mentioned fund of ten per cent. of the ordinary income from importations be applied, in the first place, to the payment of the interest of the whole debt, and in the second place, to its redemption, rated at so much per pound, until it becomes definitively paid off.

Third. For said appropriation of ten per cent. the government draws its orders for all the custom-houses to deliver it to the commissioners whom the creditors may designate, authorizing them to discount the notes at the current rate in each market.

Fourth. For the greater convenience of the creditors, and with the object that they may be able to put into circulation their respective titles, the government will ask the national congress for its authorization to issue titles of international public debt to the amount of claims; the interest and redemption of which should be paid in accordance with the preceding bases.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, August 6, 1868.

SIR: Yesterday, the 5th instant, I attended, by invitation, a conference, at the government mansion, between the minister of foreign affairs and the diplomatic representatives. There were present, besides his excellency, Mr. Villégas, the minister, the representatives of Brazil, England, Italy, Spain, and the United States. The minister said that he had invited us to meet with him to consult in reference to the presence of a war vessel of the Bruzualists in front of La Guayra, the steamer Maparari. He stated that, as we knew, there was a French war vessel at La Guayra, and that the French minister had gone there to consult with the commander of the same. He, the minister of foreign affairs, requested us to ask the French minister to detain his war vessel to protect foreign commerce in the waters of La Guayra. We, accordingly, each sent to him, the French minister, dispatches from our respective legations, making the above request in a qualified manner.

To-day I visited the French minister, Mr. A. Forest, who had returned from La Guayra, at his legation in this city, and he informed me that he considered it his duty to dispatch immediately the French war vessel above mentioned to Puerto Cabello, where it will arrive to-morrow or the day following.

With great respect, I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, August 6, 1868.

SIR: I beg to call your attention to the necessity of an occasional visit of a United States war vessel in the waters of Venezuela.

It is needless to enlarge on the desirableness of such a step. If the department would be pleased to instruct this legation to keep up a communication with the commanding officer of our naval forces in the West Indies, and if that officer should receive instructions from the Navy Department to keep this legation informed, from time to time, as to the whereabouts of the vessels of his squadron, it would, I believe, be easy for this legation to obtain the presence of a man-of-war in these waters when necessity might require. And the naval forces might also be relieved from the trouble and expense of paying useless visits here when not required.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 18th of June, No. 3, has been received, and it is found very interesting. The government and people of the United States are affected with profound sorrow by the new revolutionary convulsions which have occurred in Venezuela. Your report of the proceedings which you adopted in concert with other diplomatic and consular representatives at Caracas for the purpose of favoring the restoration of peace has been carefully examined.

It gives me pleasure to say that you seem to have manifested on that occasion proper moderation, discretion, and comity.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 1st of July, No. 5, which paper gives us very full information of the success of the revolution at Caracas, and of the establishment there of a provisional but military government. The forbearance which you have practiced in your correspondence with the provisional authorities was judicious and proper. You will for the present refrain from any formal recognition of the revolutionary authorities and on that subject will await directions from this department. This instruction, however, must not be understood as preventing you from holding informal communication with the de facto public authorities upon any matters which concern this government or affect the rights or interests of any citizens of the United States. If an explanation of this policy shall become necessary, it will be sufficient to say that, on the one hand, the United States do not deny the right of a people to change the forms of their republican government, even by revolutionary means if they find it necessary; nor, on the other hand, do they prematurely commit themselves to any new revolutionary government before it is manifest that the new government has been deliberately and fully acknowledged and accepted by the people.

What the United States always most earnestly desire, in regard to the South American republics, is, that they may acquire settled habits of law, order, internal peace, and tranquillity.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, August 22, 1868.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 8th of July, No. 7, together with certain papers thereunto annexed. Those papers are, first, a copy of a circular letter, which was addressed and transmitted to you on the 29th of June by Señor G. Paez, in which circular it is set forth that, the administration of General Bruzual having been forcibly dispossessed of Caracas, the capital of the United States of Venezuela, that government had removed itself to Puerto Cabello, and established itself there; and also that Señor Paez was acting in the capacity of minister for the departments of the interior and of justice. Second, a decree, made the 29th of June by General Bruzual as President of the United States of Venezuela, declaring Puerto Cabello should be held and occupied provisionally as the capital of the republic. Third, a similar decree of General Bruzual, appointing heads of departments for the government of Venezuela at Puerto Cabello. Fourth, a similar decree of General Bruzual, appointing generals to command the armies of Venezuela. Fifth, a similar decree of General Bruzual, declaring a naval blockade of so much of the Port La Guayra as extends on the sea-coast from Cape Cordera to Port Colombia.

The military occupation of Caracas by a de facto government, antagonistic and hostile to the government of General Bruzual, excuses you from formally acknowledging the reception of the papers thus enumerated; nevertheless, if occasion shall seem to require, it will then not be improper for you to let it be known in an unofficial and informal way that those papers were received by you, and transmitted to this department.

It contains an interesting account of the demonstrations which took place on the occasion of the anniversary of American independence, and also of the ceremonies which occurred on the succeeding day, namely, the 5th of July, which is the anniversary of Venezuelan independence.

These observances, which show that a lively interest in the cause of republican institutions is entertained by the people of Venezuela, are peculiarly gratifying. It is sincerely hoped that the expectations of peace, prosperity, and order, which were expressed by you on a later occasion, may prove to be well founded.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, August 22, 1868.

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 20th of July, No. 11. In that paper you relate to me that, under the pressure of civil distractions which are prevailing in Venezuela, you left Caracas on the 9th of July, made a voyage to St. Thomas, and returned on the 19th to Caracas, and that the object of that voyage was to procure some United States ship of war to visit the Venezuelan ports. With the better knowledge which is possessed here of the occupation of the North Atlantic squadron, it is not a matter of surprise that you failed to effect a communication with the admiral or other naval officer. The conception of your voyage was loyal and patriotic, and your proceedings are not disapproved. At the same time I respectfully suggest, for your considerate reflections, that, as a general rule, a consular, like a diplomatic officer, may expect to render most effective service by always remaining steadily at his post of duty. The highest wisdom of a diplomatic or consular agent in scenes of civil war consists in preserving coolness, equanimity, and impartiality between contending factions.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, August 22, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 6th of August, No. 21, has been received. It informs me that, in common with the representatives of Great Britain, Italy, and Spain, you have entered into a correspondence with the French minister at Caracas, in which he was requested, in a qualified manner, to detain a French ship of war, at the time lying at La Guayra, and that the French minister has answered that he is unable to comply with the request.

Diplomatic agreements between agents of foreign powers, hastily gotten up in a foreign country, under the pressure of revolutionary dangers, may be entirely erroneous in their objects, as they must be incomplete in form, and unreliable for want of adequate authority. Moreover, they unavoidably tend to produce international jealousies and conflicts. You will, therefore, carefully abstain from entering into any such negotiations, except in extreme cases, to be immediately reported to this department.

The circumstances under which the proceeding now under consideration has taken place being entirely unknown to this department, I regret that I am unable to express definitively any opinion upon the propriety thereof. As a general rule, representatives of the United States in foreign countries are expected to refrain from formal consultations or conferences with the representatives of other foreign countries. It is always to be remembered that any agreements which may be made by such representatives are likely to prove invalid, because they must take on the character of a treaty between the United States and other nations, while the Constitution of the United States expressly declares that no treaty shall ever be made between the United States and any other foreign state except by the President, with the consent of the Senate of the United States.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: I have received your dispatch of the 6th of August, No. 19, with its accompaniment, which is a communication from Señor Villégas, minister for foreign affairs, in which that minister submits to the United States for their consideration a plan for a gradual liquidation of the fiscal obligations of the republic of Venezuela; the which plan, if found acceptable by foreign creditors, it is supposed may be put into execution when the present revolutionary embarrassments of the country shall have terminated.

The plan seems to have been conceived in a spirit of justice and patriotism. At this distance, however, from Venezuela, it does not yet appear that the provisional government established at Caracas has become either so comprehensive in its jurisdiction, or so well consolidated, as to enable it to guarantee the national consent to a final arrangement for the extinction of the public debt. Moreover, it may be expected that a national congress or legislature will soon be convened by the provisional government, for the purpose of reorganizing and reconstructing the constitution of the republic. Under these circumstances, this government thinks it expedient to delay, for the present, the definitive consideration of the plan submitted for its consideration by the provisional government at Caracas, and await the hoped-for close of the existing revolution.

No. 26.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, September 4, 1868.

SIR: The last dispatch which I had the honor to address to you concerning the revolution in this country was No. 4, dated June 26, 1868. Soon after that date, as you have already been informed, a provisional government was established, which has ever since been working most admirably, being conducted with order, regularity, ability, and activity.

All, natives and foreigners, seemed to be satisfied with it. The army of the revolution, under General José Tadeo Monagas, as commander-in-chief, pursued its westward march. Valencia fell an easy prey to its irresistible power. The siege of Puerto Cabello was a more serious affair, the town being strongly defended by the Bruzualists who had established their so-called government there. They held the castle, situated on an island in the harbor, and had also at their disposal two or three war steamers. The siege lasted about ten days; the fighting was severe. The revolutionists lost fifty killed and one hundred and fifty wounded; the Bruzualists forty killed and seventy wounded.

At about 1 a. m., on the morning of the 15th ultimo, the Bruzualists, their ammunition being entirely exhausted, and the supply expected from Curaçoa not having arrived, abandoned Puerto Cabello, and fled in their steamers to Curaçoa, carrying with them their chief, General Bruzual, insensible from a wound made by a rifle ball two days previous, and who afterwards died at Curaçoa.

Our consuls at Puerto Cabello and Curaçoa have doubtless furnished you with the details of the events above recited.

The army of the revolution continues its westward march, but meets with little resistance. In thirty days, I think, the whole republic will be under control of the provisional government, which has, as far as I can learn, strictly respected the local rights of the States.

Never was there a revolution so triumphant. No candidate for president in the approaching election is named but General José Tadeo Monagas, and even in the candidates for state offices there is no opposition, except from members of the same party. As you are well aware, sir, there are no more impartial observers of political events in any community than the intelligent and wealthy merchants, particularly foreign merchants of respectability, who take no part in local politics, but who watch them carefully, having heavy interests at stake, which are almost certain to be affected by any change in the political barometer. In view of this fact, I deem it proper to send you a translation of a letter (see inclosure No. 1) from the principal merchants of La Guayra, both native and foreign, to General José Tadeo Monagas, commander-in-chief of the army of the revolution, on his arrival there after the capture of Puerto Cabello. Nothing, in my judgment, could be a stronger proof of the permanent triumph of the revolution. General Monagas, who is over eighty years of age, is in a very poor state of health. He is expected in Caracas in a few days.

General Guzman Blanco has arrived from Europe. It is not yet known if he intends to take any active part in politics. General Falcon remains at Curaçoa, and is said to be about to sail for Spain, with the intention of settling there. The period fixed by the constitution for the election of a new President will arrive during the next month, October; but I have been informed that the elections, I know not why, have been postponed until the month of November.

This city and this State appear to be very well governed under the new regime. All is orderly and quiet. Trade and commerce are gradually reviving. The revenues of the government are slowly increasing. The capture of Puerto Cabello gives them the profits of the customs dues received there, which are, of course, very considerable. I will endeavor, sir, as I have heretofore done, to keep you informed, from time to time, as to the state of affairs here.

Meanwhile, I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

LA GUAYRA, August 31, 1868.

SIR: The merchants of this city hasten to tender to you their cordial felicitations on your welcome arrival here, they being unwilling that so favorable an opportunity should pass by without a manifestation of those sentiments of respect and regard which they entertain towards you.

From the very moment the late revolution began, a revolution which has changed the political condition of the country, we observed, as its most prominent feature, your beneficent and controlling influence.

After a long life, passed almost entirely amid the cares of office and the arduous duties of the field, when your advanced age demanded repose, when you had arrived at that period of life at which men usually lose all worldly ambition, and also become indifferent to the conflicting aspirations of others; being thus situated, what idea, we ask, what incitement was it, that urged you on with the valor and buoyancy of your youthful days to brave anew the hardships and hazards of war?

Surely it must have been a powerful motive that aroused you to action—indeed, you have said that it was.

It was your patriotism of spotless purity; nothing else could have induced the sacrifice of your unpretending tranquillity.

Your motives of action thus explained, we could not refrain from watching your steps, during the campaign begun by you in the east of the republic, with the greatest attention and an interest worthy of the importance of the events that transpired.

The policy which this revolution tends to establish, a policy in support of which you have taken arms, is of such an elevated character that we deem it the only one acceptable and necessary for the salvation of the country. To unite all Venezuelans, to organize a government, this is the only difficulty; solve this, and the result will be restoration of credit to the government, of life to commerce, of activity to the arts, of joy to the domestic hearth, of abundance for all; in short, it will be the resurrection of the country.

The sensible men of all parties who have given their support to this revolution, and the rest of the community, converted by the fidelity of the revolutionists to their declared policy, will join you, you may be sure, in every hour of trial; for, sir, it is peace that we all demand, and the aspirations of every one are unalterably fixed for its being established and made permanent. Commerce, on its part, which can only exist and flourish under the shelter of peace, will not spare its support to a government that establishes itself upon the solid and effective principles of order and economy; and it hopes that you, because you have so promised, will not sheathe your sword until you see the republic marching on with uninterrupted progress in the broad path of honor and prosperity.

The blue flag borne aloft by the revolution has up to the present waved over triumph after triumph; the object of the war will soon be accomplished. In the onerous undertaking of organizing a government, when peace shall have been established, we wish you success equally as happy.

May it be granted to you to soon see realized your desire for the security and tranquillity of the republic—a desire towards the realization of which you are making every patriotic effort, for indeed security and tranquillity are elements necessary to the very life and welfare of nations.

Meanwhile, accept, sir, the renewed expressions of consideration and respect with which we subscribe ourselves, your obedient and faithful servants,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, September 10, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to forward you (see inclosure No. 1) a copy of a dispatch addressed by the minister of foreign relations of this government to the consul general of the Netherlands, residing here, in reference to the course of the authorities of the island of Curaçoa in regard to Venezuelan affairs.

In inclosure No. 2 may be found a translation of the same communication.

I have the honor to remain, sir, your obedient servant,

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA, DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS—NO. 178.

CARACAS, August 28, 1868,
Fifth year of the law and the tenth of the federation.

SIR: During the rebellion of a part of the United States of America the federal government, having complained of the privileges allowed in the Dutch colonies to vessels of the south, instructions were dispatched by the order of his Majesty the King of the Netherlands to the authorities of the same not to permit any more visits of the Sumpster, nor of any other vessels of the so-called Confederate States, and, on their entering the ports of the Netherlands, to oblige them to depart within twenty-four hours, under penalty of their being considered as enemies.

They were also prohibited from supplying fuel to any such vessels for more than twenty-four hours.

Lastly, they were ordered not to admit, except in the case of stress of weather, the vessels of war or privateers of the belligerents, and not to allow them, if steamers, to take in coal in a greater quantity than that sufficient to navigate twenty-four hours.

The governor of the neighboring Dutch colonies has told the confidential agent of Venezuela that he desired to observe, in the differences that are again agitating this nation, the strict rules of neutrality, in the same terms that his government prescribed in the civil war of the northern and southern States of North America; a war to which, in the judgment of said functionary, the actual political situation of the republic has, on a small scale, a very considerable resemblance. Even supposing the parity which is spoken of, and the obligation of regarding the one and the other as belligerents, what has been practiced at Curaçoa does not conform to the standard that the governor invokes.

Indeed, the rebel vessels have constantly gone to the Dutch islands, have departed when they thought proper, have been supplied with the fuel that they required or as much as could be furnished them, and have not arrived there through stress of weather, but intentionally.

It is notorious that, ever since the representatives of General Falcon, in violation of the treaty that put an end to the combat, after having been allowed to depart from Caracas on the day in which their defeat was consummated, and after having gone away and taken refuge in Puerto Cabello, have had no other means of carrying on the war than those afforded them in the Dutch colonies. Two schooners, dispatched from them with coal, muskets, powder, lead, and clothing, and which, moreover, conveyed rebellious generals and chiefs, were seized by the forces of the government.

To-day there does not even exist the appearance of the government that pretended to claim the title of legality.

With the capture of that town that government was completely destroyed. He who considered himself in charge of the executive died; two of his ministers were left in Puerto Cabello; the other two took each one a different direction; so that even discarding the facts that preceded, in virtue of which they capitulated and relinquished their official character, they ceased in their functions by reason of their second defeat, flight, and dispersion.

There are not, neither have there before existed, two governments, one in Caracas and another in Puerto Cabello.

The provisional executive administration, the only one that is at the head of the republic, has been established and accepted by the greater part of it. Sufficiently do the results prove this. It rules as much in the capital as in Puerto Cabello, since those cities were conquered, which were defended with all possible force, but surrendered to the superior strength of the revolution.

The popular co-operation, given to this present government proves that it is the will of the masses that all opposition to its authority shall cease.

As to foreign states, the question is a de facto one; they have to virtually acknowledge the government that they find in possession of power. But even if legitimacy were to be treated of, that, in a republic, depends solely upon the will of its citizens.

It is true that there are appointed forms by which to manifest the popular will, and that the executive, regardless of the origin of sovereignty, has ordered their employment; but this does not lessen the force of the general insurrection that has obtained such signal triumphs.

Well the Netherlands know, even by its own experience, that no other is the practice of nations.

The foreign diplomatic and consular agents treat only with this government, which they have acknowledged, about all matters that interest their respective nations. How this could happen is not to be comprehended, if, indeed, this government does not represent Venezuela.

It has, without limitation, the right to defend the interest of the republic; and, in the exercise of this right, the government is justified in taking all proper measures needful to restore the Union to a state of order and tranquillity, and also to demand of other powers what is due it from the same.

Even on the hypothesis that there were here, truly, a civil law, the principle is obvious and universally admitted that the territory of a neighboring, neutral foreign power is inviolable; and that the belligerents are bound to refrain from therein committing any act of hostility, or any other act in contravention of the lawful jurisdiction of the sovereign of such territory, or of the lawful rights of the legal occupiers of the same; they only professing the right to take action of any kind as may seem fit and proper to them in such territory, a right the use and abuse of which are in them solely vested.

In accordance with this principle, it happens that when a body of foreign troops passes the frontiers of a neutral state, the sovereign thereof grants it asylum, but assumes control of the men, compels them to disarm, and designates the locality in which they shall remain during their sojourn in his dominions. He there has them watched and controlled, or, at all events, takes such measures as effectually prevent them from taking any active part in the war which may then be raging.

In accordance with the same principle, drafting, the transit of armies, the formation of expeditions, warlike preparations, revolutionary meetings against a foreign government, battles and captures, ambuscades, retreats, (with a view of resuming hostilities,) the construction and arming of vessels of war and privateers, all military operations, the augmentation of the crews of the war vessels of any foreign belligerent, or the increase of the caliber of their cannons, even when an asylum has been granted them, the purchase or embarkation of fire-arms, the property of private individuals, or of munitions of war, the transportation of an enemy's troops, or dispatches, &c., are prohibited on neutral soil.

It is, then, in contravention of the principles of neutrality that General Falcon has established a center of operations at Curaçoa, and is there receiving and sending dispatches, and orders, and commissions, directed to various places in Venezuela, with the design of therein creating anarchy.

In a similar manner, at Curaçoa, coal, fire-arms, munitions of war, powder and clothing, are sold to and for the rebels, who are there encouraged and incited to arms by him. The doctrines of neutrality above alluded to are sanctioned by Hautefeuille in treating of peaceful commerce in goods contraband of war.

It is also true that the rebel vessels, belonging rightfully to the national navy, are supplied in Curaçoa, without stint, just as they wish, with provisions, fuel, and such other articles as they may require.

In the same manner expeditions, planned and executed by generals and other chieftains, are formed and dispatched, sometimes in Venezuelan vessels, sometimes in Dutch vessels—expeditions in aid of war in the territory of a nation that is on actual terms of peace and amity with the Netherlands. It is also true that the authorities of Curaçoa, formerly so severe in their conduct towards foreigners, including Venezuelans, now receive and grant every facility to our enemies, who via that island pass over into those parts of the country where rebellion prevails; and these same authorities take no steps to prevent the abuse of the privileges of asylum by the persons above alluded to.

It is no less contrary to neutrality that the rebel vessels are allowed to enter and remain, as long as they like, at Curaçoa and the other islands, contrary to the very orders of his government, which the governor quotes in support of his course of action.

These are very serious facts. They have occupied the attention of the executive for some time past. The public press have commented upon them. Had not the aid above alluded to been granted, the rebel vessels would have already been surrendered. Hence it also follows that a portion of the (Dutch) colonial commerce, extremely favored by the preceding régime here, is profitably speculating upon the misfortunes of Venezuela.

For the sake of the good relations existing between the two countries, the executive hopes that an immediate end will be put to so lamentable a state of affairs. He demands, moreover, that it be ordered that the steamers and any other vessels of the national navy that may now be in the Dutch colonies, or which may hereafter therein arrive, be restored to the United States of Venezuela. He bases this demand on the fact that no person but he represents the ownership of them. Every proprietor has the right to recover his property wherever it may be found.

The executive himself has no right to dispose of the public property.

These vessels having forfeited the right of flying the flag of the republic, she is not responsible in any way on their account. The policy which has been pursued towards this country by foreign governments serves to support the present demand.

In 1836 the reformers took away from the national magazine at Puerto Cabello a great quantity of powder, lead, cannons, and other articles, which they shipped on board of the schooner Mezelle, with the view of selling them in the Antilles, and of exchanging the product of such sale for provisions. On the demand of the executive, the governor of St. Thomas, the functionary of a state that so well knows, and has always so well defended the rights and duties of neutrals, not only ordered the cargo of that schooner to be detained and guarded, but also sent the same vessel and cargo back to La Guayra, intact. When, in the year 1866, the steamer Bolívar ran away, the agents here of friendly governments recommended, on request, to the governors of the islands to place an embargo upon her, and to send her back here. The governor of Antigua so acted, and effected her restitution. All assented to the justice of the demand made.

The administration hopes, that you, taking as you do so deep an interest in the good understanding which prevails between both nations, and enjoying, as you do, so weighty an influence with the governor of the colonies, will represent to him the just claims of Venezuela, and will persuade him to take such course of action towards her as may be necessary for the rightful satisfaction of these demands. I renew to you the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

Union and liberty!

GUILLERMO TELL VILLÉGAS.

The CONSUL GENERAL of the Netherlands.

No. 31.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, September 21, 1868.

SIR: In dispatch No. 19, dated August 6, 1868, I had the honor to call your attention to a proposition of this government in regard to the payment of foreign claims. (See dispatch No. 19, inclosure No. 2.) On August the 12th a collective note, (a copy of which may be found in this dispatch, inclosure No. 1,) in answer to the bases proposed by the Venezuelan government, (see dispatch No. 19, inclosure No. 2,) was sent to the minister of foreign relations, signed by the representatives of Spain, Italy, Great Britain, the United States of America, the Netherlands, and the United States of Colombia. Knowing that my action in this matter could in no way compromise my government, I was induced to join in it to show my belief that the government of Venezuela could not pay her outstanding foreign claims if the French were to continue to receive seventeen per cent. of the import dues taken at the custom-houses in La Guayra and Puerto Cabello. The income of the government may be estimated at not more than four millions of pesos.

Of this sixty per cent., or two million four hundred thousand pesos, are required for its ordinary expenses, leaving forty per cent., or one million six hundred thousand pesos, to go towards the payment of its internal debt and foreign claims; the former including all kinds, amounting to about seventy-five million pesos, and the latter, roughly estimating unsettled claims, to eight million pesos. Now as there are only four custom-houses which yield any considerable revenue, namely, those at La Guayra, Puerto Cabello, Ciudad Bolivar, and Maracaibo, * * * therefore, if the French are to receive seventeen per cent. of the revenues of the two former, it follows of course that the government will have little or nothing left to divide among the claimants of other nations. But it is to be remembered that if the French can be induced to give up their special advantages, the United States will be expected to do the same, in order that all the foreign claimants may be placed on an equal footing, if possible, in the terms of the collective note, (for a translation of which see this dispatch, inclosure No. 2.) The answer to that note may be found in inclosure No. 3, and a translation of the same in inclosure No. 4. This government is, as I suppose, not in a position to do anything. The election for President will take place not later than November, and congress, it is said, will meet on the 15th of December.

The Yellows, or partisans of the late government of Falcon and Bruzual, are said to be actively conspiring with Curaçoa as their headquarters. They still have two or three war vessels, which are said to be refitting at Maracaibo.

Guayana has declared in favor of this government, a great acquisition of strength.

The poverty of Venezuela is her strength. Her prosperity depends upon agriculture. Commerce cannot flourish, except with the former; agriculture has been almost destroyed by the civil wars, commerce greatly depressed: consequently little revenues from custom dues, and the treasury is almost empty. An honest and able administration has to keep up a considerable army. The employés are put on half pay, but there is no money left to pay the interest on the debt, external or internal. The government now has possession of the three custom-houses at Ciudad Bolivar, La Guayra, and Puerto Cabello; could they gain that at Maracaibo, and obtain possession of the war vessels, their income might come up fully to the amount of four millions, (pesos,) and they could then safely reduce their army one-half, and thus considerably diminish their expenses. Hoping, for the sake of both Venezuelans and mankind, that a season of peace and prosperity is about to be enjoyed by this long-suffering people, I have the honor to remain, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

CARACAS, August 8, 1868.

Whereas the government of Venezuela is authorized by article 12 of the law of the 14th of June, 1868, (in regard to the organization and administration of the national treasury,) to adjust finally pending claims, and to carry into effect the obligations against the republic arising therefrom, the undersigned have the honor to state to

Señor Doctor Villégas, minister of foreign affairs of the United States of Venezuela, that they will submit to their respective governments the bases proposed by that of Venezuela, in the circular of the department of foreign affairs of the 4th instant, provided those bases be modified in the following terms :

1. The settlement and liquidation of pending claims shall be proceeded with at once by means of mixed commissions. Each shall be composed of two individuals, one appointed by the government of Venezuela, and the other shall be the representative of the government interested in the claims, unless the latter should appoint a special commissioner. In the cases in which the commissioners may not agree, they shall establish the manner to be adopted to obtain a decision upon the point in controversy. When the respective commissioners agree in awarding any indemnity, they shall fix the amount that ought to be paid, and shall issue a certificate or title for the same in the form adopted by the mixed commission that has acted in the adjustment of Anglo-American claims. There shall also be issued titles for the amount of claims already acknowledged, and for those that may be acknowledged in virtue of another manner, agreed upon in any other convention of a previous date.

2. The titles which are issued shall bear six per cent. interest per annum, falling due and payable quarterly, and shall have for their redemption, which shall take place in quarterly payments, a fixed fund, equivalent to two per cent. of the capital of all the titles issued, until the discharge of the whole debt. So that, the amount of the claims acknowledged being known, six per cent. interest is insured every year, and two per cent. for the redemption, or say, eight per cent. per annum of the capital acknowledged as a fixed and uniform fund until its complete extinction. The sinking fund being augmented by the surplus that, on account of interest, remains on hand, from the second quarter of the first year for the part redeemed.

3. Said eight per cent. shall be denominated international-claims fund, which shall form an assignment of the percentage of the import duties at the custom-houses of the republic sufficient to produce the sum necessary to cover the eight per cent. mentioned.

4. If the government of Venezuela accepts these propositions, they shall be obligatory on the part of the republic as towards the governments that may approve them.

The undersigned renew to Mr. Doctor Villegas the assurances, &c., &c., &c.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS, CENTRAL BUREAU.

CARACAS, September 12, 1868,

5th of the Law and the 10th Federation.

The undersigned, minister of the foreign affairs of the United States of Venezuela, had the honor to receive, in due course, the collective note that, on the 12th of the past month the chargé d'affaires of Spain, Italy, and Great Britain, the commercial agent in charge of the legation of the United States of America, and the consul general of the Netherlands, and the vice-consul of the United States of Colombia, addressed to him.

Therein they manifested that they would submit to their respective governments the bases of settlement proposed by that of Venezuela on the 4th of August, provided that they were modified in the terms expressed by them.

The provisional executive had trusted that the plan which had been proposed to assign the ten per cent. of the ordinary import duties of the custom-houses of the republic to the payment of diplomatic claims, according to the proposition that was made to all the parties interested, would be generally admitted. Certainly he knew of the existence of the convention that appropriates seventeen per cent. of the duties of La Guayra and Puerto Cabello to the claims of France; but notwithstanding, he abounded in reasons to think that she would accede to the modification of the settlement.

The chargé d'affaires of that country has not thought that the orders to which he is subjected would permit him to do more than to refer the principal question to his government, and has continued demanding with earnestness the resumption of the payments.

The executive has seen himself under the necessity of so promising; and as he is thus deprived, in benefit of a few creditors, of what he deliberated to grant to all, there is wanting for the present the basis of his calculations.

He has decided to continue his exertions, in the hope of seeing realized his original idea, to wit: that the ten per cent. be accepted by all, offered for foreign claims. But while he does not know what will be the termination of the negotiations that he has undertaken, he cannot respond definitely in regard to the particular.

If, unfortunately, it should not be conformable to his hope, he will substitute another mode of payment that may be satisfactory to the creditors, until the former one can be carried into effect.

This will not prevent the preparing for acting upon the claims of each country, according to the special conventions that may have been concluded, or may be entered into with them, they thus respecting their rights and doing justice to all claims.

The undersigned renews to Mr. Pruyt the assurance of his distinguished consideration. Union and liberty!

Mr. E. C. PRUYT,

Commercial Agent in charge of the Legation of the United States.

Mr. Pruyt to Mr. Seward.

No. 33.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, September 29, 1868.

SIR: I have this day received your dispatches Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, and 20.

I have given most careful attention to the instructions in dispatch No. 4, in reference to the course to be pursued by me as regards a recognition of this government. To procure a continuance of the mixed commission I was compelled to pursue the course I did towards this provisional government. There was no time to await for instructions from the department, as the commissioners had determined that they had no right to remain in session after August 30, 1868. It was most important that the claims of our citizens, reaching as far back as 1812, should be decided.

The uprising of this nation in revolution was so general and so irresistible that, as far as human foresight could go, the conclusion was inevitable that the people would deliberately and fully acknowledge and accept the provisional revolutionary government.

The revolution has everywhere triumphed, unless it be in the far western State of Maracaibo, or Tulia, as it is now called, where State President Sutherland has always acted independently of the general government. He is rich, and has a considerable army, and, it is said, rules almost despotically.

I am of the opinion that this government will make an arrangement with President Sutherland, by which the latter will give them a formal recognition, in return for which they will agree to leave him practically undisturbed. He will, perhaps, give up a portion of the custom-house receipts at Maracaibo, all of which should rightfully go into the national treasury. It is possible, however, that the army of the revolution, now in the west, may continue their march, and arrive at and capture Maracaibo.

The coming election of a new President and new congress, in the manner prescribed by the constitution and the laws—both of which are treated with all possible respect by the present provisional government—will set at rest all difficulty as regards a recognition of the government.

General Falcon, who was elected President in 1862, has abandoned the country, and gone to Spain. General Gil, who was first designado, or vice-president, fled to Curaçoa. General Bruzual, who, in the absence of the vice-president, was chosen by his colleagues in the cabinet, (he being then minister of war,) to act as president, was fatally wounded at Puerto Cabello, and died at Curaçoa. So it appears to be very doubtful if there is any technical legal executive of this republic.

General José Tadeo Monagas, commander-in-chief of the revolutionary forces, is the candidate of the "blues," or revolutionists, for President. He has already twice filled that high office. His election is a foregone conclusion.

The "yellows," or partisans of the late government, may go through the ceremony of nominating a candidate, although they have not the slightest hopes of gaining the election. A considerable minority in congress is all that they aspire to.

If my course of action towards this provisional government appears to have been somewhat premature, and too friendly, I can only say that I felt it my duty to protect and assist the mixed commission in every way possible. My efforts in their behalf were crowned with success, and my very friendly course towards the provisional government has given me a certain influence with the leaders of the revolutionary party which may be of service to American interests here in the future. I feel sure that my promptness and cordiality will not be without good results.

I shall endeavor to observe, most carefully, your instructions; and I have the honor to remain, sir, your obedient servant,

ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Pruyt to Mr Seward.

No. 35.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, October 1, 1868.

SIR: I have read with great care your dispatch No. 14, dated August 22, 1868, in reply to mine (No. 21) of August 6, 1868, giving an account of a request made to the French minister to detain a French ship of war then at La Guayra. I am much obliged for the statement of the policy of the government which you are pleased to give, and shall endeavor, in every way possible, to conform my course of action to it. In all conferences with other foreign agents I have distinctly stated that I had no power to act definitively in the name of my government, or to bind, in any way, my government by my action. I have expressed a willingness to consult with my colleagues, and to use such influence as my position gave me, both with my own government and that of Venezuela, to further all legitimate ends within the limits of my official duties.

I do not find, in the printed instructions to diplomatic agents, any statement directing the "representatives of the United States in foreign countries to refrain from formal consultations or conferences with the representatives of other foreign countries."

The only agreement I have made with other foreign diplomatic agents was an agreement to recommend a certain plan of paying foreign claims to this government, and, if they accepted it, to recommend the same to my government. I do not understand your instructions to go so far as to prohibit such a course of action on my part as the last mentioned; but I shall, in future, exercise great caution, and endeavor to follow the spirit of your directions.

As you state, in speaking of the request made to the French minister to detain his ship of war at La Guayra, that the circumstances under which the proceeding above referred to had taken place are entirely unknown to the department, I will now give you all the information in my possession on the subject.

The Bruzual government at Puerto Cabello issued a declaration of blockade of La Guayra and the coast, dated June 27, 1868. No attempt was made to enforce this blockade until July 11, on the morning of which day the following war vessels, manned by the partisans of Bruzual, appeared off La Guayra, viz., the steamer Bolivar, and the goleta Mariscal, without giving notice of the blockade to any person.

They remained before La Guayra until the evening of the 15th of July, when they left and returned to Puerto Cabello, having captured, during their stay, only two small coasting vessels. The blockade was not resumed until August 5th, when it only lasted two or three days, during which time, I believe, no captures were made by the Bruzual blockading war steamer, the Maparari, which was obliged to return to Puerto Cabello, to aid the hard-pressed partisans there, who were forced to abandon that city on August 15th.

The legality of the blockade, carried out in the manner above mentioned, was seriously questioned. In inclosure No. 10, dispatch No. 7, may be found a translation of the decree of General Bruzual, declaring the blockade. It is asserted that the 4th article of that decree is in violation of the 19th article of the treaty between the United States and Venezuela of September 20, 1854.

During July and August, several of the foreign representatives here, including myself, endeavored to obtain the presence of war vessels of their respective nations in the waters of Venezuela. None were successful except those of France and Denmark; a French man-of-war visited La Guayra early in August, and a Danish one about the middle of the same month. During the stay of the French vessel at La Guayra occurred the blockade beginning August 5th. This government and the foreign representatives here, doubting its legality, the policy related in dispatch No. 21 was followed. I felt most anxious that there should be an independent, powerful, and reliable witness to watch the proceedings of the blockading force, because vessels from the United States were likely to approach the port of La Guayra.

You will be pleased to notice that I sent to the French minister a separate dispatch from this legation, for a copy of which see inclosure No. 1. There was no joint note sent him by the foreign representatives. If he had granted the request, and had detained the French ship of war, I should have looked upon it merely as an act of international courtesy and good will, in no way compromising the independence or dignity of the governments whose representatives had asked the favor.

I shall be glad to receive any further comments you may be pleased to make upon the transaction explained in this dispatch and described in dispatch No. 21.

I have the honor to remain, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

SIR: Considering that the presence of the steamer Maparari before La Guayra is a menace to foreign commerce, and having good cause to believe that in a short time merchant vessels of my nation will arrive at that port, I request of you, since you have a man-of-war at your disposition, to give all possible aid and assistance to such ships, if occasion requires.

Any similar service that I can render you will not only be my duty but my pleasure.

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA, DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AND OF JUSTICE, SECOND BUREAU—DISPATCH No. 274.

CARACAS, October 1, 1868,

5th year of the Law and the 10th of the Federation.

To the Citizen President of the State of Bolívar:

An atrocious act, unparalleled in the history of Venezuela, has just been perpetrated. An individual named Francisco Solerè, having forced his way into the hall of dispatch of the national executive in spite of the porter's efforts to detain him, and being armed with a revolver, approached the citizen minister of foreign relations and President of the council, Dr. Guillermo Tell Villégas, (then in his appropriate chair,) and addressed him in the most insulting language, and threatened to kill him. And if the contemplated murder was not consummated, if the august precinct of the supreme executive magistrate was not dyed with the blood of a minister, it is owing to the presence of the minister of war and marine, and to the secretary of this department, who, having heard he assailant utter, on entering the government mansion, words that revealed his terrible design, followed him and arrived most opportunely.

A crime of such magnitude merits the most exemplary punishment, or else the majesty of the nation will suffer the profoundest humiliation, and its rightful authorities be shorn forever of its prestige and moral force, without which there can exist neither government nor order in any country of the universe. There is only one thing that can counteract the painful impression that this deed has produced in this outraged community, and that is, that this act shall be promptly investigated, and that the punishment which the culprit deserves shall be inflicted by the magistrates to whom the law commits the sacred function of administering justice.

My object in addressing this note to you is, that you may urge them on to the fulfilment of their duty, hoping that you will be pleased to inform me of the measures that may be taken, for the executive has determined that the matter must be thoroughly carried out to its proper termination.

Union and liberty!

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, October 2, 1868.

SIR: The undersigned, in charge ad interim of the legation of the United States, has heard with sentiments of the deepest concern of the dastardly attempt made yesterday to assassinate your excellency while in the discharge of your high official duties.

The government and people of the United States, who cherish among their fondest aspirations the wish that the sister republic of Venezuela may always enjoy peace and prosperity, will be profoundly grieved to learn that there has been found one—even a foreigner—within the borders so unutterably wicked as to attack a great and good personage occupying the highest position among those who are endeavoring to regenerate the republic and restore her to her former state of happiness and grandeur.

The people of the United States have not forgotten the great grief and heart-felt sympathy manifested by Venezuela in the hour of their affliction when, by the hand of the murderer, the soul of their beloved Chief Magistrate, Abraham Lincoln, was sent back to God, and other great and good men, who had aided him in the glorious work of saving the life of the nation, were laid low at death's door by the same infamous means.

The undersigned begs to express the feelings of satisfaction and joy which the government and people of the United States will experience on hearing that the Divine Providence which watches over the affairs of men has delivered you from deadly peril, and he also begs to join in their fervent hope that the same almighty power may grant your excellency a long and happy life, in order that you may pursue the patriotic path, already so familiar to you, of self-sacrificing public duty, which, although you do not seek it, leads to that highest pinnacle of human glory, the approbation of a free people.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, October 5, 1868.

SIR: In dispatch No. 19 I forwarded to you a certain financial proposition of the Venezuelan government, and in dispatch No. 31 the same question was again treated of. I now submit for your consideration (see inclosure No. 1) a copy of a dispatch I to-day sent to the minister of foreign relations, in reply to his note of September 12, 1868, a translation of which was given in inclosure No. 4 of dispatch No. 31. As far as I can judge, the views you were pleased to express in dispatch No. 18 have been borne out by subsequent events. This government have just appointed a minister to France, who will endeavor to induce the French government to give up their especial treaty-privileges, which of course they will not do.

I will report in due course any further information that I may be able to obtain on this question. Meanwhile I have the honor to remain, with great respect, your obedient servant,

ERASTUS C. PRUYN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Mr. Pruyne to Señor Villégas.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, October 5, 1868.

The undersigned, commercial agent in charge of the legation of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch No. 181, dated September 12, 1868, in which you are pleased to reply to the collective note addressed to you by the representatives of several foreign powers accredited to the government of Venezuela, (including the undersigned,) dated August 12, 1868, in regard to the bases of settlement of foreign claims proposed in the circular of the Venezuelan government, dated August 4, 1868. Your excellency has stated that the government of Venezuela has found it necessary to prepare to recommence giving seventeen per cent. of the import duties of La Guayra and Puerto Cabello towards the payment of the French claims.

You are also pleased to state that you cannot give a definite response to the collective note above mentioned until the result is known of the negotiations in this financial question which have been begun with the government of France.

The undersigned is gratified to observe, as the cardinal basis of the propositions of the Venezuelan government, the declared intention of satisfying those sacred national obligations which the former rulers had so entirely neglected to consider. In your propositions the undersigned has not been able to find any condition in which is declared that they must be accepted by the chargé d'affaires of France before they can become effective. The earnest and persistent efforts of the representative of France for the re-establishment of the payment of the seventeen per cent. aforementioned were well known to the public before August 4th. So it is reasonable to suppose that your excellency had considered the financial relations of Venezuela towards France previously to dispatching the propositions addressed that day to several foreign agents, including the undersigned. If the undersigned rightly apprehends this financial question, it appears that the government of Venezuela proposed a basis of settlement on the 4th of August, omitting in its communication on this subject of that date addressed to foreign agents the statement subsequently made that it was bound by certain solemn treaty obligations with France, and that unless these were given up by the government of that country, the propositions in question could not be carried into effect. The undersigned, in reporting these matters to his government, has made particular mention of the great desire manifested by the government of Venezuela for the prompt payment of the just claims due foreigners.

The undersigned has, however, up to this date, been unable to recommend to his government the abandonment on their part of the terms of the treaty of April 25, 1868. The undersigned begs to renew to Señor Villégas the assurances of his distinguished consideration.

SIR: I have received your dispatch No. 31, of September 21. In it you call attention to a proposition made by the government of Venezuela in reference to the payment of the claims held by foreigners against that government.

Inasmuch as Venezuela declares itself to be not yet in a position for carrying out its proposition for the assignment of customs duties as communicated in your No. 19, the consideration of the proposal will be deferred until it shall have been renewed or modified by that government.

DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS, CENTRAL BUREAU—No. 244.

*CARACAS, October 27, 1868,
The 5th year of the Law and the 10th of the Federation.*

Owing to the illness from which he has been suffering for many days past, the undersigned, minister of foreign relations of the United States of Venezuela, regrets that it was not in his power to reply until now to the communication that the incumbent of the legation of the United States of America addressed to him on hearing of the murderous assault of which the undersigned was the object.

It is with the most profound sentiment of gratitude that the undersigned has become apprised of the interest that Mr. Pruyt took in the event, and of the indignation that he manifests against the wretch who conceived and attempted to carry out so wicked a design at a time and in a place where the undersigned was discharging his official duties.

The criminal, uninfluenced by any consideration of right or duty, proceeded in his evil purpose, and almost accomplished it, although he had not received the slightest provocation of any kind whatsoever.

Venezuela will always remember with grief the lamentable death of the ill-fated President, the most excellent Abraham Lincoln, and the treacherous attempts that put in peril the life of the Secretary of State, and also that of his assistant and son. This sentiment was suitably testified to through the minister that she had accredited at Washington, and likewise through the United States minister then in Caracas.

It is to be hoped that the condemnation that every just man makes of such attempts, impressing a seal of shame and ignominy upon the brow of him who dares to commit them, will contribute more than any other punishment to cause their total cessation for all time to come.

Having no other aspiration than to contribute to the welfare of his fellow-citizens, the undersigned has made every patriotic effort in his power to that end, so important and so worthy of the best endeavors, and he considers it as his most satisfactory reward that his efforts are thus recognized in the most kind and flattering terms by so distinguished a personage as Mr. Pruy, to whom the undersigned, availing himself of this opportunity, renews the assurance of his distinguished consideration.

Union and liberty!

GUILLERMO TELL VILLÉGAS.

MR. ERASTUS C. PRUY,

Incumbent of the Legation of the United States.

Mr. Pruy to Mr. Seward.

No. 44.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Caracas, October 30, 1868:

Sir: I beg to submit for your consideration a few observations concerning the recent course of political events in this country. General Monagas, the chief of the revolution, who, after the establishment of the provisional government, became commander-in-chief of the army, was obliged, owing to ill health, to retire a few weeks ago from active service, and he repaired to the village of El Vallé, near Caracas, where he has since lived in retirement, much to the benefit of his health, which, as I am informed, is now almost entirely restored.

In the absence of the chief, Generals Ruperto Monagas and Rufo Rojas command the forces in the field, which have now only to contend against the army of General Pedro Manuel Rojas, who still holds out against the government in the States of Portuguesa and Zamora, (united population one hundred and sixty-five thousand,) in the western part of the republic.

In dispatch No. 33, dated September 29, 1868, I expressed the opinion that this government would come to terms with the President, Sutherland, at Maracaibo. They have done so in a manner advantageous to both parties, and thus the further effusion of blood has been happily avoided. The national government has obtained control of the custom-house at Maracaibo, and the national war vessels, until now in possession of the partisans of the late Bruzual government.

President Sutherland, it is said, will soon leave for Europe, or, if he remains here, will take an interest in national affairs by coming as a senator to the new congress. In any event, his influence is now very little, and that little kept up by the position of State President, (which he must soon vacate,) and aided by his vast wealth.

There have been reactionary disturbances in the States of Barcelona and Nueva Andalusia; but happily they were speedily suppressed, and peace and tranquillity prevail.

The revolutionary party, being so strong, could easily afford to be generous to their conquered foe; so they caused the elections to be held in a free, fair, and open manner. On the 9th of October, General Monagas, from his retreat at El Vallé, issued a proclamation, asking his fellow-citizens, in dignified and suitable language, to conduct the elections in strict accordance to the letter and spirit of the constitution—to be just, quiet, and orderly.

His request was, as far as I can learn, most faithfully obeyed, and the elections passed off in a manner highly creditable to this people. They took place on October 18th.

There were chosen a President of the republic, a President in each State, and members of both houses of the national and State legislatures.

The official returns are not yet complete, but I am informed that the revolutionary party, or "blues," have been everywhere victorious, their candidates obtaining from two-thirds to three-fourths of all the votes polled. This is the first time in many years that a really free election has been held in Venezuela, and it therefore has excited far more than usual interest. General José Tadeo Monagas has, without doubt, been elected President. The day before the election, the principal merchants of Caracas, both native and foreign, presented him with a carriage and horse—a very handsome compliment; and, perhaps, indicative that a revival of commerce is hoped for under his administration.

There is a strong and growing feeling here in favor of centralization; a strong, consolidated government. There is too much State pride and local jealousy. Some of the States are extremely poor, and sparsely populated, so that they support the burden of a State government with great difficulty. It is expected that the next congress will propose some amendment to the constitution, giving more power to the general government, which most certainly appears to be required. They will also, it is to be hoped, remove some of the excessive import duties, and thus stimulate foreign commerce.

Yesterday the government issued a proclamation calling congress together on the first day of January. Their first duty, after organizing, will be to count the votes for President, who will immediately take office, and make an address to the congress. Then that body will proceed to choose a primer designado, and a segundo designado, or first and second vice-presidents. The choice of first vice-president will be a most important event, as, owing to the extreme old age and feeble health of the President elect, that officer will most likely be the virtual executive. The danger of the movement appears to be that the relatives of Monagas—some two dozen or more—and their particular friends, all from the eastern States, will endeavor to obtain all the places of honor and profit under the new administration, not giving a fair share to others from other localities, who helped to bring the revolution to a triumphant conclusion. The hope of the people lies in a wise and firm course of action by the incoming congress, particularly in the choice of a good and able man for first vice-president.

I have the honor to remain, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Caracas, October 30, 1868.

SIR: On the 28th instant, the day of Saint Simon, celebrated here in honor of Simon Bolivar, the liberator, the corps diplomatic and consular called by invitation (for my answer to which see inclosure No. 1) on the national executive at the government mansion.

Señor Don Felipe I. P. Leal, envoy of Brazil, offered, on behalf of the corps, a few remarks of general felicitation, which were appropriately responded to by Señor Villegas, acting President, and then almost immediately the foreign representatives retired. The whole affair was most brief and formal.

The day was celebrated in the most joyous manner by the citizens of Caracas. Music, fireworks, processions, theatrical performances, reunions in the clubs, a general display of flags and banners, together with the merry crowds moving ceaselessly through the streets and squares from early in the morning until a late hour of the night, showed that it was indeed a day of popular festivity. Not for many years has the birthday of the great liberator, been so gaily kept by this nation, one of the five republics which owe so much to that noble hero.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Mr. Pruyt to Señor Villégas.

CARACAS, Octobr 27, 1868.

The incumbent of the legation of the United States of America offers his most cordial salutations to the honorable minister of foreign relations of the United States of Venezuela, and, acknowledging the receipt of his excellency's polite note of this date, (in which is conveyed the information that to-morrow, October 28th, being the anniversary of the birthday of the liberator, the national executive will hold a reception at the government mansion,) begs to state that he will hasten to avail himself of the opportunity thus afforded of offering his most sincere felicitations on that day of national rejoicing, so dear to all lovers of human liberty, and doubly precious to every republican.

In contemplating the life and character of Simon Bolivar, we find that he excelled equally in both civil and military affairs. With an energy almost superhuman, and a patience truly inexhaustible, he raised army after army. With the brilliant audacity of his extraordinary genius, he carried on with indomitable perseverance campaign after campaign against overwhelming odds, preserving, alike through good fortune and evil fortune, that calm grandeur of soul, and serenity of faith in the ultimate triumph of the cause of liberty, which nothing could shake.

Among the most marked traits of this heroic man, we notice his great moral worth, the unsullied integrity of his conduct, both public and private; his unswerving love of liberty regulated by law; his horror of civil war, and of irresponsible power exercised under what name soever; and last, but not least, his wonderful hold on the affections of the people, who received him "as the thirsty earth receives the fertilizing dew of heaven."

May the illustrious example of the great liberator and peacemaker be never forgotten, but ever followed, and endure until that time,

When every wandering sheep hath turned him home,
And changed to pruning hooks be every sword,
And all the peoples of the earth become
The people of the Lord.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, November 9, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 29th of September, No. 33, has been received. We have learned here that the late President Falcon has abandoned the republic of Venezuela; that General Bruzual, who claimed to be his successor, and maintained a resistance with national forces at Puerto Cabello, has died of wounds received in battle; that Puerto Cabello has fallen into the hands of the provisional government established at Caracas; and that the civil war, so far as it was necessary to regard it as a national conflict, has come to an end. There seems, therefore, to be no sufficient ground for withholding longer the formal and full recognition of that provisional government.

In announcing this decision you will express to the provisional President the sincere hope, on the part of the United States, that the republic of Venezuela may speedily come to the enjoyment of internal peace and the renewal of national prosperity.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 1st of October, No. 35, has been received and duly considered. Your No. 21, which related to transactions then occurring in the midst of civil war, was made the basis of my instruction No. 14. Since that time the contending Venezuelan government, which was then maintaining itself at Puerto Cabello, in opposition to the newly organized government at Caracas, has passed away, and the civil war seems practically to have come to an end. Happily no consequences injurious either to the Venezuelan government or to the United States have resulted from your proceeding in regard to the French ship of war then at La Guayra, which I had occasion to discuss in that instruction. It is therefore now unnecessary to prolong the correspondence upon the subject of that discussion.

LEGATION OF VENEZUELA.

Señor Mesa to Mr. Seward.

[Translation.]

UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA,
DEPARTMENT OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Puerto Cabello, July 20, 1868.

SIR: I have received special charge to address this note to you for the purpose of bringing to the knowledge of the government of the United States of America the transfer of the federal district and seat of Venezuelan government to this city, which is for a while constituted the capital of the United States of Venezuela, in relation to our constitution and federal laws. This communication has been seasonably made to the diplomatic corps and consuls resident in Caracas, wherefore it is to be supposed that the representative of the government of your excellency will have transmitted it to you as it is his duty.

But, nevertheless, my government has thought proper to address to you this further direct communication of this transfer to Puerto Cabello, because it is necessary to appeal to those relations of peace and friendship which connect it with the United States of America, to claim, as in effect it does claim, the fulfillment of the treaty in force for the purpose of preventing, in the territory or dominions of any of the parties signing the same, acts being done which may have for object to prepare expeditions or acquire materials with which to carry on hostilities against the other parties.

This reclamation rests, sir, on the fact that the faction which has established at Caracas an unconstitutional government has sent its agent, named José Antonio Velutini, for the purpose of obtaining, for the uses of the revolution headed by General José Tadeo Monagas, elements of warfare of all kinds, and among them one or more monitors or iron-clads, with which to attack the vessels and forts held by the constitutional government. My government has just accredited near that of your excellency a diplomatic agent for the special purpose of counteracting the operations of the commissioners of the revolutionists, and to seek in that respect the fulfillment of the obligations existing between both governments as well as the disavowal of the consular or diplomatic employés that the revolution pretends to establish; but wishing to avail of the moment, and to anticipate the delays which the said diplomats might incur on their journey, I send you, in anticipation, the appointment of Commissioner Velutini, hoping that, with the rectitude that is proverbial with your government, it will dispatch without delay all the orders it may deem opportune to prevent the other commissioner from realizing the armament and expedition which he may have set on foot against my government.

My government rests, sir, in the confidence that this note will suffice to put a stop to the operations which its enemies may intend to carry out in the territory of the United States of America, and that they will be prevented and punished in accordance with the treaty in force and the laws of neutrality of the country; and I avail myself of this occasion to offer to you the respectful consideration with which I have the honor to subscribe myself your very obedient servant,

MIGUEL GARCIA MESA.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF VENEZUELA,
West Camp, Ulster Co., N. Y., July 24, 1868.

Florencio Ribas, chargé d'affaires for Venezuela, has the honor to greet Mr. William H. Seward, Secretary of State, and inform him that he is astonished at a correspondence from Havana, in the New York Herald of yesterday, 23d of July. The Herald correspondent says that Mr. Stilwell, the American minister resident in Caracas, was obliged to leave that city for safety during certain revolutionary commotions there. I am sure you will not believe this assertion, Mr. Secretary; yet I deem it my duty, and it certainly is my pleasure to assure you there is nothing true in this. The Herald has a long editorial on the subject in the same edition.

Though I am not officially informed by my government in regard to the recent lamentable events to which the Herald's correspondent alludes, yet private letters assure me that, so far from having any fear of personal violence, the foreign representatives protected many foreign and even native families in their dwellings on the days of the contest that disturbed the people of Caracas.

I hope soon to be able to give you an official account of the occurrences in question.

I take this favorable occasion to repeat the assurances of the great consideration with which I have the honor to subscribe myself

Your very obedient servant,

FLORENCIO RIBAS.

WEST CAMP, July 30, 1868.

Florencio Ribas, chargé d'affaires of the United States of Venezuela, has the honor to salute Mr. William H. Seward, Secretary of State, and to inform him, in compliance with his offer made in his note of the 24th of the present month, of all he may gather respecting the lamentable events which have happened in the capital of Venezuela.

I communicate for your information what I have been able to learn through private correspondences about these political events. It appears that two of the eastern States of the republic, in concert with three of the central, gathered their forces against the federal district commanded by General José Tadeo Monagas, and, after a prolonged attack and strong resistance on the part of the government troops, under command of General Bruzual, the aggressors remained in possession of the federal district. The government then retired to Puerto Cabello, where it has fixed its residence. I send with this communication an extract from the Federalist paper published in Caracas, where you will see the public decrees of General Manuel E. Bruzual fixing on Puerto Cabello as the place of residence of the government. I also enclose a slip from the New York Herald of to-day, where you will read the reports sent by its correspondent at St. Thomas relative to these political events in Venezuela. The reports of correspondents being often apocryphal, I abstain from remarks upon them. I particularly call your attention to them. I offer you, as soon as I shall receive official communications from the government about these events, to send them in due course to you. I avail of the present occasion to repeat to you the assurances of my highest consideration. I have the honor to subscribe myself your very obedient, humble servant,

FLORENCIO RIBAS.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

[Here is interpolated an extract from the Herald, being a letter from St Thomas dated July 15, 1868; then follows an address to the people:]

[Translation of the address.]

Manuel E. Bruzual, in charge of the presidency of the United States of Venezuela, to the Nation :

VENEZUELAN: Called constitutionally to the exercise of the presidency of the Union, I have sworn on my honor and for the country to meet all the exigencies of the great majority of the country, and even in the midst of the grave contests with which the government has found itself involved it has not turned aside from the line of duty.

To-day I ratify that solemn oath in Puerto Cabello, where the national executive exercises its functions, because the federal district has been occupied by the factions who follow General José Tadeo Monagas.

In presence of God and the world, I promise to omit no sacrifice of any kind, even to death if needful, in defense of the federal cause for which the virtuous people of Venezuela have poured out their blood in torrents.

It never was my intention to fight, but the enemies of liberal institutions and principles would not have it so. Now, as in March, 1858, they have raised the banner of treason to assail the authorities, and restore the fearful rule of terror. They are the same men who forget nothing, who learn nothing, not stopping at measures, obnoxious as they may be, in order to satiate their thirst for vengeance and persecution. In immoral alliance with many of their own victims, they deceive them, the more easily to consummate their work of extermination, already begun by the invasion of the capital of the republic, which they have succeeded in accomplishing, notwithstanding the gallant resistance of the constitutional army, because the States, relying on the peace which was to have been obtained by means of treaties, did not assemble in season the contingent force which had been assigned for them.

The government thus has found itself compelled, in the exercise of its attributions, to fix upon the city of Puerto Cabello as the federal district, and relying on the steady support of public opinion, and the tried valor and bravery of the chiefs, will in a brief time re-establish order in the republic, by subjecting to obedience to law those who, blinded by the virulence of passion, do not comprehend that the sentiment of freedom is invincible.

Venezuelans! I appeal to your conscience. On one side you have the government, which represents law, and has given infallible proofs of its aspirations for what is right; on the other side is despotism or anarchy in consequence. The triumph over the disturbers of your peace is therefore not doubtful. Without ambition to command, I have no thought of retaining the authority with which I find myself invested, except under necessity to preserve the institutions. This important object saved, you all will see me withdraw to the domestic hearth, satisfied with having co-operated, with all the firmness I am capable of in sustaining the republic such as our fathers constituted it in the great contest of the American continent against its oppressors.

Venezuelans! in the name of the country I call you to arms. Sad is any contest between brethren; but all the acts of my administration which bore the stamp of law, of morals, of forbearance, even towards citizens in arms, did not suffice to avoid such a condition. There remains only recourse to arms.

Let it progress without further delay than what is needful for indulgence to the conquered, and to open our arms to receive those who, sensible of their errors, join us in the campaign undertaken by the government to sustain the constitution and the laws.

Done at Puerto Cabello, at the executive chamber, the 27th June, 1868.

M. E. BRUZUAL.

Señor Ribas to Mr. Seward.

WEST CAMP, August 5, 1868.

Florencio Ribas, chargé d'affaires of Venezuela, has the honor to salute Mr. W. H. Seward, Secretary of State, and to inform him that, having already apprised him by his note of July 30th of the political events which have taken place at the capital of Venezuela, you will already know that, the federal district being already occupied by the revolutionary party, the general-in-chief of its forces issued a decree establishing a provisional government the more. The constitutional government has transferred the federal district to the city of Puerto Cabello, where it continues to exercise its authority. I beg you, sir, to please inform me what will be the policy and conduct of the government of the United States in virtue of the present state of things.

I avail of the present occasion to repeat to you, sir, the assurance of my highest consideration and respect, with which I have the honor to subscribe myself your very respectful and obedient servant,

LEGATION OF VENEZUELA,
Gramercy Park House, New York, August 24, 1868.

MR. SECRETARY: As I have returned from Venezuela, I deem it my duty to give an account to the government near which I am accredited of the grave political events which have disturbed my country and sprinkled its soil with Venezuelan blood, shed by Venezuelan hands. We South American patriots lament that we are compelled to behold, in this civilized age, the barbarous spectacle of an appeal to arms in changing the officers of our government, after half a century of independence; but such is our misfortune, and we must meet it with republican valor, and persevere till the great task of our political regeneration is achieved.

To give you a more complete idea of those events it will be necessary to go back to the beginning of the revolutionary tempest that has recently broken with such violence over Venezuela.

In the beginning of 1858, General José Tadeo Monagas, then ruler of the country, began the work of fiscal corruption, squandered the public money, and attempted to exercise despotic power; which acts so aroused the people in March of that year that the President did not venture to use the forces at his disposal to defend his legal authority, but resigned it into the hands of congress and sought the protection of a foreign legation for his person.

The victorious revolutionists proclaimed as President of the republic the governor of the province that first took up arms against the unpopular President, and he was recognized by all the other provinces, that soon elected delegates to a reconstructing convention.

The two contending political parties in Venezuela are called the liberal and the oligarchs; the latter, in Colombia and Mexico, are known as conservatives, and is the party which has governed the country the longest, as well as in all the new republics, through the faithlessness of a few liberal leaders, aided by the direct or indirect help of some foreign powers that wish to change the form of governments that have been generally adopted in South America.

The opposition to Monagas was begun by the oligarchs with a few of the liberals in the constituent convention, but three-fourths were of the former party.

One of the first acts of that convention was to declare, almost unanimously, Monagas a traitor to his country and the assassin of a congress; for which he was condemned to perpetual banishment. That convention sanctioned a central constitution, and the liberal members protested against it because all the provinces had pronounced in favor of a federation. When the constitution was promulgated, all the liberals pronounced against it, and they gained their cause, after a five years' struggle.

General Falcon was at the head of the federal army, and of course he was elected provisional President. He began by repealing all the laws and persecuting decrees of the conquered party, even that causing the exile of Monagas; and thus, for the first time, a government was formed in Venezuela that did not proscribe the conquered, but offered them protection.

The federal form of government having been restored to the republic in 1864, General Falcon was elected constitutional President of the Union; but, unfortunately, he did not assume the great task that destiny had allotted him, and, faithless to the same principles he proclaimed during the war of five years—principles which had become the supreme law of the land by acts of the national convention—he governed in a manner so contrary to those principles and the will of the people that the public turned against him, and a large party took up arms to depose the treacherous ruler. The President, believing he could not resist the impending revolution, daily increasing in force to drive him from power, resigned in April last, and appointed a regency of the most respectable men in the federal party. This regency elected General Manuel E. Bruzual, minister of war and marine, as chief executive, in strict accordance with the constitution. He began his administration by repealing all the unconstitutional acts of President Falcon, and published a message, in which he promised due obedience to the constitution, and did all he could to restore peace by ordering elections for this year.

The leaders of the revolution, however, not fancying the result of an election, determined to decide the question by a resort to arms.

The oligarchs and personal friends of Monagas, having joined the revolutionists, worked upon the hate of the liberals for Falcon, and thus succeeded in bringing over many leaders of the federal party.

The new government, intent upon securing peace without effusion of blood, neglected assembling forces sufficient to oppose the revolutionists in the Central States. It had hardly been two weeks in power when it was attacked by them, on the 5th of May. The chief executive repelled this first attack, and others, up to the 10th, with the small garrison of the district, which he commanded in person, and, hoping to bring about a reconciliation by peaceful means, managed an interview with the revolutionary leader, and the contest ended with a treaty the next day.

The leaders of the different revolutionary bands approved of this treaty at first; but in a few days they began to prepare for war, and General Monagas was proclaimed chief, though he was at that time far from Caracas, was in open rebellion against the national government, and at the head of the militia in the State of Barcelona.

General Bruzual, still resolved on peace, instead of asking quotas from the loyal States to defend the general government, sent a commissioner to Monagas to ask for a reconciliation. This only hurried his march upon the federal district. This man, then marching upon Caracas, had under him the same officers, who, ten years before, had condemned him as an assassin of congress.

At the time of the treaty of Auteniano General Mendoza was at the head of the rebel forces in the State of Bolivia; and as he offered to support the government, he was made President of the State, and arms were sent him for his troops. With new forces he now marched against Monagas, who was invading that State. But he soon joined Monagas, and they marched together upon Caracas. General Bruzual once more attempted conciliatory measures and on the 20th of June, had a parley with the rebel chief in the suburbs of the capital. At that interview a reduction of the federal army was proposed, and its concentration within the district, till an election could be held in all the States; and as a corollary of this proposal there was to be an armistice, and half of the new cabinet was to be chosen from among the rebel chiefs. But the rebel chief rejected all these proposals, and insisted that the supreme power should be surrendered to him; that his policy should prevail, and his plans of reconstruction be carried out. On hearing this outrageous proposal, General Bruzual broke up the conference and returned to the city, resolved to defend it with the one thousand and eighty-five men in its garrison. The city was attacked on the morning of the 22d, and after a brave defense of seventy hours against a triple force, the capital fell into the hands of the rebels, with two-thirds of its defenders dead in the streets. General Bruzual escaped alone to La Guayra, where he had three hundred men, and went with them to Puerto Cabello, the strongest fort in Venezuela. On the 27th he appointed new ministers, as the others were captured, and proclaimed Puerto Cabello the federal district and capital. The government and loyal States yet have high hopes of being able to drive the rebels out of Caracas.

The rebels hold the States of Nueva Esparta, Barcelona, Bolivia, Aragua, Guárico, part of Carabobo, and a portion of the States of Apure and Coro.

The government still retains possession of the States of Zulia, Merida, Tachira, Tanjillo, Zamora, Yaracuy, Portuguesa, Barquisimeto, Nueva Andalucia, the larger part of Coro and Apure, and a corner of Carabobo. The State of Guayana has declared itself neutral.

The consequence is, that a rebel party is attempting to destroy the government, and the struggle will depend upon the means the government may have for its defense.

In such a situation it is to be hoped that the government of the United States of America will extend us a friendly hand, to aid us in suppressing the rebellion.

A favorable answer is anxiously expected.

I embrace the occasion to repeat the assurances of my distinguished consideration.

B. BRUZUAL.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Señor Mesa.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 24, 1868,

The undersigned, the Secretary of State of the United States, has the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a communication which was addressed to him on the 20th of July last, by his excellency Miguel Garcia Mesa, from the department of foreign relations at Puerto Cabello. In that communication Señor Garcia Mesa informs this government of the United States that the government of the United States of Venezuela has changed the federal district and seat of administration from the city of Caracas to the city of Puerto Cabello, which latter city is, for a while, constituted the capital of the United States of Venezuela in regard to their constitution and federal laws.

Señor Garcia Mesa further mentions that a notice of the same effect had already, before the date of his communication, been sent to the several diplomatic and consular agents of foreign countries residing at Caracas, who, it was supposed, would communicate the same to the governments which they respectively represent.

Señor Garcia Mesa further states that his government has thought proper to send the present communication directly to the undersigned, for the reason that it is necessary to appeal to the relations of peace and friendship by which the United States of America are connected with the United States of Venezuela, and to claim the fulfillment of the existing treaty between the two countries for the purpose of preventing, within the territory or dominion of either party, any act from being done by the agents of either party which would have for its object to prepare hostile expeditions or to acquire materials for war against the other party in the treaty.

Señor Garcia Mesa declares that the claim thus asserted rests on the fact that the government which is now established at Caracas is a factious and unconstitutional government, and that that unconstitutional government has sent an agent, José A. Velutini, for the purpose of obtaining, for the uses of the revolution headed by General José Tadeo Monagas, elements of warfare of all kinds, among them one or more monitors or iron-clads, with which to attack the vessels and forts held by the constitutional government in behalf of which Señor Garcia Mesa writes. Señor Garcia Mesa further states that his government (now at Puerto Cabello) has just accredited to the government of the United States a diplomatic agent, for the special purpose of counteracting the operations of the said Commissioner Velutini, and to seek in that respect the fulfillment of the obligations existing between the United States of America and the United States of Venezuela, as well as a disavowal of the consular and diplomatic agents whom the revolutionary party now at Caracas pretends to appoint and establish. Señor Garcia Mesa further states that his government is desirous of anticipating the delays which the diplomatic agent alluded to may incur in his journey, and therefore that government hopes that this government will without delay issue all the orders necessary to prevent the Commissioner Velutini from realizing the armament and expedition which he may have set on foot against the government which is now established at Puerto Cabello. Señor Miguel Garcia Mesa concludes with expressing a confident expectation that his communication will suffice to put a stop to the operations which the enemies of the government established at Puerto Cabello may intend to carry out in the territory of the United States of America, and that such enemies will be prevented and punished, in accordance with the treaty between the two countries and the neutrality laws of the United States of America.

In reply, the undersigned is directed to inform Señor Garcia Mesa that the commercial agent of the United States charged with the affairs of the legation at Caracas has already communicated to his government the notice which was transmitted to him by the government now established at Puerto Cabello, to the effect that that government had changed the federal district and removed the seat of administration from the city of Caracas to the city of Puerto Cabello. Señor Garcia Mesa is further informed that the provisional government of General Monagas, now established at Caracas, has given notice to this government that the diplomatic and commercial agents to the United States heretofore appointed by the government of Venezuela have been dismissed by the government now established at Caracas, from their employments.

Señor Garcia Mesa is further informed that no diplomatic or consular agent appointed by either the government at Caracas or the government now established at Puerto Cabello has yet presented himself for recognition at this capital. Señor Garcia Mesa is further informed that this department has no information of any designs or purposes, prosecuted or entertained by any party, foreign or domestic, now in this country, to violate the neutrality laws of the United States in regard to the republic of Venezuela.

The communication of Señor Miguel Garcia Mesa will be filed in the archives of this department for such reference as occasion shall hereafter require.

The government of the United States deplors the calamity of civil war which has overtaken the republic of Venezuela, and is desirous to lend its good offices, in any practical way, to contribute to a restoration of internal peace, good order, and effective republic government in the United States of Venezuela.

The undersigned avails himself of the occasion to tender to Señor Garcia Mesa the assurance of his high consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Señor MIGUEL GARCIA MESA,

At the Department of Foreign Relations, Puerto Cabello.

Mr. Seward to Señor Ribas.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, August 25, 1868.

The undersigned, Secretary of State of the United States, has just now come to the knowledge of a note which was addressed to him by Señor Florencio Ribas, chargé d'affaires for Venezuela, on the 5th of August. In that note Señor Ribas assumes that it is already known to the undersigned that the federal district and capital of Venezuela have been occupied by a revolutionary party, and that a new provisional and military government has been established at Caracas for the republic of Venezuela, under a decree by the general-in-chief of the successful army.

Señor Ribas further assumes that it is known to this government that the constitutional government of the United States of Venezuela has removed itself to the city of Puerto Cabello, where it continues to exercise its authority. Standing upon these assumptions, Señor Ribas inquires of the undersigned what will be the conduct and policy of this government upon the state of things thus described in Venezuela.

In reply to the note thus recited the undersigned has the honor to state, for the information of Señor Ribas, that the legation of the United States for Venezuela remains at Caracas, which is understood to have been the constitutional capital of the United States of Venezuela. That the legation is authorized to hold such communication with the new provisional government established at Caracas as will be essential to save and protect the rights of the United States and their citizens. This government nevertheless receives for ulterior consideration the question of the formal recognition of the provisional government now existing at Caracas, or such other government there or elsewhere as may claim such recognition.

Señor Ribas is further informed that the provisional government which is thus established at Caracas has given official notice to his government that the powers of his excellency Blas Bruzual as minister, and also those of Señor Ribas as secretary of legation for the United States of Venezuela to the United States of America, have been withdrawn by the provisional government at Caracas; and so the provisional government at Caracas claims that the powers of Señor Blas Bruzual and Señor Ribas have altogether ceased. Señor Ribas is further informed that this department has received notice from Señor Miguel García Mesa, who writes in the capacity of minister for foreign relations for the republic of Venezuela, that the constitutional government of the United States of Venezuela has been removed from Caracas, and that it is now established in Puerto Cabello, under the supreme executive authority of General Bruzual, military chief of the so-called constitutional forces at Puerto Cabello. In the notice thus reviewed, that minister protests against and denounces the provisional government which is established at Caracas as factious, and unconstitutional and altogether void.

The receipt of the last-mentioned communication has been duly acknowledged by this government, on the 24th instant, to the writer thereof.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to tender to Mr. Ribas a renewed assurance of his high consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

Señor FLORENCIO RIBAS, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Señor Bruzual.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 27, 1868.

The Secretary of State of the United States has the honor to say for the information of Mr. Bruzual what follows: This government has been officially informed that an armed revolution recently broke out in the United States of Venezuela, which has been attended by the incidents following, namely: That the President of the United States of Venezuela, Mr. Falcon, has abdicated or resigned the office of President and has taken refuge at Curaçoa, after having first appointed a regency; that this regency then called Manuel E. Bruzual, who had been minister of war and marine, to exercise the chief executive power of the republic at Caracas, the national capital; that afterward the government of Mr.

Bruzual was overthrown at Caracas, and that a provisional government under the direction of General Monagas was established at that place; and that General Bruzual, having made his escape from that city by flight, has afterwards effected a satisfactory reorganization of the same at Puerto Cabello.

It thus appears there are two distinct governments existing de facto in the republic of Venezuela, each of which claims supreme authority over all the territory of that republic. These two governments are engaged in civil war, and the nation is divided between them. Each claims to represent the republic of Venezuela in international transactions with the United States and other foreign powers. The provisional government at Caracas has given notice to the United States that Mr. Blas Bruzual, and all other diplomatic agents of the United States of Venezuela, have been displaced and deprived of their functions by the government now established at Caracas.

The provisional government which is established at Puerto Cabello has given notice that it has established a blockade of the Port La Guayra, and of a large portion of the adjacent sea-coast. The provisional government at Caracas has denounced that blockade as illegal and unconstitutional, and has issued a decree for the opening of the ports of the republic to foreign trade. The note which Mr. Blas Bruzual addressed to the Secretary of State on the 24th of August, instant, in relation to the political situation of Venezuela, has been received, read, and filed among the archives of this department. The undersigned has also given audience to Mr. Blas Bruzual personally upon the subjects discussed in that paper.

Mr. Blas Bruzual, however, is expected to understand that the government of the United States, by extending to him this respectful attention, does not in any way commit itself upon the question which of the two contending governments in Venezuela, if either, represents the true and sovereign authority of that republic. In the mean time the United States will not decline to receive information from any agents of those governments, while the United States will expect of each, that, so far as the authority which it exercises is concerned, the rights of the United States and of their citizens will be duly observed and respected. It only remains for the undersigned to observe that this government will await such solution of the political problem thus offered as must in due time take place in Venezuela, with the final sanction of the people of that republic. It can hardly be necessary to add that the government of the United States deeply deplores the civil war which has created the necessity for these explanations.

The undersigned avails himself of this occasion to offer to Mr. Bruzual the assurances of his high consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Republic of Uruguay, October 15, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of dispatch No. 1, of April 11th ultimo, from your department to this legation, informing me that the Senate had been pleased to confirm my nomination as minister resident to Uruguay, and inclosing my printed personal instructions; a sealed letter of credentials, with an office copy of the same; a circular letter on the duties of keeping up the records of the legation; and a list of the diplomatic and consular officers of the United States.

Before proceeding to acquaint you with my action in consequence of this dispatch, permit me to express my high sense of the further favor thus manifested to me. It was an honor which I felt deeply when, although only an adopted son of the great republic, I was commissioned to represent it abroad near the government of the Argentine Republic.

The additional trust now committed to me inspires feelings of profound gratitude, which I hope to be spared to evince by the zealous attention to the interests of the United States, for which the department so kindly gives me credit.

At the moment of receiving your dispatch No. 1, there was such an abatement of the sickness which has so long prostrated me as to afford hope that in a short time I might be able, in conformity with my instructions, to proceed to Montevideo.

Finding, however, that I was unable to travel, on the 6th September, ultimo, I opened communication by letter with Señor Don Alberto Flangini, the Uruguay minister of foreign affairs, which resulted in the reception of my credentials by the provisional governor of that republic; the address of a letter by him to the President of the United States, and the issue of a decree, under date of October 2d, ultimo, recognizing me in the character of minister resident of the United States to Uruguay.

I have the honor to inclose herewith, marked A, the above-mentioned sealed letter of the provisional governor of Uruguay to the President of the United States, and to annex a full copy of my correspondence with Señor Flangini, of my address to the provisional governor, and of his decree above alluded to, viz:

No. 1.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, September 6, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that the President of the United States of America was pleased to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, has appointed me to be minister resident of the United States of America to the republic of Uruguay, in addition to my present mission here.

Fully sensible of the importance of the high trust confided to me by my government, and convinced of the mutual benefits that will accrue to both republics from the establishment of more close and friendly relations between them, nothing would have given me greater gratification than, on the receipt of my commission, to have proceeded at once to Montevideo, the capital of the republic, there to ascertain, through your kind offices, the pleasure of his excellency the provisional governor, General Venancio Flores, as to the presentation of the letter accrediting me in my new official capacity.

A long protracted illness has, however, confined me for several months to a sick bed; and, as I am still unable to leave my room, I venture herewith, confidentially, to request that your excellency may be pleased to inform me whether, under these peculiar circumstances, which render impossible at present my having the honor to deliver my credentials personally into the hands of the chief magistrate of the republic, his excellency General Flores would consent to a deviation from the established rule, and permit me to present them through your excellency by an official letter.

I beg to inclose a certified copy of these my credentials, and avail myself of this opportunity to assure your excellency of the distinguished consideration with which I have the honor to be your excellency's obedient servant,

A. ASBOTH.

His Excellency Señor DON ALBERTO FLANGINI,
Minister for Foreign Affairs, Montevideo.

[Confidential.—Translation.]

OFFICE OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Montevideo, September 13, 1867.

MR. MINISTER: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's confidential note, dated the 6th instant, No. 1, in which you are pleased to communicate to me that his excellency the President of the United States of America has thought proper to appoint you his minister resident near my government, manifesting at the same time the material impossibility in which you find yourself of delivering personally the letter accrediting you in the above-mentioned character, a copy of which is inclosed by your excellency.

Having brought this communication to the knowledge of his excellency the provisional governor of the republic, Brigadier General Don Venancio Flores, he has desired me to say to your excellency, in reply, that the Oriental government, being anxious to cultivate, in all sincerity, and to bind closer the relations of friendship which happily exist between the two republics, views with the highest gratification your excellency's appointment as the worthy representative of the great North American republic in the Oriental Republic.

I have, at the same time, the satisfaction to make known to your excellency that, in consequence of the motives given in the note to which I am now replying, with regard to the delivery of the credentials, although, as your excellency states, the form proposed by you is a deviation from the established rule, nevertheless, the Oriental government, out of deference to your excellency, consents that the credentials alluded to should be remitted to this office to be duly recognized.

With this, it is highly gratifying to me to offer to your excellency the assurances of my grateful consideration and distinguished regard.

ALBERTO FLANGINI.

His Excellency DON ALEXANDRO ASBOTH,
Minister Resident of the United States of America, Buenos Ayres.

No. 2.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Buenos Ayres, September 15, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's communication on the 13th instant, in which you reply to my confidential note of the 6th instant. Your excellency is pleased to state that the Oriental government, in kind consideration of the circumstances which render my removal from my sick room at present impossible, is willing to deviate from the existing general rule and sanction the presentation of my credentials, accrediting me as United States minister resident in the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, through your excellency's good offices, by an official letter.

I have, in consequence, the honor to forward herewith a sealed letter from the President of the United States of America to his excellency the provisional governor of the Oriental Republic of Uruguay accrediting me to its government, as well as an address from myself to his excellency Brigadier General Don Venancio Flores, both of which I would request your excellency to deliver into the hands of his excellency the chief magistrate of the republic for official consideration.

And while acknowledging my high sense of the personal obligation implied in the readiness with which the Oriental government has acceded to my request, I have more particularly to beg that your excellency will accept my special and most sincere thanks, and will also allow me to assure you again of the high consideration with which I have the honor to be your excellency's obedient servant.

A. ASBOTH.

His Excellency Señor Don ALBERTO FLANGINI,
Minister for Foreign Affairs, Montevideo.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Buenos Ayres, September 17, 1867.

Address of General A. Asboth, in presenting his credentials as minister of the United States of America near the government of the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, to his excellency Brigadier General Don Venancio Flores, chief magistrate of the Oriental Republic.

GENERAL: I have the honor to present herewith to your excellency my credentials as minister resident of the United States of America, and in so doing I beg leave to assure your excellency that, fully sensible of the honor that has devolved upon me of inaugurating, for the first time, official diplomatic relations between the United States of America and the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, it will not only be my duty but my highest pleasure to uphold and foster, both officially and personally, in a spirit of true friendship and harmony, those relations which, I sincerely trust, may lastingly be productive of mutual benefits to the two sister republics.

Your excellency will therefore permit me, in thus placing in your hands my letter of credence from the President of the United States of America, to assure your excellency that the sentiments therein expressed will always find in me a faithful exponent. And I beg to add my heartfelt desire and earnest hope, that the day may soon arrive in which the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, crowned with a profound, substantial, and lasting peace, shall be free to pursue its noble career of progress and humanity, and, by faithfully advancing the interests of republican institutions, steadily develop the prosperity and happiness of its people.

May Almighty God preserve your excellency many years in His safe and holy keeping.

OFFICE OF FOREIGN AFFAIRS,
Montevideo, October 2, 1867.

MR. MINISTER: I have had the honor to receive your excellency's note, dated 17th ultimo, inclosing the letters of credence accrediting you in the character of minister resident of the United States of America in this republic, as well as your excellency's address on your reception.

These documents have been laid before the provisional governor. He has charged me to thank your excellency, in his name, for the terms in which your address is conceived; assuring you, at the same time, that he feels the highest satisfaction in cultivating and strengthening through your excellency the sincere and cordial relations which must always subsist between both republics.

I hereby inclose to your excellency a certified copy of the decree issued this day by his excellency the provisional governor, recognizing your excellency in the above mentioned character, and I beg at the same time that you may be pleased to forward to its address the letter which, with the customary copy, I remit to your excellency for the United States of America.

Having thus fulfilled the order of his excellency the provisional governor, I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of my highest consideration and regard.

ALBERTO FLANGINI.

His Excellency Don ALESANDRO ASBOTH,
Minister resident of the United States of America, Buenos Ayres.

Certified copy of the decree recognizing General A. Asboth, in the above mentioned character as minister of the United States of America to the republic of Uruguay.

OFFICE OF FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Montevideo, October 2, 1867.

DECREE.

The provisional governor of the republic decrees:

ARTICLE 1. Don Alesandro Asboth is hereby recognized in the character of minister resident of the United States of America, in accordance with the credential letters he has presented.

ART. 2. Don Alesandro Asboth is, moreover, declared to hold and enjoy the prerogatives and exemptions to which he is entitled by public right.

ART. 3. Let this be communicated, published, and inserted in the corresponding register.

FLORES.

ALBERTO FLANGINI.

Under date of October 13th, ultimo, I addressed a further note, No. 3, to Señor Flangini, acknowledging the courteous manner in which my credentials had been received by the provisional governor of Uruguay, announcing my formal entry on the duties of minister resident of the United States to that republic, and informing him of the reply of the President to the letter of the provisional governor declining, on the part of Uruguay, the mediation proffered by the United States in the war between the allies and Paraguay. The following is a copy of the said note:

No. 3.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Buenos Ayres, October 13, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's favor of the 2d instant, in reply to my official request marked No. 2, and dated September 15th, relative to submitting my credentials as minister resident of the United States of America to the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, and my own address to his excellency Brigadier General Don Venancio Flores, chief magistrate of that republic, for his official consideration.

In this communication your excellency was good enough to inform me of the kind manner in which his excellency the provisional governor of the Oriental Republic had been pleased to receive those official documents, and the assurance of the high satisfaction which his excellency feels in cultivating and strengthening the most sincere and cordial relations between the two sister republics.

At the same time your excellency was pleased to inclose a certified copy of the decree issued on the 2d instant by his excellency Brigadier General Don Venancio Flores, recognizing me in the above-mentioned character of minister resident of the United States of America near his government, together with a letter from his excellency the provisional governor to the President of the United States of America.

Having thus been duly installed through your excellency's kind offices in my diplomatic mission near the government of the Oriental Republic of Uruguay, I have the honor hereby to enter formally upon the duties connected with this my new office.

In doing so, I beg leave to inform your excellency that I have been officially advised by the Secretary of State of the United States of America that he has had the honor to receive from your excellency a communication, in which, while your excellency in the name of the Oriental Republic declines the good offices proffered by the United States for the restoration of peace in the countries of the La Plata, your excellency expresses at the same time a high appreciation of those good offices, and assigns the reasons for the course which the Oriental Republic feels itself bound to pursue.

I am further instructed by the Secretary of State to mention that your excellency's communication has been laid before the President of the United States, and that, while the President regrets the failure of his efforts to secure the restoration of peace, he hopes at the same time that that consummation may be speedily reached in some manner which will be honorable and satisfactory to the respective belligerents, and that he will hold himself at all times ready to contribute to that end in any way which shall seem likely to be agreeable to the parties concerned, and at the same time effective.

Having thus fulfilled the orders of my government, I avail myself of this opportunity to renew to your excellency the assurances of the high consideration and regard with which I have the honor to be your excellency's obedient servant,

A. ASBOTH.

Señor Don ALBERTO FLANGINI,
Minister of Foreign Affairs, Montivideo.

I venture, in conclusion, to offer to you, sir, personally, the tribute of my warm and grateful acknowledgments of the renewed confidence reposed in me; and I have the honor to be, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 28, 1866.

SIR: I inclose a copy of a letter of this date addressed to me by Mr. James A. Scrymser, a director of the International Ocean Telegraph Company, requesting that you may be instructed to aid Mr. Charles Rebello, an agent of that company, in obtaining from the government of the United States of Colombia the privilege of landing their cable on the shores of that republic. As the interests of the government and citizens of the United States are materially concerned in securing, as soon as practicable, reliable telegraphic communication with that republic, the application of the company is commended to your attention.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Baranquilla, May 24, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that I arrived here on the 7th instant, by the most expeditious route from New York, and would have proceeded by the first conveyance on my mission to Bogota had not all communication between here and there been cut off by the calamities of the fratricidal war which prevails to an alarming extent in this once beautiful and happy, but now blighted, country.

On the day of my arrival here, General Rudecindo Lopez, the secretary of war of the United States of Colombia, was peremptorily refused permission either to pass into or through the State of Magdalena, by an armed force under command of the President (General Riasco) of that State. General Lopez then ordered the federal troops stationed at Santa Martha to meet him as soon as possible at Cartagena, and on the 17th instant he arrived here with about four hundred troops, where he still remains, totally cut off from all communication with Bogota by General Riasco, who has proclaimed himself President of the United States of Colombia.

General Lopez has imprisoned Señor Onofre Veugoechea, a wealthy and respectable native of this place, for having disabled and refused to refit a steamboat which General Lopez required to enable him to pursue General Riasco, who is said to be stationed about two hundred miles above this place, on the most commanding point of the Magdalena River.

Inclosure No. 4 shows that on the 18th instant General Lopez had blockaded the port of Santa Martha with the old and almost useless steamer Colombia. This act is considered here as a farce.

On the 20th he caused the people of Baranquilla, a city of about twelve thousand inhabitants, to be assessed in the sum of $4,600 for the support of his troops; and of this sum the foreigners had to pay $3,000. He will require a larger sum in a few days. He is conscripting all native men he can find here to fill up his army. The people are becoming panic-stricken, and are concealing themselves from the draft. And now comes the great event:

On the 29th of April last, General Mosquera, the duly elected President of the United States of Colombia, had forcibly dissolved congress; imprisoned the governor of Bogota, and others; decreed the whole country in a state of revolution; and thus bid defiance to his enemies, who, it seems, were resolving to impeach and destroy him, as will appear from his decree and messages, published in his official paper of the 30th of April and 1st of May. He is reported to have about three thousand troops under his command at Bogota, and to be in no better situation there than his secretary is in here.

General Mosquera, though seventy years old, is still possessed of great energy, insatiable ambition and love of power. He is one of the ablest men this country has produced, and is feared by all. He has served as an officer of great merit in the army of Bolivar, whose sad and cruel fate seems to await the new dictator.

Bolivar died amid squalid misery, receiving his last scanty subsistence, in a lonely hut a few miles back of Santa Martha, from the hands of a pitying stranger.

The State of Santioguia, the most powerful, wealthy, and best governed of all these nine States, has sent a well-appointed army of five thousand men to crush General Mosquera in his stronghold at Bogota.

The State of Santander, another powerful State, is organizing a similar force for the same purpose.

The State of Panama, isolated by sea and long distance from the other States, will, at the proper time, inevitably seek to throw off the confederate yoke, and set up for herself an independent government conformable to her long-cherished wishes and friendly to ours.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

Decree for public order, issued by T. C. De Mosquera, grand general and President of the United States of Colombia.

Considering, first, that the house of representatives in secret session has adopted a series of resolutions hostile to the cause of the republic, and which, if carried out, will certainly endanger the national sovereignty; second, that the executive power cannot consent to this crime of high treason, committed by an allied majority of illegal deputies, leagued together in the house of representatives on the 14th of March last, although opposed in their parricidal measures by the liberals of said house, now subjected and oppressed by said coalition; third, that the executive power has information that said coalition has determined to continue the session of congress, which will expire to-morrow in accordance with the constitution; it is decreed:

ARTICLE 1. The republic is declared to be in a state of war, in conformity with article ninety-one of the national constitution.

ART. 2. The session of congress is closed for this year.

Done in Bogota, on the 29th of April, 1867.

Message of the President of the Union to the presidents and governors of the States.

I send you the decree of public order, issued on the 29th, declaring the republic to be in a state of war, according to the ninety-first article of the national constitution, and the session of congress closed for the present year.

Events of which you have official notice, and the preamble of the decree, explain the motives for its issue.

The desire of the general government, under these circumstances, is to keep peace at all hazard, and this ought to be the wish of all good citizens.

I hasten, therefore, to inform you that what has taken place will not affect the internal government of your State, and that the national executive power will keep the peace with each one of the States, and see that no cause of discontent arises.

As order was disturbed by the majority of the coalition in congress, it was found necessary to declare the republic in a state of war; but this declaration does not affect the States, under their constitutions and local laws.

One of the great advantages of the federal system which we have adopted is the power to save the country from a majority tending to misrule, not representing the people in congress, and wishing to plunge into civil war, as would happen in like cases under a central rule. Your State, therefore, will not consider itself attacked by the general government, but will continue its administration in accordance to the constitution and laws of the republic. To put an end to the present condition of things, I recommend you to call together the legislative assembly, state to it what has occurred; let it pass resolutions to confirm order, and then elect senators and representatives to a new congress, to be assembled by order of the executive power of the Union, to restore the former condition of the republic which has been disturbed by the recent events mentioned, to give strength to the federal institutions, and to order an election of a president for the next constitutional term.

Acting with judgment, as it is hoped your State will, recent events will turn to the people's benefit, by putting an end to the frequent changes in administrations, caused by the spirit of disorder and continual anarchy that never ceases to threaten the existence of the republic.

If, unfortunately, some of the States do not comprehend the views of the general government, and evil passions excite to hostility, those States may rely upon all lovers of order and civilization to put down any rebellion, however great it may be, and the insurgents may expect the severest retribution, for the time has come when peace, order, liberty, and progress must be established on indestructible bases, at every sacrifice.

The executive power has asked congress to pass a law to make arrangements with the Roman pontiff, chief of the Catholic church, to settle the church question, which has so long disturbed the consciences of true believers. Such a law was passed on the 29th instant, and the executive power will instantly order its execution, so that the people and ministers of the Catholic faith may rest assured that their spiritual interest will be properly cared for.

The government of the Union was pained on seeing itself obliged to issue the decree of the 29th; but the nation knows it is not his fault, and that he did it under the pressure of inevitable circumstances.

The fact that it was issued in accordance with the ninety-first article of the national constitution, does not mean that it is an attack upon peaceful persons, who support the government, and contend for the salvation of the republic.

The city of Bogota has been formed into a federal district by the vote of the legislative assembly of Cundinamarea, to the great gratification of its inhabitants, with the approval of Dr. Jesus Jimenes, president of the State, who was appointed by the legislature to govern the district.

Public confidence, so agitated during the session of the last congress, has been restored, and everything now promises peace, order, liberty, security and progress.

Your government will be duly informed of every event of importance that may take place.

Address of T. C. de Mosquera, Grand General and President of the United States of Colombia to the inhabitants.

Peace was restored on the 16th of March, by an agreement between the executive power and the dissenting party in congress, and the nation is pleased to learn that citizens who once differed in political opinions are now reconciled.

Civil war has broken out in the State of Magdalena, in spite of all I did to prevent it. A faction in congress choose to call order tyranny, a faithful execution of the laws despotism, and virtue a crime. These men have been faithless to their promises of the 16th of March; they are busy in destruction; they have taken all power from the President, and wish to ruin the country to get rid of its ruler.

The names of these men are known to you; they are enemies to national prosperity, and glory in their work of destruction; they would pull down the President, his political friends, and all who sustain him.

And the conservatives of congress, laying aside their proclaimed principles of order and virtue, have joined the opposition in all decisive votes, and have thus contributed to increase social disorder.

Colombians! A message to the presidents of the States will inform them of what has occurred, and will instruct them how to maintain their sovereignty by appealing to the people, the true sovereigns, whose duty it is to correct the legislative power when it attempts to destroy the federal union and the executive government.

Inhabitants of Bogota and Cundinamarea! The government promises you perfect enjoyment of your rights; it promises you security in your persons, so long as you obey the laws and submit to the constitution.

As soon as elections have been held, the new congress will convene and will hasten to settle existing difficulties.

Fellow countrymen! I hope you will confide in my intentions to preserve peace among you, and in my acts to save the nation.

Done at Bogota, in the government palace, on the 30th of April, 1867, in the 57th year of independence.

Decree closing the port of Santa Marta to imports and exports.

Rudecindo Lopez, commander general of marine and chief of the 2d division of the Colombian guards, considering, 1st. That the sovereign State of Magdalena, of which Joaquin Riascos is president, is declared by decree of this date to be in open rebellion against the national government; 2d. That the enemy must not be allowed to seize upon the national revenues, to be used against republican institutions; 3d. That the important port of Santa Marta is situated within the territory occupied by the rebels; by the power conferred upon him by the executive, and in obedience to instructions, decrees:

ARTICLE 1. The port of Santa Marta is hereby declared closed to import and export trade.

ART. 2. One of the national war steamers shall cruise along the Colombian coast in front of said port, to effect the blockade.

ART. 3. All goods and merchandise brought into the port of Santa Marta contrary to these provisions shall be considered contraband, to all intents and purposes. Goods intended for that port may be discharged in any other open port of the republic, without permits or certificates from the officials of the closed custom-house.

Let this be promulgated.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Baranquilla, U. S. of Colombia, May 29, 1867.

SIR: Inclosed are copies of correspondence, Nos. 12, 13, 5, and 6, had between Mr. Hanaberg, United States consul at Carthagena, and myself, on the subject of the wrongful enlistment and detention of the crew of the steamer Rayo.

Also on the necessity of two or three American war steamers cruising in Colombia waters during this rebellion, as a protection to the lives and property of American citizens here, and to afford mail facilities, now suspended by the operations of the war in this country.

Also on account of General Lopez and his troops; and of the murder of one of the crew of the American war steamer Osceola by his comrade.

There are three English war ships at Carthagena looking after the interests of British subjects, who claim a lien upon, and have been for some time receiving thirty-seven and a half per cent. of, the gross receipts of all the custom-houses in the country.

No. 12.]

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Carthagena, May 14, 1867.

SIR: By a communication received from the consulate at Baranquilla I have been informed of your arrival in the country, and that you intended to leave Baranquilla on the 16th instant for the capital; consequently, I presume, this will reach you at Calamar, which is the port of this city on the Magdalena.

It is my duty to report to you the following circumstances which have occurred in connection with this consulate: On the 21st of last month some of the crew of the steamer Rayo, lying in this harbor as a Colombian war steamer, made their escape from that vessel, and coming to this consulate made complaint that themselves and several others, American citizens, were detained on board of that vessel illegally, and against their will; that they had shipped in the vessel at New York, as the R. R. Cuyler, under the American flag, for a voyage to Aspinwall, where they were to be discharged and receive their extra wages according to the laws of the United States; but that instead of going to Aspinwall the vessel came out to Santa Martha, where her name was changed to El Rayo, and the Colombian flag was hoisted in the place of the American; in consequence of which they refused to continue their service on board of the steamer, but were compelled to do so by threats of confinement in irons. They stated that the most of the men who were in the case stated were married, with families living in New York, where they were anxious to return.

I brought the matter at once to the notice of the President of the State, and sent his excellency two communications on the subject, receiving no answer except a verbal one, that the matter should be brought to the notice of the commander of the national marine and the commander of the Rayo, who, after several days, presented to me a crew list, certified by the collector of the port of New York, in form according to the laws of the United States. By this it appeared that the men were engaged for the steamer R. R. Cuyler, Captain Dollard, for a "voyage to a Colombian port, and from thence to any part of the world, at the orders of the Colombian government, for the term of two years." But this paper did not contain the signatures of the men; neither has the vessel any articles signed by those men to authorize holding them to service under a foreign flag against their wish; and having taken the sworn deposition of several of them, it was evident to me that they had been deceived; consequently I demanded from his excellency the President that they should be discharged and paid off according to the laws of the United States, by which they should receive three months' extra wages.

Receiving no answer to my demands, and fearing that those seamen might be imperilled on account of their being in the Rayo, which vessel was in the custody of a Spanish frigate in this harbor, I wrote to the commander of the United States vessel of war at Aspinwall stating the case, and requesting him to come here with his vessel and demand the release of those men, if he should think proper so to do.

On the 6th instant, the United States steamer Osceola, Commander J. P. Foster, came into port. Captain Foster sent his respects to the President, and offered to salute the town. The salute was declined for the reason that there were not the means of returning the compliment. The following day Commander Foster and myself waited upon the President, renewing my complaint, and requested to have the men, a list of whose names I had procured, sent to the consulate to be examined. This was agreed to; and after an examination of the men, and also of the crew list, in connection with the officers of the Rayo, Commander Foster was convinced, and those officers acknowledged, that the shipment of the crew was irregular, and that there was no right to retain those men. Commander Foster then sent a note to his excellency the President demanding the delivery of those men and their payment, and stating that, as he was anxious to leave, he desired to have the whole case settled by three o'clock p. m. of the 8th. This note was delivered on the morning of that day, and at the same time a note was received from his excellency stating that the seamen would be delivered to the consulate.

In the afternoon thirteen seamen were received from the Rayo and sent on board the Osceola, together with four others who had previously escaped from the Rayo. No payment was made to these men, and they were sent on shore with only their clothes; consequently Commander Foster wrote another note to the President reminding his excellency that, besides the discharge of those sailors, he had demanded their payment, and that, being obliged to return to Aspinwall the next morning, he should leave that part of the matter in my charge for a settlement. I inclosed this note to his excellency in one from myself requesting a settlement as soon as convenient. To this I received an answer from his excellency, inclosing a note from the captain of the Rayo, recommending that, as those men were shipped at New York, where the regular shipping papers must exist, the settlement with regard to their remuneration had better be made in the United States by the government and the representatives of the United States of Colombia at that port. To this I have answered that, unless the full amount claimed by myself is paid to me here, I can only refer the case to the Department of State.

I have since received a communication from the President of the State communicating a statement of the captain of the Rayo, that there were some twenty-six others of his crew who had been shipped on the same conditions as those who had been delivered, and who wished to leave the vessel; also recommends that I should go on board and examine those men, or have them come to the consulate for that purpose. In answer to this communication, I have informed his excellency that it is the desire of those who have the direction of the affairs of the Rayo to be relieved of so many of her crew, in the same manner as were released those whose discharge was demanded by this consulate. I can have nothing to do in the matter, as I consider it would be both unjust and inhuman to have any participation in the expulsion of those men from the vessel in a destitute condition in a foreign country, as I am not authorized, and have not the means of caring for distressed citizens for account of the government of the United States, although it is my duty to represent them in demanding their rights. I also say that I trust that the acknowledgment of the illegality of their detention may be accompanied by a just reparation and a remuneration for their services; also that the Osceola will probably return here in a few days, and it may be that Commander Foster will give those men a passage to Aspinwall, but that it ought not to be expected that the government of the United States should be at the expense of taking home the crew of the Rayo. I am sorry that I have not had time to prepare copies of the correspondence on this subject to send you, but it was only last evening that I heard that you had arrived at Baranquilla.

I have communicated everything to the Department of State, and shall continue to keep it informed of whatever may transpire in the case.

I expect the Osceola to return here about the 16th or 17th instant. Notwithstanding the national congress passed a law that the navy of the country should be disposed of, we now hear that the President, General Mosquera, has annulled the law by a decree establishing the navy and incorporating the Rayo in the same.

That vessel has, since the 21st ultimo, been lying in this harbor in the custody of a Spanish frigate; the principal parts of her machinery have been taken on board of the latter, and she is daily visited and examined by the Spanish officers.

In company with Commander Foster I visited the Spanish commander, who received us very courteously, and informed us that he was waiting orders from the admiral at Havana as to the disposal of the Rayo, and assured us that he should not resort to any extreme measures without giving due notice and facilities to any American citizens of the crew who desired to leave the vessel.

He inquired if we considered the officers of the vessel as American citizens. I replied, that my opinion was that, having voluntarily and knowingly enlisted in a foreign service, they were not entitled to protection from the United States government.

I presume you will have been informed of the political state of this part of the country. The Colombian steamer Colombia arrived here on the 12th, bringing five hundred and fifty national troops from Santa Martha.

A steamer is momentarily expected here from Aspinwall with the New York mail of the 1st instant.

I have the honor to subscribe, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

United States Consul.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Carthagena, May 21, 1867.

SIR: Referring you to my dispatch No. 12, of the 14th instant, I have now to inform you that the Osceola has not returned to this port, and cannot now be expected before the 26th instant.

There are four of the seamen of the Rayo on shore, who have been sent from the vessel without being paid their wages or having any means of sustaining themselves. I have sent an official note to the secretary of state of Bolivar, requesting to be informed, that I may indicate to these men to which of the authorities they are to apply to obtain justice and compensation for their services on board of a Colombian war vessel. As one of the men is an Irishman, and as at present I am nominally the acting British consul here, I have presented the case both as United States and British consul, but as yet have not received any answer.

As I informed you in my last communication, I have advised the Department of State of my action in this case, and I hope to be instructed as to my further duties in the same; but as some time may elapse before I can receive such instructions, I will thank you to advise me in regard to the case.

To what extent am I to protect those seamen, some of whom have never agreed to serve this country, whereas others have signed articles on board of the vessel since the change of flag? Have the officers of the Rayo any right to claim the protection of the government of the United States in any case?

The Colombian steamer Colombia is to leave here to-morrow to enforce the blockade of the port of Santa Martha, decreed by General Lopez.

I herewith send some communications and newspapers received from Washington for yourself.

I have the honor to be, sir, your most obedient servant,

AUGT. S. HANABERG.

General PETER J. SULLIVAN,
United States Minister, &c., Baranquilla.

Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Hanaberg.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Baranquilla, U. S. of Colombia, May 25, 1867.

SIR: Your communications Nos. 12 and 13, of the 14th and 21st instant, calling my attention to the case of the steamer Rayo and her crew, came to hand on yesterday, and from a perusal of them I am satisfied that you have acted wisely and efficiently in this complicated affair.

If the crew of this steamer had agreed to serve the government of Colombia for the term of two years, and that at the time and place the ship's papers were executed they were well aware of the true character of this steamer and of the nature of the service they were required to perform, and that when at a Colombian port they had freely consented to continue this service for the period stated, they have, in my opinion, forfeited all rightful claims to the protection of our government.

But should this steamer's crew list or contract not have been made known and fully explained to the crew at the time they were employed, and that, as you intimate, they were duped into the Colombian service under false and fraudulent pretenses; that, while cast upon a foreign shore in a state of utter destitution and threats of persecution, they were forced to take service under the Colombian government, you will, should this state of facts exist, demand of the commander of this steamer and of the proper authorities at Carthagena, where this steamer is now stationed, the immediate discharge and payment of these men, who now claim and are justly entitled to the protection of our government, according to the laws of the United States of America. In this matter be prudent, but resolute.

As the people of this country are engaged in a fratricidal war, which cuts off all communication with the general government at Bogota, and as you have submitted the whole subject to the State Department at Washington, I think it advisable that, if without detriment to the honor of our government and the calls of humanity, you await their orders, lest that hasty action, based upon insufficient facts, should add to the obstacles already in the way of the settlement of this perplexing affair.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

AUGT. S. HANABERG, Esq.,
United States Consul at Carthagena.

Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Hanaberg.

[Unofficial.]

BARANQUILLA, UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA,
May 29, 1867.

DEAR SIR: I thank you from my heart for the warm friendship which you have expressed for me in the three letters which I have received from you at this place, and it would afford me great pleasure to spend some time with you and my friend Captain Foster of the war steamer Oscicola, had not duty called me to Bogota at the very earliest moment I can leave here for there, which I hope will be in the course of the next two weeks.

The Rayo is, and I fear will continue to be, a source of much trouble, but we must deal with these troubles in a cool, deliberate, and firm manner; but, in every instance, we must act upon good and sufficient evidence only.

I regret the murder of one of the crew of the Oseola by his comrade. If possible, and circumstances should permit or justify, the murderer ought to be sent home for trial.

The blockade of this coast is a farce; our commerce, our mail facilities, the lives and property of American citizens residing in this country, require, at least, two of our war steamers to cruise along this coast during the existence of this rebellion.

All communications between here, Santa Martha, and Bogota, are suspended by the operations of war.

The people of this city have had to make up for General Lopez about $20,000. He has departed from here with two fast steamers, and about five hundred regular troops, for Banco and Bogota. But it is generally believed here that he will not be able to cut his way (which he will have to do) through the opposing forces of General Riasco. It is feared that Baranquilla may soon be taken and held by some of Riasco's forces from Santa Martha.

I am, very sincerely, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

Pedro J. Berrio, constitutional governor of the sovereign State of Antioquia, to the nation.

COUNTRYMEN! The revolution which the President of the republic has been fomenting ever since his accession to power has at length broken out. This conspiracy is against the nation that honored him with its confidence and elevated him to his present position.

Vain have been the efforts of all honest parties in the republic, and of the governors of the States of the Union, to preserve peace.

A man whom the nation graced with the highest honors now puts himself above all law, and wields the sword and staff placed in his hands by the republic, against the country, because it defended its institutions and liberties, and, with the army to support him, commits the horrid crime which the laws and conscience term high treason!

He desires to subject the country to new trials; he excites the people to war. The result is not doubtful; we will triumph!

People of Antioquia! You have aided the State government in trying to preserve peace. The nation was smitten on one cheek and it turned the other to the assailant. Not satisfied with this, he now wishes to plunge the dagger into the nation's vitals, and, in open violation of the constitution, he has sent national forces to overthrow the lawful president of Magdalena and place one of his own minions in power there.

But this is not all. He has thrown the president of the sovereign State of Candinamarea into a filthy prison; and on the 29th of April he dissolved congress and declared himself dictator. Many of the members, among them Plata Azuera, Arosemena, and others, were also imprisoned.

We know not upon what principle he has raised himself to such a position. Our banner is the constitution, and we will hoist it so high that all the world can see it. Our duty is to pull down the man who has arisen against the institutions he helped to found, and put one in his place who will obey the laws and the constitution. There are but two parties now—the republicans, in favor of the nation, and the pretorians, who would give us a master. Neutrality is now a crime. Those who are not for us are against us. Every one who has a pulsation of liberty in his breast will be for us; all who would ruin their country will side with the dictator. In the name of threatened liberty, in the name of the insulted country, I invite all republicans to rally around our banner.

To arms! Presidents of other States, if you have any regard for the constitution you will prepare to overthrow the tyrant. I promise you that Antioquia will be with you, and will not be the last to strike. Let us work together around the national banner, which is the constitution, and the struggle will be brief.

People of Colombia! You are too proud to bend the neck to the yoke of tyrants or shun the sword of dictators. Let us act in concert, and victory is certain.

I am sure there is not a partisan of tyranny in Antioquia, or if there should be, let him hide his head in shame; his breath would poison the atmosphere of our patriotic land. A country that has produced heroes like Cordoba and Restrepo could not bear the presence of a man who would willingly submit to the will of a despot.

Our conduct shall be regulated by the magnitude of our duty; we will observe the laws of war and of nations, and we will do nothing not worthy of a civilized people.

Public schools will not be closed; the peace of the country will not be disturbed, for our cause is just. Our religion, liberty, homes, and property are attacked; let us sell our lives dearly before these rights are taken from us by usurpers.

Yes, we are the republic, and the republic will triumph; we will sustain the constitution.

PEDRO J. BERRIO.

ABRAM MORENO, Secretary of Finance.

[Translation.]

Address of Victoriano Paredes, governor of the State of Santander, to its inhabitants.

People of Santander! The President of Colombia has at last consummated the revolution with which he has so long threatened us, and this day we have ceased to be his fellow-citizens to become his slaves. It is not yet known what title he intends to assume; it may be king, emperor, or autocrat; but be what it will, it means that our lives are in his power, that our property belongs to him, that our liberty is taken from us, that we have no rights, nothing but what he wills to give us. A signal from his scepter may consign hundreds of Colombians to the gibbet; one word from his lips can ruin millions of families; a single decree of his may drive thousands of us from our beloved country.

Such, countrymen, is our situation. We have no law but the caprice of one man, and no perspective than our ruin. This State has always struggled for its rights, and it will be nothing new to us to give a lesson to a tyrant or perish in the attempt; we will perish nobly in our struggle for liberty.

Our position is desperate, but wo to him who wavers on the verge of the precipice when duty urges him to act, or to him who dastardly accepts the bribes offered to him by the tyrant!

Sons of Santander, listen, and I will tell you what has been done. On the 29th of April last the house of representatives adopted two resolutions making inquiries about two war vessels on the way to our ports. One of them, called the Rayo, had arrived. These simple resolutions served as an excuse for the President of the republic to consummate the long-threatened revolution and assume supreme power. He dissolved congress, declared the country in a state of war, imprisoned the representatives of the people who would not enter into his treason, arrested the president of Cundinamarca, prosecuted and seized several editors and publishers of newspapers, and with one stroke of his pen abolished every guarantee of the constitution.

In presence of such outrages the heart of every loyal republican who has any principles or believes in any law swells with indignation, and boldly denounces the ignominious usurpation of public power.

Fellow-countrymen of Santander! You are the acknowledged bulwark of the democratic republic in this land, and it is your sacred duty to sustain the reputation you merit by energetic action in the present cause.

VICTORIANO DE D. PAREDES.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Baranquilla, June 2, 1867.

SIR: Inclosed, No. 1, is a report of the engagement had on the 28th ultimo between a portion of President Mosquera's forces, under command of General Lopez, his secretary of war, and the opposition forces at Banco, an important point on the Magdalena River.

About two hundred troops arrived here yesterday morning from Santa Martha to re-enforce the opposition at Banco, but the result of the news from there induced this re-enforcing party to lay in wait for, and if possible to destroy or capture, Lopez on his return to this place from Banco.

The keeper of the hotel where I was lodging arrived here this morning, in a small canoe from Antioquia. He reports that all the people of that State are opposed to President Mosquera, and that by this time have sent about fifteen thousand men—joined by the forces of Santander—to capture or drive Mosquera from Bogota; and that they had placed well-fastened chains across the Magdalena River, so as to prevent any boats from passing up or down this river, thus cutting off the forces of General Lopez, and all other aid from reaching General Mosquera at Bogota.

It is evident that General Lopez, not being able to force his way through these insurmountable barriers, and not having sufficient force to hold Banco and take the custom-house at Santa Martha from the exasperated and resolute opposition, his victory is a source of weakness instead of strength to General Mosquera, who is surrounded on all sides by overwhelming forces, who are determined to crush him or perish in the attempt.

The following extract from my unofficial letter of the 31st ultimo, to the American consul at Carthagena, will show you the caution which I observe in this emergency:

[Extract.]

The time has come for every United States officer here to be on the alert, and as true sentinels at the advanced posts we must carefully watch and diligently study the progress and tendency of the terrible drama that is being played around us without being observed by either of the prompters or scene-shifters directing its operations, so as to be enabled to judge in time of its influence on the lives and property of this people and on the trade and commerce of ours.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA—COMMANDING GENERAL OF MARINE AND OF THE SECOND DIVISION OF THE COLOMBIAN GUARD—NO. 98.

To the Governor of the Province of Baranquilla:

At 4½ p. m., this day, after a fight of thirty minutes, the troops under my command occupied this city, (Banco.)

A detailed report of the action will be sent to you in due time; I now give generalities.

We have captured Manuel A. Vengorchea, acting President of Magdalena, four chiefs, fourteen officers, thirty-nine men, and all the munitions of the enemy.

We had ten men killed and three wounded; most of them belonged to the regenerator battalion.

Yours, &c.,

R. LOPEZ.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Baranquilla, June 7, 1867.

SIR: Inclosed are copies of the latest correspondence had between the American consul at Carthagena and myself, as to whether he should recognize the acts of the commander of the Colombian war steamer Rayo should that officer now hoist the American flag.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Hanaberg to Mr. Sullivan.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Carthagena, June 2, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your official communication No. 5, of date 25th ultimo, and by the same I observe that you approve my action in the case of the crew of the steamer Rayo.

Captain Foster of the Osceola having given his crew liberty here, one of the crew murdered another while on shore, as I have already informed you. On the 2d instant I accompanied Captain Foster to call upon the President of the State, when he expressed to his excellency his regret for what had occurred among his crew in the city, and requested, if consistent with the laws of the country, that the criminal be delivered to him to be tried and punished in accordance with the laws of the United States navy, to which he belonged. His excellency replied that as the offense had been committed on the soil of Colombia and against the laws of this country, the man could not be given up, but should be tried and punished in accordance with these laws. I told his excellency that there were antecedent circumstances in relation to the case, the testimony for which could only be obtained among the crew, and that consequently it would be advantageous for the ends of justice that the criminal be tried where this testimony could be obtained. His excellency replied that it was impossible to surrender the offender, but if we wished to present this testimony it would be received.

Captain Foster then referred to the case of the crew of the Rayo, and spoke of the injustice of sending those men (many of whom were American citizens) on there in a destitute condition, and dependent on the charity of myself and others for their subsistence after they had been in the service of this country several months. At this stage of the interview General Chacer, rear-admiral of the Spanish navy, who had arrived at this port on the day previous in the steamer Francisco de Abis, came into the palace, and as we had been informed by his excellency the President that an interview had been appointed with this officer for that hour, we considered it proper for us to retire. On leaving, however, I handed his excellency a note, of which I send a copy, in relation to the same matter. His excellency assured me he would attend to it as soon as he could confer with the commander of the Rayo.

The same evening Commander Read called on me, at the request of his excellency, and showed me, attached to his crew list the signatures of the seamen in whose behalf I had applied for wages; which signatures appeared to have been affixed since the vessel was under the Colombian flag.

I told him that in such a case there should be no further interference on my part. He said that the President would give us an answer as regarded the other men by nine o'clock the next day.

Not having an answer at twelve o'clock the following day, I again called upon his excellency and stated that the Oseola could remain no longer; that sufficient time had been given, if it had been the desire to discharge and pay off those men and send them on board of the Oseola, or to have answered my note; but that as neither had been done, Commander Foster must leave at once, and could only report the matter to the commanding officer on the station.

His excellency then apologized for not having acted more promptly in the case, saying he had been occupied by his conference with the Spanish commander, and that the same had been productive of such favorable results as he thought would also assist to arrive at a satisfactory settlement of the present question. He then informed me that it had been agreed that the Rayo should be released upon the guarantee of his excellency, as agent of the national government, that she should not be disposed of to any enemies of Spain. He remarked that he presumed that when this circumstance was known to the crew of the vessel in question they would be contented to remain in her; but if not, his excellency assured me that their wages should be paid for the time they had served under the Colombian flag, and their passage paid by the royal mail steamer to Aspinwall. I told him that this would be satisfactory.

I then reported his excellency's agreement to Captain Foster, who then left for Aspinwall. On the following day, having to call upon his excellency in relation to other matters, he informed me that the arrangement with the Spanish admiral had not been fulfilled by the latter, who excused himself, saying that he had received orders from the Captain General of the island of Cuba not to release the Rayo except with the guarantee of the national President. It is the general opinion here, however, that reports from on shore, and from the authorities at Santa Martha, influenced the Spanish officer to act as he did. As the mail steamer was to sail yesterday, I applied to his excellency, who gave me a list and the account of seventeen seamen, which had been presented to him by the commander of the Rayo, as being the only persons among his crew who were dissatisfied and had a right to claim American protection. These accounts were made not only for the time the vessel had been under the Colombian flag. I thought it best to accept them, however, mentioning to his excellency that I reserved for these men the right to claim the wages due them up to the time of their arrival at Santa Martha, either from this government or the parties who shipped them at New York. I also intimated to him that I had not had an opportunity to inform myself if those seventeen men constituted the whole of those of the crew who were so situated, and for whom it was my duty to claim.

I then received from his excellency an order for the money due the men on their accounts, and pay their passage to Aspinwall. This I paid to those men who were delivered to me on board the royal mail steamer, by which I sent them yesterday. Commander E. J. Read, of the Rayo, called on me and stated that he had been employed by the Colombian minister at Washington, General Salgar, to procure and fit out certain vessels for the Colombian government, also to obtain officers and crews for the same; that under such instructions he had procured the "R. R. Cuyler," an American steamer, which was allowed to leave the port of New York to come to this coast, where she was to assume the Colombian flag, with the knowledge of the President of the United States and all such authorities as were competent to interfere in the matter, and with their consent. He has shown me his authorization from Mr. Salgar. He says that in accepting his commission, himself and the officers of his vessel expected to transfer their allegiance from the United States of America to the government of Colombia in good faith, with the change of flag of the steamer.

But he now has reason to suppose that the steamer may not be recognized as a Colombian vessel, and himself and companions as officers of the Colombian navy, either by this government or Spain; and that in such a case the change of nationality, both as regards the vessel and the officers and crew, has been illegal, and consequently they shall claim to be still American; and he desired to know from me if, in such a case, he should hoist the American flag on the vessel and claim protection for himself and the officers and crew, whether I would recognize and protect them. As this is a serious matter, I declined answering him until I could refer the matter to yourself.

I trust, therefore, that you will instruct me how to act in such a case. It is evident to me that the officers of this vessel are dissatisfied with their position, and I think it is probable they may take some step of this kind very soon.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

AUG. S. HANABERG.

General PETER J. SULLIVAN,
United States Minister, Barranquilla.

Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Hanaberg.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Barranquilla, United States of Colombia, June 7, 1867.

SIR: Your dispatch of June 2, No. 15, relative to the nationality of the war steamer Rayo, and the intimation of her commander, Captain E. G. Read, to hoist the American flag if protected by you, reached me but yesterday.

As to the nationality of this steamer I have no other evidence before me than the verbal statement of the American commercial agent at the port of Santa Martha, which is: "That the said Read, when at that port, very adroitly (without giving up the register under which, as he said, he had brought this steamer from the port of New York) changed her name from Cuyler to Rayo, and her nationality from that of the United States of America to that of the United States of Colombia."

Under what register, under what flag, was this steamer and her commander acting at the time she was taken possession of by the Spaniards? By what means had he procured the registry of this steamer from the collector of the port of New York? By what authority does he now claim the right to hoist the American flag, and thus change this war vessel from the Colombian to the American navy? I know of none.

Captain Read cannot, in the absence of justifiable evidence, which has not yet been produced to me, claim protection under the register and flag of the United States, which he had bartered at Santa Martha for the Colombian register and flag.

You must not take his mere assertions as to any knowledge or approval of the United States of the character and extent of his employment by the Colombian government.

In my dispatch to you of the 25th of May (No. 5) I had stated my views on the employment and detention of the crew of this vessel; but can the officers claim protection of the United States on the ground of their ignorance of the true character of this steamer at the time they had procured her for the Colombian service?

Should Captain Read, under these circumstances, now hoist the American flag, he would, in my opinion, have committed a high crime against the laws of the United States, for which you would, I think, be justified in arresting and sending him home for trial.

But, again, I advise you to be cautious in this matter; and I am clearly of the opinion that you should be guided by the suggestions which you will find in my dispatch above alluded to.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, June 13, 1867.

SIR: Dispatches have been received from the minister resident and from consuls of the United States in the republic of Colombia. From these dispatches it appears that the President of the United States of Colombia has dissolved the national congress and proclaimed the republic to be in a condition of civil war. Civil war is here understood to be actually existing in that country. Official information has been received that the authorities of the State of Panama, one of the constituent States of the republic of Colombia, are actually levying and demanding extraordinary taxes from the citizens of that State, including all domiciled United States citizens, with the acknowledged purpose of using the revenues thus obtained in carrying on war against the hitherto recognized authorities of the federal government of that republic. The department is further advised that not only are such taxes demanded, but the payment thereof, although they are levied for a future period, is required in advance. United States citizens who are menaced with this extraordinary taxation have applied to this government for protection against the same.

Citizens of the United States domiciled in the State of Panama and within the republic of Colombia have no lawful exemption from ordinary and equal taxes which are levied in a constitutional manner and for constitutional purposes by the authorities of the federal or State government, of that country. It is by no means clear, however, that such domiciled United States citizens can legally or justly be subjected to the payment of extraordinary taxes or contributions to the government of a state for the purpose of resisting, and, as it would now seem, absolutely overthrowing the federal union of Colombia, to which government the United States are bound to guarantee a constitutional control, regulated by treaty with the United States, of the international railroad transit across the Isthmus of Panama. At the same time the civil war which has been proclaimed in Colombia is manifestly imperfectly developed, at least is very imperfectly understood here.

The government of the United States desires to maintain peaceful relations with the United States of Colombia. Moreover, the United States do not desire to embarrass the independent action of that republic by recognizing prematurely or unnecessarily any belligerent parties or powers there. On the other hand, the United States are not now prepared to admit that the complaints of the United States citizens in Panama before mentioned are without just foundation in the treaty which exists between the two countries, the constitution of Colombia, and the law of nations. The voluntary payment of taxes to the State of Panama for the purpose of carrying on war against the republic of Colombia might embarrass the United States in the fulfillment of their treaty obligations to the republic of Colombia, while it would seem likely to compromise the just claims of those citizens upon that republic for protection and redress.

For the present, therefore, and until further direction shall be given by this department, United States citizens resident in the State of Panama may decline to pay such taxes and contributions as are above described, except under protest. If payment shall be forced by the authorities of Panama, they will file their protests with the United States consuls, by whom such protests will be immediately transmitted to the minister resident of the United States, if he is conveniently accessible; and if not accessible, then directly to this department.

When the character of the conflict shall be more fully known the determination of this government upon the questions submitted to it will be promptly made, and such proceedings will in any case be adopted as shall conform to treaty obligations, while they shall fully protect the citizens of the United States in their just and lawful rights.

Only such blockades as shall be duly proclaimed and maintained by adequate force, in conformity to the law of nations, will be observed and respected by the United States. The naval authorities of the United States in the waters of Colombia will be expected to exercise vigilance during the continuance of the civil war, conferring with the minister resident in preventing any obstruction of the inter-oceanic transit, or any unlawful violence to citizens of the United States.

The minister and the consuls will make the contents of this dispatch known to the federal and state authorities of Colombia. A copy of the same has been delivered to the minister plenipotentiary from that republic residing at Washington.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Baranquilla, June 29, 1867.

SIR: * * * * *

President Mosquera has fallen, and is now a close prisoner at Bogota, in the hands of the conservatives, who now rule all this country (except the State of Bolivar, on the sea coast,) according to its constitution and laws. General Lopez, Mosquera's secretary of war, aided by the president of the State of Bolivar, still holds all the sea-coast of Colombia, except the port of Santa Martha, which he has blockaded with but an occasional visit of the steamer Colombia, the only war vessel under his command, and it is not yet known whether he will yield to the powers that be, or war against them. He is working very hard to procure the release of the steamer Rayo, and, should he succeed, of which there is but little chance, he will prolong this war for selfish ends. On the 22d instant his soldiers here had a sectional fight among themselves, and many of them are reported to have been killed or wounded, and many more of them to have deserted.

On the 15th instant an extra session of the legislature of the State of Bolivar met at Carthagena to decide whether this State should acknowledge the unanimous action of the other eight States of Colombia, or make war against them: and, as this legislature is supposed to be equally divided on the subject, it is impossible to judge in advance of its action. I am very anxious to hear from you on the subject of these unforeseen difficulties that environ me; but of one thing you may rest assured, that I shall not give either of the contending parties here any just cause of complaint against the United States or myself.

I have the honor to be, sir, with profound regard, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Baranquilla, June 30, 1867.

SIR: Since my dispatch to you of yesterday, (No. 9,) Baranquilla has been unexpectedly captured by General Riasco, commanding the conservatives of the State of Magdalena. He was received with unfeigned joy by almost every person here. He starts up the Magdalena River this evening, and will open the way to Bogota, heretofore obstructed by the Mosquera-Lopez party.

* * * * *

I shall go up the river this evening, per Hondá, and thence to Bogota as soon as possible.

* * * * *

The American officers of the celebrated war steamer Rayo have left her, and after having endeavored, but in vain, to carry off the blockading war steamer Colombia, which grounded, they betook themselves to the schooner lately captured by the Colombia, and are said to have made their way to Santa Martha to join the conservatives.

* * * * *

The war in this country is still unabated, and nothing new has transpired here since my dispatch to you of June 30th, (No. 10,) except the defeat of General Riasco's forces by General Mendoza, on the Magdalena River, about sixty miles above Baranquilla. But this will not preserve the little band of irresponsible triflers who pretend to sustain the fallen cause of General Mosquera from the inevitable overthrow and punishment that await them.

I beg leave to entreat your excellency to receive with favor the wisdom and good intentions towards your country which the said instructions impart.

SIR: Your dispatch No. 5, from Baranquilla, of the 29th of May last, relative to citizens of the United States claiming to have been carried, against their consent, to Carthagena in the R. R. Cuyler or Rayo, has been received. It seems that, through the prompt and energetic proceedings of A. S. Hanaberg, esquire, United States consul at Carthagena, supported by the firmness and prudence of Commander Foster, of the Osceola, thirteen of the men were released, but without the payment of the wages due to them. The proceedings in regard to the shipment of these men at New York seems to have been irregular, and if the Colombian authorities were cognizant of them, they would afford ground for complaint against that government. You will accordingly ask for explanations from that government.

SIR: A dispatch of the 14th of June has been received from Mr. Rice, in which he refers to the question of extraordinary taxation by the State of Panama, for purposes connected with the civil war in Colombia.

The character of that war and the situation of the belligerents still remain very obscure, so far as information has reached this government.

I have, therefore, to refer you to my circular dispatch of the 13th of June, and to inform you that at present the views therein expressed have undergone no change.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, July 6, 1867.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 29th of May, No 6, which was written at Baranquilla.

The way of civil war is precarious and uncertain. It is practically impossible for us, at so great a distance, to apprehend the exact condition of the political conflict which has recently broken out in the United States of Colombia. We earnestly desire that order, repose, and peace may prevail in that country; but its condition, nevertheless, depends little upon our wishes, and, on the contrary, chiefly, depends upon the practical wisdom of the people of Colombia.

We do not desire to recognize political changes unnecessarily or prematurely, while at the same time we are well aware that changes are likely to occur which may force themselves upon the attention of foreign and friendly states.

Under existing circumstances, I think it proper to give you a word of caution not to commit yourself by formally recognizing any constitutional change of government until you shall have referred the subject to this department for the consideration of the President of the United States.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 7th ultimo, inclosing copies of the correspondence between yourself and our consul at Carthagena in relation to the steamer Rayo, formerly the R. R. Cuyler.

This government having been informed by General Salgar, minister, &c., of the United States of Colombia, that his government had entered into a contract for the purchase of the R. R. Cuyler, to be delivered at one of the ports of Colombia, and the bond authorized to be required by the neutrality act, that the vessel should not be employed to cruise or commit hostilities against the subjects, citizens, or property of any state with whom the United States are at peace, having been duly executed, she was permitted to sail upon her voyage, in the expectation that she would become a public armed vessel of the United States of Colombia. It is understood that the delivery was completed in one of the harbors of that republic, and that she has since borne the Colombian flag. She will therefore not be recognized as an American vessel until she shall obtain a new register in the United States as the property of some of our citizens.

Those of her officers and crew who were citizens of the United States have not forfeited that character by the mere circumstance of taking service under the United States of Colombia, though so long as they remain in that service they must content themselves with such protection as it affords.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, August 10, 1867.

Sir: On the 15th of April last I left my residence in Ohio for my post, and after a journey of ninety-eight days, the time actually and necessarily occupied in proceeding from my said place of residence to my destination, I arrived in this city, with the full approbation of both parties in this country, on the 22d of July last, and entered upon the discharge of my official duties the next day.

* * * * *

On my arrival here I found the old congress in session, and a regularly organized government established, with General Santos Acosta, the second designado and commander-in-chief of the army, at its head.

Inclosure A is a copy of my letter to the secretary of the interior and foreign relations, announcing my arrival and mission: B is a translation of his reply. C, D—the “Diario Oficial,” (a translation of which I also inclose you,)—contains an account of the splendid civil and military welcome which I received, my address, and the President’s reply, on the occasion of my being officially presented to him by the secretary of foreign relations on the 25th of July. It is generally admitted by all who were present that this reception was one of the grandest ever accorded to the representative of any foreign government in this country.

The present government has been promptly and fully recognized by all the representatives of foreign governments here; by all the States in the union but Bolivar. It is destined to become popular, and, I hope, permanent. It is composed of the best men in the liberal party, and is warmly supported by the powerful conservatives.

Congress has declared war against the State of Bolivar, and has authorized the President to call out as many troops as he may deem proper to suppress the existing rebellion in that State; and for that purpose the government will in a few days send 3,000 troops to the coast.

General Mosquera has, as I predicted in my dispatch No 4, of May 24th, fallen a sad victim to his insatiable thirst for dictatorial power. He is still in jail. On the 1st instant he addressed a letter (E) to both houses of congress, resigning the presidency of the republic. This will not now be accepted, and he will be tried for treason, either by this or the next congress.

* * * * *

Just as I was about to close this dispatch I learned, as a fact, that the officer and guards over the penitentiary in this city, bribed by Mosquera’s partizans, had run off with all the convicts, with the view to rise against the government and release Mosquera by force; and that one or two other outbreaks between here and Hondá had taken place; but all have been promptly and efficiently checked and baffled by the fidelity of the government troops. Some of these would-be liberators have been caught, and are now in safe keeping.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogota, July 24, 1867.

The undersigned, secretary of the interior and foreign relations of the United States of Colombia, has had the honor to receive the very attentive communication dated yesterday, which Mr. Peter J. Sullivan was pleased to address him with a view to inform him that he has been appointed minister resident of the United States of America, near the Colombian government, and hand him an official copy of his credentials, soliciting, also, an audience of the citizen President of the republic.

The undersigned, after having acquainted the first magistrate of the nation with the communication to which he has the honor to reply, has the pleasure to inform Mr. Sullivan that to-morrow, July 25th, he will be received in public audience by the President of Colombia, at 3 o'clock in the afternoon, at the government house; for which purpose the chief clerk of this department of state will duly present himself at Mr. Sullivan's place of residence, in order that on the way to the government house he may accompany him to the office of the undersigned, in which he will have the satisfaction of renewing to Mr. Sullivan the assurances of the very distinguished consideration which he now has the pleasure to present him.

Remarks of General Peter J. Sullivan, the American minister, on presenting his credentials to the President of the United States of Colombia.

MR. PRESIDENT: In presenting to your excellency my credentials as minister resident of the United States of America to the United States of Colombia, I beg leave to assure you that the President and people of the United States of America are impressed with the deepest, the most heartfelt desire to cultivate and ever cherish the most friendly relations with the government and people of the United States of Colombia, and to see your people united, prosperous, and happy.

In the country which I have the honor to represent the energies of man have their full scope; reason, unshackled, maintains a controlling sway; and virtue and bravery, presiding over the breast of each freeman, leads him, when his country is in circumstances of difficulty and danger, to the performance of those deeds which renders him not only honored while living but revered when dead.

And you, Colombians, like your North American friends, have given to the world the bright example of what true patriotism and love of country can suffer and sacrifice for national liberty and constitutional government. Your devotion to the cause of human freedom, based on the rights of man, is well known and appreciated in the country which I have the honor to represent.

I beg leave to assure your excellency that I shall make it my study and aim to carry out the views of my government, and to merit ~~your~~ ^{your} approbation and esteem.

And now, sir, with these sentiments, I offer you ~~my~~ ^{my} hand, and with it the best wishes of a heart that glows with sincere friendship toward you personally, and the government of which you are the head.

Answer of the President of the United States of Colombia to the discourse of Mr. Peter J. Sullivan, minister resident of the United States of America.

MR. MINISTER: Upon receiving the credentials which constitute you minister resident of the United States of America, in the Colombian Union, I have had the satisfaction to hear you say, in the name of your enlightened government, and in that of the great nation to which you belong, as well as of yourself, who is one of its distinguished citizens, that you have the greatest desire to cultivate and maintain the most cordial and friendly relations between the two governments and nations, and to see this nation in the enjoyment of peace and prosperity.

Allow me, general, to observe to you, with the view to your communicating the same to your government, that the sentiments of the Colombian nation, of which the present government believes itself to be the faithful interpreter, correspond in the sincerest and most ample manner to your benevolent expressions.

The American government, which has given to the world a great example of the power of democratical institutions when firmly rooted in societies such as yours, laborious, honest, and worthy, has demonstrated that the republican form of government is an indestructible fact, and thereby afforded hopefulness and strength to the Spanish American nations of the land of Columbus, and that the said form of government is the one which is suited to our land.

To obtain such a form of government our respective endeavors in favor of liberty and law have been great; and therefore it is that we admire your nation, and endeavor, by all the means in our power, to preserve the said benevolent relations.

The arrival in the country of such a representative as you are of the American government is most grateful to my government, and the latter on its part will make every effort to correspond to your desires.

I have heard, general, the opinion you express of the political character of my fellow-citizens, and I accept the flattering words which you have been so good as to direct to me. I feel myself honored in corresponding, as I do with the utmost cordiality, to your friendly sentiments.

Remarks of the Official Gazette.

Subsequently the President presented to the minister the public functionaries who were present, and stated that the secretary of war, by reason of sickness, had been deprived of the honor of being present at his reception.

A cordial and friendly conversation was entered into after the presentation, and the minister left the government house, accompanied by the sub-secretary of the interior and foreign affairs, after receiving the honors due to his high diplomatic and military rank.

Resignation of General Mosquera.

CITIZEN SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES: T. C. de Mosquera, grand general of the Union, and constitutional President of the same, presents to you the formal and definite resignation of the chief magistracy to which he was called, while absent from the country, by the spontaneous wishes of the people.

The political occurrences that have taken place in the republic since it was inaugurated last year, up to the 23d of May last, are well known to you, citizens, senators, and representatives; deprived on that day, by force, of the exercise of my functions as President of the Union, I consider that by that act, new in the history of the country, my public life, which for more than half a century has been consecrated to the loyal, constant, and disinterested services of my country, has terminated.

Since the accomplishment of the acts of the 23d of May, I would wish that my name may not serve as a source of civil discord, nor a motive for war. The violent manner in which I was deprived of my liberty, and the exercise of my constitutional functions in consequence, I immediately hastened to resign before the supreme federal court the office of President of the republic. The incommunication in which I was kept obliged me to send my resignation through the present acting head of the nation, General Santos Acosta, for motives which it is not necessary to mention here has pleased to give due course to it.

Now that you are in session, I formally reiterate it, as a gift which I offer to the tranquillity of the republic, and as another element which I put forward toward the great work of conciliation to the Colombians.

As for the rest, I am ready to appear before the senate of the republic to answer for my official conduct, and to defend there, and afterwards before the whole country, the acts of my administration, all of them tending to secure the liberty, sovereignty, and independence of Colombia, and to foment the progress, the improvement, and civilization of the republic.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, August 12, 1867.

SIR: On the 1st instant I held a long conference with Señor Doctor Carlos Martini, secretary for foreign relations of the United States of Colombia, relative to the troubles which beset his country, especially the overthrow and imprisonment of President Mosquera. His excellency then detailed to me the history of his country's wrongs, a minute of which is herewith transmitted, marked A; and at the same time the honorable secretary furnished me with the following documents, with the request that I would lay them before my government, for its impartial judgment on the subjects of which they treat, viz:

G, is copy of his letter accompanying them;

H, is my reply;

B, the secret treaty of General Mosquera and the Peruvian government, aiming at a southern confederacy, prejudicial to the growth and influence of the United States;

C, the resolutions adopted by the Colombian congress, April 29, 1867, relative to the war steamer Rayo;

E, a note of the said Señor Martini to the Peruvian minister, July 5, 1867, denying the validity of this secret treaty, and repudiating it;

F, a memorandum of the laws defining the duties and powers of the President and congress of Colombia.

J, a copy of my instructions to the commander of any United States war ship at Colon, or Carthagena, to keep surveillance over the steamer Rayo until the opinion of our government is known on the subject.

Each and all of these documents explain themselves.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogota, August 7, 1867.

The undersigned, secretary of the interior and foreign relations of Colombia, has the honor to address the honorable General Peter J. Sullivan, minister resident of the United States of America, and to remit him the inclosed documents which he offered him in the conference which he held with his excellency on the first of the present month, and which are as follows:

First. The letter A, being each a protocol of the above mentioned conference. His excellency will please return to this department, duly signed, one of these two documents, should he find the protocols correct.

Second. The two documents marked with the letter B, in which will be found the secret convention of the 28th of August, 1866, in Spanish as well as in English, and which are, like the following documents, for his excellency to retain in his possession.

Third. A document marked with the letter C, containing the resolutions adopted by the house of representatives on the 29th April last, relative to the war steamer Rayo, and a translation in the English of those resolutions.

Fourth. A document marked with the letter D, being an authenticated copy of the protocol translated into the English language.

Fifth. The document marked with the letter E, containing a translation in the English language of the note addressed under date of 5th of July last to the Peruvian minister, denying the validity of the secret convention in the Diario Oficial No. 792, of which inclosed is a copy duly authenticated, will be found inserted the above note, in Spanish.

Sixth. A memorandum F, of the constitutional laws (disposiciones) that determine where the party making power resides, giving them due validity in the United States of Colombia.

The undersigned renews to the Hon. Mr. Sullivan the assurances of his very distinguished consideration.

CARLOS MARTIN.

A.

Minute of a conference between the secretary of the interior and foreign relations of the United States of Colombia and the honorable General Peter J. Sullivan, minister resident of the United States of America, on the 1st of August, 1867.

The honorable General Peter J. Sullivan, minister resident of the United States of America, having been previously invited to a conference with the secretary of the interior and foreign relations, repaired to the office of the said department at one o'clock in the afternoon.

To facilitate the intercourse between the honorable minister and above-mentioned secretary, Mr. Eustachio de la Torre Narváez, assistant secretary of the department of state, gave his services as interpreter. The secretary explained, in the name of the Colombian government, that the present appointment which had been made with the honorable minister, was with the view of informing him fully with an important affair in which the American government is concerned, although it be in an indirect manner.

That the government of Colombia, with a high appreciation of the relations which unite it with that of the American Union, and their preservation upon the footing of a perfect intelligence and cordiality, considers that the means of maintaining and assuring the same relations is to proceed with most perfect honor, loyalty and frankness as regards the American government, and that, in accordance with the said line of conduct, the Colombian government, through the secretary of foreign relations, lost no time in addressing the honorable minister with reference to the secret convention of August 28, 1866, entered into by the Colombian cabinet of General Mosquera by means of his plenipotentiaries, Messieurs Froilan Largacha and Rudecindo Lopez, with the government of the Peruvian republic, represented by her envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary in Bogota, Don Manuel Freyre, as well as regarding the effects which the said secret convention would have produced in the United States of America.

The honorable General Sullivan stated in reply, and in the name of the American government, the pleasure caused them by so honorable and loyal a proceeding on the part of the present Colombian government in respect of the said United States of America, a proceeding which he lost no time in acknowledging.

And the secretary, before entering upon the subject, and in the act of offering to the honorable American minister the authentic copy of the secret convention, which has been prepared for the purpose, requested the assistant secretary to translate into English the said convention in a perfect and literal manner, in order that the honorable minister might have an immediate and correct knowledge thereof; a circumstance which was necessary for the purpose of the conference.

The honorable General Sullivan, having inquired of the secretary concerning the constitutionality and validity of the said secret convention, the different enactments of the Colombian constitution contrary to the entering into such acts on the part of the President of Colombia, without the intervention and legal approbation having been given them by the legislative body, were laid before him. A memorandum of these enactments accompanies the present minute. And the secretary added that the Colombian government had refused to recognize the secret treaty on the 5th of July ultimo, by reason of its unconstitutionality, principally on account of its not having been approved by the Colombian congress, as was stated to the Peruvian minister in a note of the above mentioned date, which was published in the Diario Oficial No. 972, an authentic translation of which is herewith enclosed. The secretary then making a reference to the subject in its bearings upon the American government, said: "The above-mentioned secret convention, entered into without instructions from the senate by General F. C. de Mosquera, as President of the republic, in accordance with its first article, was to produce certain effects in the United States of America, and General Mosquera's administration, as far as it has been possible to understand the matter, proposed to carry it into effect in New York, by means of a special agent, in accordance with express instructions, and not through General Salgar, who was at that time Colombian minister at Washington."

Notwithstanding this, General Salgar, upon the application of the Peruvian minister in the said city, in consideration of an authentic copy of the convention, which was laid before him by the said minister, and without having as yet received any corresponding instructions, proceeded in conjunction of Señor Barrera, Peruvian minister to the United States of America, to purchase for Colombia, with Peruvian funds, the war steamer called at present Rayo, and formerly the R. R. Cuyler. The captain of the Rayo received from General Salgar an order to sail the ship of war to the Colombian port of Santa Martha, but when he was about to comply with the said order she was detained in the bay of New York, in consequence of an application made to the American government by Spanish agents. By reason of this detention General Salgar addressed the Department of State soliciting the release of the vessel, as belonging to the Colombian government. Mr. Seward, on the 13th of February last, said to General Salgar that, after having consulted the Attorney General, it had been resolved to allow the R. R. Cuyler to depart, which the said vessel did on the 25th of the same month of February last.

The vessel arrived at Santa Martha, where it was to be delivered, in order to receive the documents of nationality to be issued by the Colombian government, as was accordingly done by the administration of General Mosquera.

Such was the situation of the affair when the event occurred which was ushered in by the 29th of April last. The chamber of representatives having received information of the arrival of the steamer Rayo upon the coast of Colombia, and having the right to interfere in a matter of so much importance, applied to the executive power for an explanation thereof, not deeming true the assertion made by General Mosquera, a few days before, that the said vessel was his private property. The executive power having refused the desired explanations, the chamber approved certain resolutions, irritated General Mosquera, and then, on the said 29th of April, he dissolved the congress, imprisoned some of the senators and representatives, and the President of the State of Cundinamarca separated the city of Bogota from the territory of the said State, erecting a federal district, appointed judges, &c., disavowed, finally, the constitution of the republic, and exercised a dictatorial power.

The foregoing acts of General Mosquera were followed by his disavowal as such President on the part of the army stationed on the capital of the republic, and of all the towns of the country wherever they could act with liberty.

General Santos Acosta, the second substitute, elected with an almost entire unanimity by the congress for the exercise of the executive power, the president of the said congress, President of the State of Boyacá, and general-in-chief of the army, assumed, under the constitution, on the 23d of last May, the presidency of the republic, in the presence of the supreme federal court, re-established the empire of the constitution and laws in all the territory of the republic, with the sole exception of the State of Bolívar, in which then existed a division of the national troops under the orders of the ex-General Rudecindo López, an officer of the dictatorial government; convoked the congress which had been violently dissolved by the dictator, was recognized as President of the Union by the representatives of friendly governments residing in the capital, and by the said national congress.

The present government of Colombia, on becoming acquainted with the secret convention, and of the effects which it had produced, would have dispatched a diplomatic agent to the United States of America, in order to lay all these facts before the government of the said States, but for the knowledge which it had obtained of the speedy arrival in the capital of the worthy representative of the said government, to whom the secretary has had the honor of presenting this frank explanation.

The Colombian government, after the occurrences above referred to, has considered that the sailing of the steamer of war Rayo out of the bay of New York, might, under certain circumstances, appear to furnish motives of complaint on the part of the American government, from the moment in which the said vessel has ceased to figure as the property of the Colombian government, in consequence of the disavowal of the secret convention, in virtue of which she was acquired. In fact, the steamer Rayo has no right at present to make use of the Colombian flag and commission. The said anomalous situation of the vessel requires to be defined by the government of the Colombian Union, which has resolved to return the vessel to the Peruvian government, with whose funds she was bought. This proceeding is but just as regards the above mentioned friendly republic; but besides, the manner of making the return might be the cause of some event capable of originating a complaint, which, however just, would be entirely voluntary as regards the American government.

In order to satisfy the above expressed desires without the risk of any inconvenience and to reconcile all the necessities of the case, the Colombian government wishes to have the steamer Rayo returned to the agent from whom General Salgar obtained her, or to the government of Peru, in the same place whence she sailed; that is to say, in New York. But for this purpose the government of the Colombian Union has not at its command means sufficiently efficacious and secure of conveying the said steamer in security to New York.

In addition to the foregoing, the secretary stated the fear which the anomalous situation of the steamer Rayo caused the government. The said vessel, as has already been said, destitute of the Colombian patent and flag, was liable to the following dangers: 1. Of being captured by the Spanish squadron, the station of which is so near to the Atlantic coast of Colombia; 2. Of being taken by the squadron of the allied republic, for the purpose of augmenting the forces with which they carry on the war with Spain; 3. Of the mutiny of the crew of the vessel, with the view of joining the said allied squadron, or of transforming her into a pirate. In the former case, the Colombian government would regret the loss to Peru of a vessel upon which, or upon her value, she reckons as a consequence of acts which, although unwarranted, were executed or consented to by a Colombian administration, and having contributed in this manner a maritime triumph on the part of Spain, of no great importance, but of a disagreeable tenor, as regards the republics of the Pacific. In the second case the Colombian government would regret that that of the United States of America should have a motive, real or apparent, for considering that by means of a subterfuge the vessel had been taken out of the bay of New York, in order to increase the naval forces of the allied republics, compromising, although only in appearance, the due neutrality of the American government. In the third case, all parties would regret that the said vessel should become a pirate.

In order to avoid all these dangers, and in particular to satisfy the American government respecting the complaints which he may consider due to the proceedings of General Salgar—who, besides, had already been suspended since the 31st of last May, in accordance with the letter of recall which was sent to him, and who would be responsible to the supreme federal court of Colombia for his proceedings—the President of the republic put at the disposal of the minister the steamer Rayo, in order that, if he should consider it convenient, she should be conveyed to New York in the custody of a vessel of war belonging to his nation, for the purpose already mentioned; and the secretary added that the foregoing were the means which had occurred to his government, to conciliate all the duties which the latter might be supposed to owe in that respect, both to the United States of America and to the Peruvian republic.

The honorable minister said in reply that he could not take upon himself the responsibility of ordering a vessel of war of his nation to conduct the steamer Rayo to New York, and that he found himself under the necessity of waiting for instructions in respect thereto from his government, to whom he would communicate everything that had taken place during this conference; but that in order to avoid the dangers to which allusion had been made he would give a confidential order to one of the American vessels of war stationed at Colon to keep watch upon the Rayo. That as regards the remaining points he only appreciated the loyal conduct of the present Colombian government.

The secretary stated in conclusion that it was very pleasing to him to hear such expressions from the honorable minister, and insisted upon the desire of his government to place the steamer Rayo at the disposal of the honorable minister, with the view of her being conveyed to New York, in order to be returned in the said port to the Peruvian government after having again stated to the American government that the said steamer did not belong to the government of Colombia.

The honorable General Sullivan stated in conclusion that it would afford him pleasure to represent his country near the present government of the Colombian nation; that his government, in recommending to him great prudence in recognizing any government which might be established in this country, had not limited the said right to make use of it on his part ad referendum; and that he had not delayed recognizing the actual President of the Union; that in order to manifest to the American government the justice of the said proceeding, he would lay before it whatever had passed during this conference.

Thus the said conference was brought to a close, and in the present minute a statement has been drawn up with reference only to what passed regarding the most important subjects which were treated of in the interview.

The above is an exact and correct translation of the original to which I refer the assistant secretary of state for the department of the interior and foreign affairs.

The secret treaty of President Mosquera with the Peruvian government, &c.

T. C. DE MOSQUERA, GRAND GENERAL OF THE UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA.

Whereas the following secret agreement between this republic and the republic of Peru was celebrated by their respective plenipotentiaries on the twentieth day of August, of the present year of eighteen hundred and sixty-six:

In the name of God, Author and Legislator of the universe:

Whereas the republics of the United States of Colombia and Peru have entered into the most friendly relations since the celebration of the treaty of the sixth of July, eighteen hundred and twenty-two, under which they were perpetually united and confederated, though it was afterwards modified by the stipulations of the treaty of peace and friendship of the twenty-second day of September, of the year eighteen hundred and twenty-nine, under the third article of which they undertook to observe neutrality from passing through the territory of either of the two countries to offend the other, and the intimate relations of the two countries have been strengthened still more and more by the agreement of defensive alliance which their respective plenipotentiaries celebrated in the American congress at Lima on the twenty-third day of January, in the year eighteen hundred and sixty-five, already approved by their respective congresses;

And considering that the republic of Peru, as well as those of Bolivar, Chili, and Ecuador, are at war with Spain and cannot dispose of some ships of war and arms which she had bought in Europe and the United States of America, of which Colombia has need to increase her national navy and to complete her parks of artillery, now that this republic may be involved in a war to sustain the neutrality of the Isthmus of Panama against the enemies of the republic of Peru, or in case the casus faderis of the treaty of Lima should present itself, they have resolved to celebrate the following secret agreement, which will be carried into effect as soon as their respective governments shall approve and ratify it in the terms therein stipulated.

For which purpose the President of the United States of Colombia has conferred full powers on General Rudecindo Lopez, secretary of war and the navy departments, and on Doctor Froilan Largacha, secretary of the treasury department and national credit of the Union, and the supreme chief of Peru has conferred equal full powers on Colonel Manuel Freyre, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the said republic to the United States of Colombia, who, after having exchanged their respective full powers and found them in due and proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE I. The government of Peru cedes to that of Colombia all the rights which it has acquired in the United States of America and in Europe to several elements and vessels of war, in order that the latter may conclude for her own account the contracts for the purchase of the said elements and vessels, arming and manning them for her own service as national vessels.

ART. II. The funds which Peru has advanced on account of the contract already entered into are equally ceded to the government of the United States of Colombia to carry into effect the payment due to the contractors for the said vessels and elements of war, and shall furnish her also with those which she may require to carry into effect as soon as possible the contract, and to secure the furnishing of the said vessels before the first of January, 1867, when the conventions celebrated in the American Congress are to be exchanged in Lima.

ART. III. The government of Colombia undertakes to pay for the said vessels the sum expended thereon by the republic of Peru, together with that which the latter is to furnish according to the terms of the present contract; and for this purpose pledges the whole of her revenues, titles, rights, salt works, and waste lands, which may be at her disposal, and the product of the interoceanic communications and those of the Buenaventura road, in which she possesses shares for one million of dollars.

ART. IV. In case the government of Colombia should find itself obliged to dispose of the above-mentioned vessels and elements of war, the government of Peru undertakes to receive them in payment for the sum in which they may have been contracted for by Colombia, without any deduction for the wear and tear which they have suffered in their service. In this case the government of Peru reserves to itself the right of naming the ports in the Pacific or Atlantic in which it may be convenient for it to receive the same elements of war, and the expenses caused thereby shall be for the account of Peru. The government of Colombia will not be responsible for the loss of the vessels, nor for that of the elements of war, until they arrive in the ports to which the said government may order them.

ART. V. The government of Peru undertakes to permit the officers of the Peruvian navy, who may choose to do so, to enter into the service of Colombia, for the purpose of taking charge of the said vessels, which shall be manned by the same persons already appointed by the Peruvian government, and those which the government of Colombia may think proper to add thereto.

ART. VI. The government of Peru undertakes to furnish to that of Colombia the necessary resources for repairing the fortresses of San José and San Fernando, and the batteries of Santo Domingo, San Favier and Santa Catarina in the bay and city of Carthagena, and the Morro of Santa Martha, in case Colombia should take part in the alliance entered into by the four republics of the Pacific, and if at that time Peru should not possess the elements required for the purpose, her government solemnly undertakes to furnish to that of Colombia the sum of five hundred thousand dollars, ($500,000,) either contracting that amount on her own account, or furnishing her the guarantee for the purpose of obtaining it in the European markets.

ART. VII. The Colombian government undertakes to send a minister to the republic of Venezuela, which has also declared her neutrality in the war with Spain, in order to negotiate with the latter her adhesion to the republics of the Pacific together with Colombia, in case Spain should not yield to the councils of prudence and satisfy the just demands of the allied republics, in which case the league of Spanish America requires to be perfect.

ART. VIII. The republics of Peru and of the United States of Colombia undertake mutually to declare not to accept as an American principle any doctrine which shall not emanate directly from express treaties on their part, since the said contracting parties are sovereign and independent, and will themselves, in conformity with their own dignity, decide whatever questions may arise. In the same manner they undertake not to accept any European protectorates or alliances to the injury of the sovereignty of the Peruvian and Colombian nations, as well as not to stipulate any treaties or conventions which shall not be in absolute conformity with the principles of South American international law as sanctioned by the congress of plenipotentiaries.

ART. IX. This treaty shall be presented to the republics of Bolivar, Chili, and Ecuador, in case they should choose to adhere to it in the part which may be convenient to each one as respects the sale of vessels and elements of war which they may require to sell, and for the purpose of articles VI and VIII.

The present convention shall be approved and ratified by the respective governments within ninety days, if possible.

In witness whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed and sealed the present convention.

Done in duplicate, in Bogota, this twenty-eighth day of August, eighteen hundred and six-six.

R. LOPEZ. [L. s.]
MANUEL FREYRE. [L. s.]

Therefore, I have resolved to approve and ratify the same, pledging the national honor for the observance thereof.

In witness whereof, I sign the present ratification, sealed with the arms of the republic, and countersigned by the secretary of state for the department of the interior and foreign relations, Bogota, this twentieth day of November, eighteen hundred and sixty-six

The chamber of representatives considering that the nation has no other vessels of war than the steamers Criaspué, Bolívar, and Colombia, which have been ordered to be sold by the law of the 5th of the present month, "abolishing the navy of the Union;"

Considering that the congress of the Union has not ordered the acquisition of any other vessel of war, or for mercantile purposes, or the purchase of any kind of implements of war;

Considering that in several periodicals of Washington, New York, Lima, Panama, and other places, the purchase by the minister of Colombia in the United States of America of a vessel of war called R. R. Cuyler, the owners of which were Messrs. Robert S. Taylor, Russell Sturgis, Henry W. Hobbell, and Samuel Dallard, is published;

Considering that the said vessel has been denounced as being armed and prepared to act upon the high seas as a cruiser in the service of Chili and Peru against the maritime commerce of Spain, was captured and embargoed on the fourth of February last, by order of the cabinet of Washington, by the public officers, Messrs. Wakeman and Smythe;

Considering that the said steamer was set at liberty only in virtue of the solemn declaration made by our minister in Washington, General Eustorgio Salgar, that the said vessel had been purchased by the United States of Colombia and belonged to our national navy;

Considering that the executive power of the Union informed the chamber of representatives, through the secretary of war and the navy, Mr. Froilan Largacha, in a note dated the 27th of March last, section 1, No. 7, that the said vessel had recently arrived at Santa Martha; that she had been bought by order and for account of the Grand General T. C. de Mosquera; that the said vessel, and two or three more which the agents of the said grand general were about to purchase in Europe and the United States of America, were the private property of the above-named citizen, who had already nationalized the steamer called the Rayo;

Considering that our minister in Washington, notwithstanding he had no power from the Colombian Union to purchase merchant vessels, and much less vessels of war, had taken part in this matter and declared that the said steamer was intended to form part of our national navy, seriously compromising, in this manner, the faith and honor of the Colombian government and the neutrality proclaimed by the latter in the Spanish American contests at present in progress;

Considering that the said steamer is manned by foreigners, who nearly all of them have been either soldiers in the marines or sailors in the cruisers, or smugglers of the southern States of the Union; that the captain and officers are also foreigners, and that for the said reason the vessel could not be nationalized in Colombia, and neither could nor can have the right to hoist the Colombian flag;

Considering that no individual, be he who he may, is permitted to have in his own service vessels of war, since this is a right solely appertaining to the government and sovereigns, with the exception of privateers, bearing a commission from some nation, which commission has not been issued by Colombia in favor of the Rayo;

Considering that the executive power has observed a profound silence regarding all these facts which have been denounced both by the foreign and national press; that the reports which the chamber applied for in the session of the 4th instant, through a commission of its body, have not been accorded, and that this chamber of representatives is bound to clear up these facts in order to determine the responsibility incurred by any of the national officers thereby in accordance with the third section of the fifty-third article of the constitution;

Resolved, Let the executive power be applied to order the immediate disarming of the steamer called El Rayo, employing force, if necessary, in order to put an end to the violation caused by the presence on our coasts of the said steamer of war, unduly protected by the Colombian flag.

Resolved, That the attorney general of the Union be ordered, in consequence of the above-mentioned note of the secretary of war and the navy, to proceed immediately to prepare the proofs of the facts referred to in the foregoing consideration, and to make effective the responsibility which may have been incurred by the minister of Colombia in Washington, the national officers, and the Colombians who may have taken part in the purchase, arming, fitting out or nationalizing the steamer called Cuyler or Rayo, bearing in mind the enactments of the articles 262 and 263 of the law, 1, part 2, treaties 2, of the Recopilación Granadina, as well as the dispositions of article 1 of the law 7, part 3, treaties 2, of the said Recopilación.

Resolved, That he be also ordered to prefer an accusation regarding the responsibility incurred through the acts performed by the Colombian minister in Washington for obtaining the release of said steamer.

Resolved, Let the executive power be requested to pass copies of the preceding resolution and considerations to the foreign ministers resident in the capital of the republic.

Resolved, That the said considerations and resolutions shall be published in the Registro Oficial, as well as the steps taken by the attorney general of the nation, in obedience to the said resolutions, it being his duty to furnish a special account of the results thereof to the next national congress.

UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA, OFFICE OF THE INTERIOR AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,

Bogota, July 5, 1867.

The undersigned, secretary of the interior and foreign relations, has received instructions from the citizen President of the United States of Colombia to apply to his excellency the envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the republic of Peru, with a view to inform him that the Colombian executive administration does not recognize as valid the secret convention entered into on the 28th of August, 1866, between his excellency as Peruvian plenipotentiary in this capacity, and Messrs. Froilan Largacha and Rudecindo Lopez as plenipotentiaries for Colombia.

This disavowal of the secret convention above alluded to is, on the part of the national executive power, a frank and sincere expression of a constitutional mandate, which ascribes, as his excellency is aware, to the legislative body of the country the right of approving the treaties or conventions which may be entered into for contracting obligations in the name of the said country, in virtue of instructions previously approved of by the senate of plenipotentiaries. In accordance with prescriptions of the constitution of Colombia, the faculty of conferring validity upon international compacts and of making them effective resides, therefore, exclusively in the federal legislative body, and the approbation of the instructions which may be given by the executive power for the celebration of such compacts corresponds to the Colombian senate of plenipotentiaries.

The time for presenting to the national legislative body the secret convention would have now arrived in order to impart it either its approval or rejection; but the present Colombian administration, notwithstanding the enthusiasm which it really feels for the noble cause which may become that of the whole of America, cannot admit as in any manner acceptable the stipulations of the secret convention, and will therefore abstain from soliciting the approbation of an act which has been considered in its councils as inadmissible for the nation whose interests are intrusted to it.

If the Colombian Union had resolved to unite its endeavors to those of the American republics which have been attacked by Spain, the common cause would require not only the concurrence of justice in the matter, but also of loyalty in the form.

The government of Colombia should act and would act with the loyalty and frankness which she owes to all the nations of the world, and would consider the sympathies to be so large, the motives so noble, and the moral and philosophical interests so valuable that are embraced by this cause, that there could be no possible motive for not exhibiting it in all its glory, and presenting it to the enthusiasm and veneration of an entire people, zealous as is the Colombian nation of its rights and liberties.

Taking into consideration the sentiments excited by every American by the struggle which has been made in the waters of the Pacific, sentiments of adhesion and hope for the allied republics, the present Colombian administration has noticed with pain the secret convention, the execution of which by Colombia is impossible, and it is for this motive, and the others already expressed that, on taking into consideration the above-mentioned act which compromises the national security and honor, it abstains at present from anything more than disavowing it.

The undersigned takes advantage of this opportunity to reiterate to his excellency the assurances of his most distinguished consideration.

CARLOS MARTIN.

His Excellency Colonel D. MANUEL FREYRE,
Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the Republic of Peru.

H.

Mr. Sullivan to Doctor Martin.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Bogota, August 9, 1867.

The undersigned, minister resident of the United States of America, has had the honor to receive the note of his excellency Señor Doctor Carlos Martin, secretary of the interior and foreign relations of the United States of Colombia, dated yesterday, inclosing—

1. The letter A, being minutes of the conference which the undersigned had the honor of holding with his excellency Señor Doctor Carlos Martin, on the 1st instant.

2. The letter B, containing copies in Spanish and English of the secret treaty made by General Mosquera and the Peruvian minister, on the 28th day of August, 1866.

3. The letter C, containing the resolutions adopted by the Colombian congress, April 29, 1867, relative to the war steamer Rayo.

4. The letter D, being a copy of the said minutes in Spanish.

5. The letter E, being a copy of the note of his excellency Señor Doctor Carlos Martin to the Peruvian minister, objecting to the said treaty.

6. A memorandum, F, of the constitutional law, defining the separate powers and duties of the executive and congress of Colombia.

The undersigned has duly approved and herewith returns the said minutes to his excellency Señor Doctor Carlos Martin.

The undersigned begs to assure his excellency Señor Doctor Carlos Martin that he will hasten to submit said note and inclosures to his government, and to assure him that the great hope and confidence which the Colombian government reposes for the just and impartial judgment of its conduct in the government of the United States of America will not be misplaced.

The undersigned gladly embraces this opportunity to reassure his excellency Señor Doctor Carlos Martin of his most distinguished consideration and esteem.

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

His Excellency Señor Doctor CARLOS MARTIN,

Secretary of the Interior and Foreign Relations, U. S. C.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Bogota, August 9, 1867.

SIR: The Colombian government having refused to receive or acknowledge the steamer R. R. Cuyler, alias the war steamer Rayo, and is desirous to return her to the port of New York, there to be delivered up to the proper owner, as the United States may direct, but having no means at its disposal, the government of Colombia ask as a favor that the United States authorities will take her to New York for the purpose indicated. And lest that I should involve my government in so serious a matter before knowing its views on the subject, I assured the Colombian government that I would lay the case before the State Department and await its decision.

Until further instructions, you will repair forthwith to and keep strict secret surveillance over the said steamer Rayo, her armament and other property, so as to prevent her from being used for piratical or other unlawful purposes detrimental to the rights and dignity of our government; but, unless in case of necessity, you will not assume any right to this steamer, except such as will enable you to control her movements.

The President of the State of Magdalena, in whose possession this steamer now is, will be fully and duly instructed by the Colombian government on the subject; and without making known your authority till you ascertain his views, you may, profitably, have an interview with President Riasco as to his action in this matter.

You will report to me from time to time your actions and the course of events in this case.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN,

Minister resident of the U. S. of America to the U. S. of Colombia.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, August 17, 1867.

SIR: In my dispatch No. 7, of July 6, you were cautioned not to commit yourself by formally recognizing any constitutional change of government until you should have referred the subject to this department for the consideration of the President of the United States.

It has been the practice of this government to refrain from recognizing the various revolutionary changes which have occurred in the neighboring States of this continent until it had received satisfactory evidence of the acquiescence of the people concerned therein. Inasmuch as there now appears to be a general consent of the Colombian people to the change lately effected by the recent movement at Bogota, by which General Mosquera, the President, was deprived of his power and Mr. Santos Acosta substituted in his place, the President does not feel authorized to withhold his recognition of the present de facto executive head of the government of Colombia. You are, therefore, instructed to present your credentials at the earliest convenient opportunity.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

FLAG-SHIP SUSQUEHANNA,

Aspinwall, August 8, 1867.

SIR: I wish to apprise you of my arrival in the flag-ship Susquehanna on the coast of Colombia, but fear, as you are so far in the interior, that I shall not be fortunate enough to obtain an interview; but from all that I can learn, and can observe, this republic appears to be again quiet, and our railroad people have nothing to apprehend. I shall be glad, however, to learn from you the state of affairs, and shall be at Carthegena by about the 20th or 22d of this month. Hoping you will receive this communication in time to send a reply to Carthegena before I leave that for Santa Martha and La Guayra, I remain, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Hon. PETER J. SULLIVAN,

Mr. Sullivan to Rear-Admiral Palmer.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

Bogota, August 27, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your very polite and intelligent letter of the 8th instant, informing me of your arrival in the flag-ship Susquehanna on the coast of Colombia, and desiring to learn from me the state of affairs here by the 22d instant, which reached me but last night.

Peace prevails here at present; Congress is in session; General Mosquera is still in prison impatiently awaiting his trial for treason and malappropriation of some $45,000 of government funds, while minister to England.

On the 9th instant I addressed a communication to "Any of our naval commanders in the waters of Colombia," of which the following is an abstract:

"SIR: The Colombian government having refused to receive or acknowledge the steamer R. R. Cuyler, alias the war steamer Rayo, and is desirous to return her to the port of New York, there to be delivered up to the proper owner, as the United States may direct, but having no means at its disposal, the government of Colombia asks, as a favor, that the United States authorities will take her to New York for the purpose indicated; and lest that I should involve my government in so serious a matter before knowing its views on the subject, I assured the Colombian government that I would lay the case before the State Department and await its decision.

"Until further instructions you will repair forthwith to, and keep strict secret surveillance over, the said steamer Rayo, her armament and other property, so far as to prevent her from being used for piratical or other unlawful purposes, detrimental to the rights and dignity of our government.

* * * * *

"You will report to me from time to time your action and the course of events in this case."

From the general report which I have had of your sound discretion and great ability as a naval commander, I trust that said communication has reached you ere this time.

An admiral of the Peruvian navy has just arrived in this city, for the purpose, as I have been informed, of inducing this government to permit him to take this steamer to his country, she having been bought privately by Peru to be used against Spain.

I have obtained and forwarded to Washington a copy of the secret treaty entered into by General Mosquera and the Peruvian government, on the subject of the war between Spain, Peru, and Chili. The purchase of this war steamer, and knowing that fraud has been perpetrated upon our government in the fitting out, manning in, and bringing this steamer from the United States, caused me to issue the said order.

Those southern republics, now at war with Spain, are endeavoring to force Venezuela into their scheme of one grand southern confederacy, which, if successful in its scheme of annexing Cuba—perhaps Mexico—would undoubtedly tend to check the most vital interests and prosperity of our country. But having now discovered their unfriendly feeling towards us, we are, at last, in a favorable position to take care of ourselves, yet we must not forget that these republics are struggling to uphold republican governments against the organized efforts of their powerful foes.

It is our "manifest destiny" to give vitality to, as also to preserve the existence of these republics; but they must be given to understand that, while we are able and willing to protect them from the grasping power of monarchists, they must not snub us with impunity, as in the case of this secret treaty, and its ultimate objects.

We are now all right with this government.

I have the honor to be, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Carthagena, August 29, 1867.

SIR: My last official dispatch was under date of 14th instant, and was forwarded in charge of Colonel Robinson.

On the 21st instant the United States steamer Susquehanna, flag-ship of Rear-Admiral Palmer, and the United States steamer Monongahela, Commodore Bissell, came into this harbor and were saluted by the Spanish frigate Gerona. The Susquehanna afterwards saluted the town, and returned the salute of the Spanish frigate. The salute to the town was not answered, and on the following morning I went with the fleet captain to present the admiral's respects to his excellency the President of the State, and inquire why the salute had not been answered. His excellency replied that there were not in the place the proper means for firing salutes, and that, had the admiral notified him of his intentions to salute the town before doing so, as is customary, he would either have declined receiving the salute, or else have made an effort to have such salute properly returned.

These vessels left here on the 22d for Santa Martha, where the admiral intended to inform himself as to the circumstances of the imprisonment of some of the crew of the Colombian steamer Colombia, who were formerly attached to the steamer Rayo. I made the admiral acquainted with the state of affairs at Baranquilla and Rio Hatché, but he said he did not think of going to those ports.

There is a rumor here that the first officer of the Colombia, Lieutenant G. A. Borchart, who held the same position in the Rayo, and some others of the same vessel, had been captured and shot by General Herrera, at Rio Hatché. It is said that Herrera has since evacuated that place.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

AUG. S. HANABERG.

General PETER J. SULLIVAN,
United States Minister Resident at Bogota.

Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Hanaberg.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, September 16, 1867.

SIR: Your two attentive favors of the 29th ultimo, informing me, among other things, of the arrival of Rear-Admiral Palmer and Commodore Bissel, United States navy, with their war steamers, in the harbor of Carthagena, and of the stiff manner of their reception by the President of the State of Bolivar, came to hand by yesterday's mail.

You will please thank, in my name, the commanding officer of the Spanish frigate Gerona, for the respect which he had paid those officers in saluting the American flag, as stated in your letter No. 8.

You say that information has reached you "that the first officer of the Colombia, Lieutenant G. A. Borchart, who had held the same position in the steamer Rayo, had been captured and shot by General Herrera, at Rio Hatché."

Should this information turn out to be true, and that he was an American citizen, entitled to the protection of our government, it becomes a very serious international question.

That you may know my views on the subject of the officers and crew of the Rayo having been fraudulently decoyed from the United States, and then made the sport of, and derided by, designing demagogues, I send the following extract from a postscript which I had prepared, but not sent, to my letter No. 13, of June 29th last, addressed to Captain Foster, of the Osceola, on hearing that these men were captured and about to be punished by General Lopez's forces:

[Extract.]

"Just as I was about to mail this dispatch a report reached me that American citizens, while endeavoring to escape from the bondage to which they have lately been held on board of the war steamer Rayo, were retaken by General Lopez's forces, and are being held for trial before a court-martial; I therefore request that you will, as soon as possible, demand of the commanders of the Rayo and Colombia, of General Lopez, and of the President of the State of Bolivar, the names and cause of detention of all citizens of the United States of America held by them, or either of them, by virtue of any pretended contract of servitude, or otherwise; and, that if, upon a full examination of the whole facts in the case, you should find any citizen of the United States of America unjustly held by any of these officers, you will demand and obtain his release in such a manner as will insure success.

"The duplicity and fraud said to have been practiced upon these unfortunate Americans, for the purpose of alluring them from their homes, under guise of splendid and honorable employment, calls for strict investigation into their sad case; but, at all events, you will see that no injury shall result to them, or any of them, until a full report of their case is submitted to our government and its opinion is known on the subject."

The report that these men were not captured as stated, having only reached me, caused me to withhold the above at that time.

Should I find, upon inquiry, that this American citizen (†) has been shot at Rio Hatché, I will cause an immediate investigation into the facts of the case.

I am, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

AUGUSTUS S. HANABERG, Esq.,

United States Consul at Carthagena, U. S. C.

Mr. Seward to Mr. Sullivan.

No. 14.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, September 23, 1867.

SIR: You will have learned from the consul at Carthagena, long before this communication shall have arrived, that George A. Borchert, J. W. Murdaugh, T. S. Dronin, and Philip Smith were violently assaulted by a mob at Carthagena on the 1st day of September instant; that the two former were murdered, and that the two latter escaped only after great peril.

It is understood that those persons were on that occasion casual visitors at Carthagena, having arrived there on the same day in a British mail steamer from Santa Martha. The four persons named are understood to have been natives of the United States, and to have served in the land and naval forces of the rebels. It is not understood that they ever made any special act of submission to the government of the United States. It is said that they enlisted themselves during the last season in the Colombian naval service at New York, and that they proceeded under the Colombian flag as officers on board a Colombian war steamer, the R. R. Cuyler, which has since taken the name of El Rayo.

Assuming that those persons had practically and even treasonably cast off their allegiance to the United States and entered the naval service of the government of the country in which the murderous outrage was committed, the consul at Carthagena was of the opinion that the wrongs committed upon them could not be properly made a subject for a claim of redress by this government.

With our present knowledge of the case we are not prepared to disallow and overrule that opinion. The facts assumed by the consul, however, are not yet in any authentic manner made known to this government, and there is room to suppose that he may have misapprehended them.

Reserving for ultimate consideration the question of our absolute right to intervene, I have to observe that the outrage cannot, in any state of the case, fail to deeply wound the sense of dignity and the natural sympathies of the people of the United States, and impair a desirable confidence in the administration of the laws of Colombia.

You are expected, therefore, to address yourself to the President of Colombia, and to urge, upon principles of international comity as well as of humanity, that the case may be promptly and thoroughly investigated, that the guilty parties may be brought to condign punishment and that indemnities, as far as is possible, may be awarded to the families of the two individuals who were so barbarously slain.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

PETER J. SULLIVAN, Esq., &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Seward.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, September 26, 1867.

SIR: Since my arrival here the Colombian government annulled General Mosquera's decree of November 17, 1866, upon the adjudication of maritime prizes.

It has granted a new lease, for ninety-nine years, of the right of transit to the Panama Railroad Company, in consideration of one million dollars in hand, and two hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum during the term of the lease.

It has granted a contract to the International Ocean Telegraph Company of New York (see inclosed A, B, C) to land upon and run through any portion of the territory of the United States of Colombia a telegraph line, to connect with one from New York via Florida, Cuba, and Panama, thus connecting South America, the United States and Europe with one continuous line of communication, having New York for its center.

It has, also, just signed a contract with a New York company for the exclusive right of fishery to this company in all the seacoast waters of Colombia. This contract has yet to be approved by the senate, which I think will be done.

All of these vast privileges have been given to citizens of our country.

* * * * *

A rumor prevails here that several American citizens were lately murdered, in cold blood, by Colombian officials at Carthagena, and that while committing this atrocious crime the assassins boasted that "the Colombians were a match for the disunited Americans."

I have sent unofficial communications to our consuls at Carthagena and Baranquilla on this subject. At first I heard that these rumored murders were committed by General Herrera at Rio Hatché. I shall await the facts before I take any official action in this matter.

Telegraphic Contract.

[Translation.]

Contract made between the secretary of the treasury of the United States of Colombia and Charles Rebello, authorized agent of the International Oceanic Telegraph Company of New York, conceding to this company permission to establish on the coasts of the republic the extreme ends of telegraphic submarine cables and unite these with overland telegraphic lines:

The undersigned, to wit: Jorge Gutierrez de Lara, secretary of the treasury and finance of the United States of Colombia, duly authorized by the executive government on the one part, and on the other, Charles Rebello, authorized by the International Oceanic Telegraph Company of New York, (International Ocean Telegraph Company,) in accordance with the powers he has exhibited have concluded the contract following:

ARTICLE 1. The secretary of the treasury and finance, in the name of the executive authority of the United States of Colombia, and in virtue of the authority conferred on him by the legislative decree of the 25th of July last, grants permission to the International Ocean Telegraph Company of New York, to establish on the shores of the republic the ends of submarine telegraphic cables which may place the nation in contact with other points on the earth, also to connect said submarine cables with telegraphic lines by land.

ART. 2. The International Ocean Telegraph Company of New York rests under obligations to transmit gratuitously through every telegraphic line, whether submarine or terrene, which it may hold in virtue of the concession of the permission to which the preceding article refers, all the official communications of the national authorities and of the States.

ART. 3. The secretary of the treasury and finance, in the name of the executive authority and in virtue of the provisions in article 2 of the said legislative decree, declares the undertaking to which the preceding articles refer to be of public utility, and therefore the International Oceanic Telegraph Company of New York shall enjoy the prerogatives annexed to this declaration.

ART. 4. In cases of foreign war or intestine disturbance in the republic of Colombia, the telegraphic lines which may be held in virtue of this permission in Colombian territory, shall not be in operation except under the supervision of the political authorities of this nation.

ART. 5. Considering that Charles Rebello is lacking in faculties to compel the company to the payment of the five per cent. of dividends, which are to be distributed to the shareholders for the profits which may be had on the lines referred to in article 2 of this contract, it is stipulated that the International Oceanic Telegraph Company of New York shall give notice to the government of Colombia, either directly or through the Colombian legation at Washington, within six months, reckoned from the date of the approval of this contract by the executive authority, whether it binds itself to pay the said five per cent. that it may become exempted from every kind of imposts and contributions, whether national or of the States. In case this obligation is assumed and the notice received to which this article refers, the government of Colombia binds itself to exempt the International Oceanic Telegraph Company of New York, from the payment of any impost or contribution, national or State, and by these presents declares that it shall not in any case be obliged to satisfy those which may be imposed on them. In case of non-exemption on the part of the company it will have no right to the preceding exemption.

ART. 6. Doubts which may arise about the meaning of the clauses of this permission and cannot be dispersed by agreement between the government of Colombia shall be submitted to the decision of the courts of the republic.

ART. 7. This contract shall be submitted to the approval of the President of the union, without which it cannot be carried into effect. In faith whereof we have signed three of the same tenor at Bogota, on the tenth of August, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven.

*Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Rebello.*LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, August 13, 1867.

SIR: It affords me great pleasure to acknowledge the receipt of your communication of the 10th instant, accompanying the contract entered into by you as said attorney with the Colombian government, giving permission to your company to establish a telegraph line to the coast, and through the territory, under the jurisdiction of the United States of Colombia.

I shall place this valuable document on the records of this legation, and transmit a copy of it herewith to you, and also one to the Department of State, United States.

The lively zeal which you have thus manifested in the service and cause of your company—the development of commerce and of civilization; and above all, the fraternal feelings which this great enterprise is well calculated to bring about among the great nations whose commerce it will greatly increase, must, indeed, place you prominently among the benefactors of mankind.

I am, sir, with great respect, your most obedient servant,

CHARLES REBELLO, Esq.,

Attorney of the International Ocean Telegraph Company of New York.

No. 17.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, September 27, 1867.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of the 12th of August, No. 14, with its accompaniment, which consists of the protocol of an interesting conference which on the 1st of that month you held with Señor Carlos Martin, and various documents designed to illustrate the subjects discussed on that occasion. From those papers I learn that the government of Colombia has ascertained that a secret convention was made in Bogota on the 28th day of August, 1866, between plenipotentiaries of that republic and Peru, which was approved and declared to be ratified by Thomas C. de Mosquera, the President of the United States of Colombia, on the 20th day of November, 1866; that in the said convention the republic of Colombia bound itself to purchase certain vessels of war which the republic of Peru had contracted or was contracting for in the United States, to be used against Spain in the war in which Peru, with certain allies, was then and still is engaged; that the United States of Colombia, before making the convention, had not become an ally nor engaged in war with Spain, but the republic committed itself secretly as an ally by the convention; that when the convention was made the government of Peru had found itself embarrassed by the neutrality laws of the United States, and so unable to obtain clearance and discharge by the United States revenue officers of the ships of war which Peru had contracted for with citizens of the United States; that the convention stipulated that the vessels should become the property of the republic of Colombia, which state should nevertheless ostensibly remain a neutral, after the convention, in the war before mentioned; and that when the vessels should have arrived within the jurisdiction of Colombia, then they should be sold and delivered by the United States of Colombia to the republic of Peru at prices and upon terms which clearly indicate that the sale within the United States by Peru to Colombia was intended to be colorable only, and in fraud of the neutrality laws of the United States; that in pursuance of the convention Mr. Salgar, minister plenipotentiary of Colombia, announced to the government of the United States that the R. R. Cuyler, which had been already denounced at New York and was refused a clearance and detained upon the ground that she was being fitted out in violation of the neutrality laws of the United States to make war in behalf of Peru and her allies against Spain, had been purchased by the United States of Colombia for their own use, and was in fact the property, not of the republic of Peru or of either of those allies, but of the United States of Colombia, which were at peace with Spain. That this representation of Mr. Salgar was accepted, and the proceedings against the R. R. Cuyler were discontinued; that bonds were given by the parties who, as Mr. Salgar represented, had contracted for the vessel to the Colombian Republic, to secure the United States for her delivery within the waters of the Colombian government without violating the neutrality laws aforesaid, on her voyage and that upon receiving those assurances and guarantees the R. R. Cuyler was cleared and proceeded to her destination at Santa Martha, in the United States of Colombia.

It further appears, from the representations made by Mr. Martin to you, that when the convention referred to, and the proceedings of Mr. Salgar in the United States, afterwards became known to the congress of the United States of Colombia, that honorable body altogether disallowed those proceedings; and that the government of Colombia now disavows and repudiates them as being altogether illegal, unconstitutional, fraudulent, and void. President Mosquera, who assumed to conduct those proceedings, has been displaced, and has resigned. The administration of that country has been reorganized under the presidency of Señor Acosta, who concurs in and entirely adopts the before-mentioned views and policy of the congress of Colombia. It further appears that the republic of Colombia now finds itself embarrassed with the presence of the R. R. Cuyler in the waters of that republic, which presence is supposed to involve the dangers of, first, complications with Peru for a violation of the convention between Colombia and Peru; second, of complications with Spain by the compromise of the neutrality in Colombia; and, thirdly, of apprehended loss of confidence on the part of the United States in the good faith of the Colombian government. That the government of Colombia also apprehends that the R. R. Cuyler, if suffered to leave the ports of that republic, without such a naval guard as the President of Colombia is unable to furnish, might become a scene of mutiny, and that her officers and crew might even take up a course of piracy on the high seas. That under these circumstances the government of Colombia would regard it as the most prudent and desirable course that the R. R. Cuyler, under the naval protection of the United States, should be returned to the port of New York, to the end that this government might deliver her there to the government of Peru, for whom, in reality, and not for the United States of Colombia, it is now to be understood the vessel was prepared as a ship of war.

You have very properly referred the case to this department for instructions; and in the mean time you have requested the commander of any war vessel or steamer of the United States at Colon, Carthagena, or Santa Martha to keep watch in the interest of the Colombian government over the R. R. Cuyler, and to prevent her from going to sea until this government shall have pronounced its opinion upon the case submitted.

Having taken the President's directions, I have now to inform you, first, that your proceedings in the conference before mentioned with Mr. Martin are approved.

Second. That the President is very favorably impressed with the frankness, loyalty, and prudence which the reorganized government of the United States of Colombia has manifested in relation to the subjects discussed, and that he also deeply regrets the embarrassment of the Colombian authorities which the minister for foreign relations has so fully described. You will assure the minister that this government sincerely sympathizes with the republic of Colombia in the desire to relieve itself from that embarrassment.

Third. That in permitting the departure of the R. R. Cuyler, this government acted entirely without suspicion, and with an unhesitating reliance upon the representations which it had received from Mr. Salgar, the accredited minister of the republic of Colombia. You will add that this government entertained not the least suspicion that the confidence thus reposed by it in the President and minister plenipotentiary of Colombia could be abused, as it now clearly appears to have been abused.

The President regrets to learn that Mr. Salgar, as well as President Mosquera, who was then the undisputed and recognized executive head of the government of Colombia, acted fraudulently on the occasion referred to, both against the United States and against Colombia.

Fourth. So far as the United States are concerned, the R. R. Cuyler is and must be considered a foreign vessel belonging now to the United States of Colombia, or at least that she in nowise belongs to or can be recognised as belonging to the commercial marine of the United States. There is no law in the United States by which any restriction or control could now be extended to or exercised over the R. R. Cuyler by the United States, either in the waters of Colombia or on the high seas, or in the ports of the United States while she is neither doing nor threatening any wrong to the United States. There is no law by which she can be received within the United States in any other character than as a ship of war of that friendly republic, nor is there any law which would authorize her transfer or delivery here by the government of Colombia, by the government of the United States, or any other party, to a foreign power which is at war with another foreign state with which the United States are at peace. Last of all, could the United States assume to receive her from the government of Colombia as a neutral, and transfer, or cause or permit her to be transferred, within the waters of the United States to any belligerent.

Fifth. The executive government of the United States has no authority to exercise vigilance over the R. R. Cuyler in Colombian waters while she neither commits nor threatens to do any act of hostility or injury to the United States. You will, therefore, after having given proper notice to the President of Colombia, be expected to recall your request or instructions in that respect before given to the United States naval commander on the coast.

I cannot close this dispatch without assuring you of my appreciation of the diligent attention you have manifested in regard to the subjects discussed.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, October 12, 1867.

SIR: In conformity with your Nos. 3, 5, and 8, of June the 5th, of July 6th and 16th last, (which reached me but a few days since,) I addressed a note to the Colombian government asking explanations touching the irregularity of the shipment of American citizens in the steamer R. R. Cuyler, alias Rayo, at New York, and their subsequent bad treatment by the Colombian authorities.

* * * * *

I have the honor to inclose herewith, for your consideration and instructions, copies of correspondence had between myself and the Colombian government, and some of our consuls on the coast, on this new painful subject, viz:

A is my letter to the Colombian government; B, the answer; C, my reply; D, E, letters from the United States consul at Carthagena; F, my answer and instructions; H, my letter to the United States consul at Panama, with instructions; I, my letter to United States commercial agent at Baranquilla; J, the Diario Oficial exposing General Salgar.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

A.

*Mr. Sullivan to Señor Martin.*LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, October 5, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that I have been instructed by my government to demand of the government of Colombia explanations touching the irregularity of the shipment of American citizens in the steamer R. R. Cuyler at the port of New York by the Colombian executive government, and its subsequent refusal to pay them their wages.

To the inquiry I have now to add that of the barbarous and cruel murder of some of these very men by the Colombian national army at Carthagena, aided by the cunning connivance of its commander, and that of his brother, the President of the State of Bolivar.

The United States consul at that place, in a note of the 14th ultimo, informs me of the recent disgraceful attack upon four of these men by a mob composed principally of the national officers and soldiers garrisoning the city of Carthagena, and of the brutal murder of George A. Borchart and J. W. Murdaugh, and the serious wounding of S. L. Dornin, all natives of the United States of America. That the assassins, while butchering their victims, derisively denounced them as Americans, and when they had completed the murder, robbed and denuded the dead bodies of everything of value found upon them.

That at the time these assaults and murders were being concocted and committed, the President of the State of Bolivar, who had been previously warned of the fact, was quietly seated in the "cuartel" when the national officers and soldiers went out therefrom to commit these foul and bloody deeds. And his brother, the commander of these troops, although duly informed by the murderers of their intention to commit these crimes, having taken no measures to prevent them, shows conclusively that the state and national authorities at Carthagena had with premeditated and deliberate malice cunningly connived at, and were parties to, the welcoming of these foredoomed Americans, "with bloody hands to inhospitable graves."

If these men were guilty of any crime, why were they not duly arrested and tried according to Colombian laws and the laws of civilized nations?

A brief statement of their sad case will suffice to show that the Colombian government is unquestionably responsible to that of the United States of America for the fitting out, under false pretenses, the said steamer in the port of the latter, and for decoying those men from their native land and afterwards murdering them without cause, without trial, while in an utterly helpless condition on Colombian soil. On the 28th of August, 1866, the executive government of Colombia "in the name of God!" entered into a secret treaty with Peru, having for one of its objects the fitting out and manning in ports of the United States of America (without the knowledge or consent of the government of that country) vessels of war, to be ultimately used by Peru in her war with Spain.

Subsequently General Salgar, the Colombian minister at Washington, secretly acting upon and carrying out the unlawful purposes of this treaty, assured in the most positive manner the government of the United States of America that his government had entered into a contract with citizens of said United States for the purchase, arming, and equipping of said steamer, to be delivered at a Colombian port, and gave bond that this armed vessel was for the sole use and benefit of his own government, he then well knowing that said armed vessel was bought for the government of Peru to be used against Spain.

On the plighted faith of the Colombian government, pledged by its said minister, this vessel, with American officers and crew, was permitted to sail from the port of New York upon her voyage, in the expectation that she would become a public armed vessel of the United States of Colombia, and subsequently delivered up to, and was received by the Colombian executive government and its proper agents, on the Colombian coast.

Neither the subtlety of the logician nor the blandishments of the rhetorician can justly palliate or deny the accountability of the Colombian government to that of the country which I have the honor to represent, for the unlawful fitting out and bringing from the port of New York this armed vessel; for the duplicity and fraud practiced by the officials of Colombia upon these unfortunate Americans, for the purpose of alluring them from their native homes, under the plausible guise of splendid, honorable employment, and subsequently to abandon them without just cause, and leave them in a destitute and utterly helpless condition, as outcasts upon the shores of Colombia, and while in this situation to murder them in cold blood.

What redress can or will the Colombian government offer to that of the United States of America for these grievances, remains to be seen.

I now demand of the Colombian government, that the said commander of the troops at Carthagena be forthwith stricken from the army rolls in disgrace; that all parties, principal and accessories, to the said assault and murders, shall be forthwith arrested, tried, and punished according to law, and such other satisfaction as justice and the nature of this case may require.

I request an answer to this note within five days from its date, as by that time I shall prepare dispatches for my government and its consuls on the Colombian coast on this subject.

But ere I close this note I must state I believe in my heart the present government of Colombia is sincerely disposed to maintain good order and tranquillity at home, and to preserve its integrity and honor with all foreign powers; and that it loves the government, people, and institutions of the United States of America; and hence, I believe, will not sanction the inhuman conduct of the said commander of these butchers, or of his brother, the President of the State of Bolivar, nor of these atrocious murders.

I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency my unflinching faith in your high sense of honor and love of justice, and to remain your excellency's obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

Secretary of the Interior and Foreign Relations U. S. C.

Mr. Martin to Mr. Sullivan.

[Translation.]

OFFICE OF THE HOME DEPARTMENT AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogota, October 10, 1867.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive the note dated 5th instant, which your excellency has been pleased to remit to this office, in which you state that you have received instructions from your government to demand an explanation from that of Colombia respecting the irregular conduct of the Colombian administration in shipping American citizens on board the steamer R. R. Cuyler, and afterwards refusing to pay them their salaries. And your excellency adds that you have to make another demand for explanations respecting the barbarous and cruel assassination of some of the above-mentioned citizens by the Colombian national army stationed in Carthagena, aided by the crafty support of their commander, and of the brother of the latter, President of the State of Bolivar, transmitting also certain details bearing reference to the occurrence, which the consul of the United States resident in Carthagena has remitted to the American legation.

The above-mentioned communication having been laid before the citizen President, I have received instructions to forward to your excellency the following reply:

The federal government of Colombia laments the events which your excellency has been pleased to communicate, and most profoundly deploras that the national forces organized and stationed in Carthagena, failing to fulfill their duties as protectors of rights and security, as appears by your excellency's statement, should unfortunately have allowed themselves to be induced to act with the barbarous cruelty which you relate.

The federal government, in obedience to the sentiments of justice which animate it, and yielding to its natural indignation at such proceedings, as well as to the friendship which it entertains for the American people and their government, has dictated all the measures necessary to carry into effect an inquiry into the facts to which your excellency refers, and to discover the persons who have taken part in such conduct, and bring to effectual and rigorous trial all such as may be responsible for the same, be they who they may, in accordance with the constitution and the law.

In the same manner the said government has issued peremptory orders for disbanding the battalion which was in Carthagena under the command of Señor Gonzales Carazo, to which the officers referred to by your excellency's note belonged; the said force will therefore no longer be in the service of the republic.

The federal government will proceed, as respects the demand made by your excellency, for the dismissal from the service of the commander of the forces stationed in Carthagena, in the same manner as in the other reparations for which application is made in the note above referred to, with all the energy and decision which justice demands, and as are compatible with the constitution and laws.

No consideration shall avail to detain the federal government in the path which it has chosen for the purpose of giving the American government due and legal reparation for such acts.

The attorney general, our highest functionary, who can judicially speak for the nation, has received instructions and been peremptorily ordered to carry into effect all such measures as may bring to judgment the parties guilty of the assassination of the unfortunate American citizens Borchart and Murdaugh.

The government of Bolivar has also been called upon to give a strict account of its conduct in this respect, as an agent of the federal government.

Your excellency complains, also, of the irregular proceedings of the former Colombian administration in celebrating the secret convention of 28th August, 1866, among the stipulations of which appears one for equipping and arming, in the ports of the United States of America, certain vessels which were to be delivered by Peruvian agents; and demands an explanation of certain acts which have been performed in consequence of the said convention, and which affect the American government, as having been executed in its dominions, such as the sailing of the steamer Rayo from New York.

In order to remove every motive of complaint in this respect, I beg leave to remind the Hon. Mr. Sullivan that the executive government of Colombia, through this office of state, guided by a sentiment of the highest esteem for the relations which unite it with that of the American Union, and with the object of maintaining the said relations upon the basis of a perfect understanding and cordiality, considered that the most perfect honor, frankness, and truth, would be the best means for securing in a permanent manner the said beneficial relations. In observance of such a line of conduct the honorable minister was invited to this office of state a very few days after his arrival in this capital, and the national government, with a spontaneity which proves its good faith, lost no time to acquaint him with the said secret convention, as well as with all the acts performed in execution thereof which had any reference to the American government.

The conference took place on the 1st of August, and from the minute which was drawn up thereof, it appears that the Hon. Mr. Sullivan duly appreciated the said conduct, and accepted the explanations respecting the secret convention, which, from a sense of the justice due to his government, were spontaneously offered him.

In the above-mentioned conference, I informed your excellency that General Salgar had been superseded in his mission near the American government on the 31st of last May, on which day the executive power of Colombia had found reason to believe that he had taken part in the execution of the said convention; that he would be held responsible to the supreme federal court of Colombia for his proceedings. Upon that occasion I also stated to your excellency that one of the causes of the responsibility which were then in course of being inquired into, as regards General Mosquera, chief of the former executive administration of Colombia, and at present suspended from the exercise of the presidential functions, and submitted to trial before the senate of the Union, is that of having celebrated and commenced to carry into effect the said secret convention, abandoning in this manner the line of conduct prescribed by the constitution. I informed your excellency, also, that on the 5th of July last, upon the present executive government receiving the first advice of the said act, its validity was repudiated in accordance with a resolution which has occasioned a controversy with the representative of the Peruvian republic in this capital.

The nation, the present government in its name, has done everything in its power. In order to vindicate its rights which were violated by unfaithful magistrates, the persons of the latter were seized for the purpose of placing them in the dock of the accused before the tribunal in such case provided, the senate of the plenipotentiaries. With a view to give satisfaction to friendly nations, to fulfill the international duties, and to carry into effect the institutions of Colombia, the said government has ignored the validity of the secret convention of 28th August, 1866, and especially with the American government, that of Colombia lost no time in proving its faithfulness by laying before the former a full account of the said convention, and of everything connected therewith, without having received any invitation in that respect, and guided solely by the greatest integrity and deference.

The expression contained in the above-mentioned note of the Hon. Mr. Sullivan, to which I have the honor to reply, by which he recognizes in my government a sincere desire to maintain public order in the interior, preserve its honor before all foreign powers, and continue its friendly relations with the government and people of the United States of America, is profoundly grateful to the federal government.

The act of justice which your excellency hopes to obtain, as a proof of these sentiments of consideration for your government, shall be an object of the special attention of the executive power of Colombia, who will endeavor to justify on this solemn occasion the faith which your excellency declares he has in its high sentiments of honor and love of justice.

In compliance with the desire manifested by your excellency to obtain an early reply, by reason of the approaching dispatch of the post, I have lost no time in attending thereto, and take advantage of the present opportunity to subscribe myself the Hon. General Sullivan's most attentive and faithful servant,

CARLOS MARTIN.

C.

Mr. Sullivan to Señor Martin.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Bogota, October 11, 1867.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note of the 10th, in reply to mine of the 5th instant, relative to the irregular shipment of American citizens in the steamer R. R. Cuyler, at New York, by the Colombian government, and the subsequent abuse of all, and murder of some, of these men at Carthagena.

I receive with infinite gratification the renewed token of the friendly spirit of the republic of the United States of Colombia towards the government and people of the United States of America; and in behalf of my government I reciprocate the sentiments of friendship expressed by you, in your said note, for my government.

So long as this friendly spirit exists, which I trust will be perpetual, the sister republics of America and Colombia will be happy in their mutual relations towards, and frank confidence in, each other; and the attempts of bad and designing men to disturb these relations will be speedily detected, exposed, and punished.

Neither shall the friendship of our respective countries be endangered, nor the republican institutions perish by the hands of assassins.

In the spirit of true friendship, I have the honor to remain your excellency's most obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

His Excellency Señor Dr. CARLOS MARTIN,
Secretary of the Interior and Foreign Relations United States of Colombia.

*Mr. Hanaberg to Mr. Sullivan.*CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA, Carthagena, September 14, 1867.

SIR: I refer you to my last report of the second instant, giving you an account of the horrible murder of the two officers of the Rayo, Messrs. Borchart and Murdaugh, and the serious wounding of Mr. Dornin, a son of Commodore Dornin of the United States navy. This case has appeared to me so much worse, from the fact that the authorities have not taken any steps for the punishment of the guilty parties, that I have thought it best to call your attention officially to the matter. At the time those poor fellows were being killed, the President of the State was quietly sitting in the cuartel, from which the officers and soldiers were going out to commit the bloody deeds. The commander of the troops, who is the brother of the President, was informed by the murderers of their intentions; but he took no active measures to prevent the commission of the crime. In consequence of this it will appear to those brutal officers and soldiers that they can kill Americans (as they consider those officers) with impunity, and I think the case should be brought to the notice of the national government by some one.

On the 5th instant a Spanish steamer arrived here from Santa Martha. There were on board three of the crew of the Rayo, and I thought it necessary to go on board and request them not to come on shore, or they might have been murdered. We have heard nothing from Santa Martha since this affair. The Rayo drifted from her moorings during a squall a few nights since, and brought up alongside of a coral reef. Although she received no immediate damage, it is my opinion she will never leave there.

The day before yesterday we received a mail from the interior; but these were only late dates from Honda, (August 29,) the correspondence, &c., from Bogota being from the month of May.

We have no later news from the United States since my last. There are rumors of further troubles at Barranquilla; but there is no reliable news from there.

I remain, yours, very truly,

AUG. S. HANABERG.

General PETER J. SULLIVAN,
Minister Resident Bogota, United States of Colombia.

Mr. Hanaberg to Mr. Sullivan.

No. 19.]

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Carthagena, United States of Colombia, September 14, 1867.

SIR: In my unofficial letter under date of the 2d ultimo, I informed you of the disgraceful attack upon four of the late officers of the steamer Rayo by a mob composed principally of the officers and soldiers of the garrison of this city, and of the brutal murder of Messrs. George A. Borchart and J. W. Murdaugh, and the serious wounding of T. L. Dornin, natives of the United States, who were at the time employed as officers of the Colombian steamer Colombia. As I had repeatedly expressed my opinion to those officers as well as to the authorities of this State, that the former having taking service under this government and an active part in the civil war in the State of Magdalena, as they were at the time, still in the Colombian service, I did not consider it my duty to take any official steps in regard to the affair. Although I applied to the President of the State, after the murder of the two officers, requiring him to afford protection to the other two, that they might leave the city, and also applied for the bodies of the two murdered persons, and attended to their burial, I did so unofficially. Nevertheless it is provoking and alarming to find that neither the local authorities nor the agents of the national government have taken any steps in this matter. Not only was there no protection afforded to these officers of the national government, when it was known that their lives were threatened, but since their murder, when, after going through the form of a judicial investigation, it has been impossible to prevent its appearing who were the principal assassins, no one has been arrested, and those assassins continue in the command of the national forces garrisoning this city. They not only killed those poor men whom they speak of as Americans, but robbed their dead bodies of everything of value which was found upon them, even to their clothing.

Besides being the bearers of official documents from the government of the State of Magdalena, two of those officers brought private letters from General Santos Gutierrez, the national President elect, recommending them to the protection of the President of the State of Bolivar; these letters were handed to his excellency the morning after the murder of one of the persons recommended, and were covered with the blood of the other.

In consideration of this criminal indifference on the part of the government of the State, I have thought it proper to state the case officially to you, and I have also sent a full account of the affair to the Department of State.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

AUG S. HANABERG,
United States Consul.

General PETER J. SULLIVAN,
U. S. Minister Resident, Bogota, United States of Colombia.

F.

Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Hanaberg.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, October 12, 1867.

SIR: Your letter of the 2d, and two of the 14th ultimo, detailing the late inhuman murder of American citizens at Carthagena, have been but recently received.

That you might see with what diligence and paternal care our government watches over the lives and property of its people both at home and abroad, I inclose herewith copies of correspondence had between myself and the Colombian government on this unlawful and cruel affair.

You will be careful in your deportment and expressions to and of the people of Carthagena on the subject to which this correspondence relates, and use your best endeavors to preserve the friendly relations that now happily exist between the government of Colombia and ours.

You will proceed at once to fully investigate the cause and mode of the assassination of George A. Borchart and I. W. Murdaugh, and the assault upon and wounding of T. L. Dornin, mentioned in your said letters, and duly report the result to our government.

These men having been fraudulently decoyed from their native land, have not lost their character or rights as American citizens. It may be a question whether that right did not become dormant while they were in the actual service of the Colombian government? Under the circumstances of the case, I think not; but of this hereafter.

To enable you to take testimony in this case without fear or intimidation, you will order to your aid the commander of any United States war ship or steamer at Colon, and retain him with his command at Carthagena until your task is well finished, or until you can safely do without him.

You will report to me from time to time the course of events in this matter.

I remain, sir, with great respect, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

AUGUSTUS S. HANABERG, Esq.,
U. S. Consul at Carthagena, United States of Colombia.

H.

Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Smith.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, October 12, 1867.

SIR: That you might see with what diligence and paternal care our government watches over the lives and property of its people, both at home and abroad, I inclose herewith copies of correspondence had between the Colombian government and myself, on the subject of the irregular shipment of American citizens in the steamer R. R. Cuyler, at New York, by the Colombian government, and the subsequent abuse of all, and murder of some, of these men at Carthagena.

What may yet grow out of this affair I cannot now clearly see. The Colombian government, no matter how well inclined, is almost powerless to redress these grievances, or to afford sufficient security against a repetition of them. But I shall take good care that the name of an American citizen shall be respected throughout Colombia, and that the lives and property of our fellow-citizens shall be protected in the future against unlawful violence and savage barbarism.

That there exists a premeditated scheme of heretofore baffled and designing men along the coast of Colombia, to murder and rob our people residing or sojourning among them, and provoke hostilities between our government and this, I firmly believe, and in order to examine into and frustrate it, if in existence, you will repair, without delay, to Mr. Robinson, our vice-consul at Colon, and consult with him on the subject, and report the result to me.

I have, as you are aware, great confidence in your sound discretion and ripe judgment. Mr. Robinson you will find to be a discreet, intelligent, and faithful officer, on whose judgment, in these matters, you can safely rely, and to whom you will promptly make known the whole contents of this and accompanying dispatches.

On reflection, I think that Mr. Robinson and yourself had better order any of our men-of-war at Colon to go immediately to the aid of our consul at Carthagena, who is ordered to take testimony in and report upon said assaults and murders in Carthagena. You will promptly report to me on the subject of this note.

I remain, dear general, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

U. S. Consul at Panama, U. S. C.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have duly received your note announcing the arrival at Baranquilla of the President elect of Colombia and the Brazilian minister, and the attention paid to them at that place. Both of these gentlemen are now in Bogota, and have paid their respects to me.

That you may perceive the watchfulness of our government over the lives and interests of its citizens in this country, I inclose, herewith, copies of correspondence had between the Colombian government and myself, on the subject of the late inhuman murder of Americans at Carthagena.

I am sure I need hardly caution you to be very careful in your language to and of the people of this country on the subject to which these papers relate. I should not be astonished if there was a conspiracy on the coast to murder and rob more of our people who may happen to be among them.

I am, dear colonel, with great respect, your obedient servant,

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: Your dispatch of the 16th of September, No. 25, has been received. It is accompanied by an interesting correspondence which you recently had with Mr. Hanaberg, United States consul at Carthagena, on a rumor that a citizen of the United States had been assassinated at Rio Hacha, and also concerning the case of the persons, lately citizens of the United States, who had enlisted in the Colombian service on board the Colombian steamer El Rayo. The reported assassination having proved to be without foundation, and the case of the persons enlisted on the steamer El Rayo having been already considered, I do not find it necessary to enlarge at the present time upon either of those matters.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

SIR: In my No. 14 I directed your attention to the painful event in which George A. Borchart and J. W. Murdaugh were assailed and murdered by a mob at Carthage on the 1st of September last. I instructed you to address yourself to the President of Colombia and, upon the grounds then mentioned, to urge a prompt and thorough investigation of the transaction, to the end that the guilty parties may be brought to condign punishment, and that indemnities, as far as possible, may be awarded to the families of the individuals who were barbarously slain.

Recent advices from Sabanilla tend to confirm with aggravation all the details which had before been received. It becomes my duty, therefore, to instruct you to press the subject upon the early attention of the Colombian government with all the vigor and energy that shall be consistent with diplomatic propriety and with the sincere friendship which this government desires to cultivate for the republic of Colombia.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 3, 1867.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of October 12th, No. 33. It reports to me the manner in which you have executed the instructions of this department, Nos. 3, 5, and 8. Your proceedings in that respect are entirely approved. It appears from your preceding dispatch that you anticipated the instructions contained in my dispatch No. 14, of September 25, to ask from the Colombian government an investigation and redress for the outrage and murder that were committed upon citizens of the United States, who were officers in the Colombian national service, by Colombian troops, with the alleged connivance of their officers, in the city of Carthage. Your proceedings in this matter also are approved and commended. I do not doubt that, in conformity with the last-mentioned instruction, you will have made before this time a supplementary representation to the Colombian government asking suitable indemnities in behalf of the families of the persons murdered, as well as in behalf of the survivors of the outrage.

I have laid before the President the answer which Mr. Martin, minister for foreign relations, gave to your representations, as well as your reply to that minister. You are now authorized to say that the decision which the Colombian government has made upon the subject is regarded by the President with sincere and unreserved satisfaction. I do not allow myself to doubt for a moment that Mr. Martin's assurances will be carried into full effect.

My instruction will have already apprised you that this government has accepted with entire satisfaction the explanations which the government of Colombia was pleased to make of the unfortunate transaction of the fraudulent purchase and equipment of the R. R. Cuyler. Should it be necessary, you will renew the expressions of our satisfaction in that respect.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

SIR: I have the honor to inform you that vast beds of cannel coal have been discovered about forty miles back of Rio Hacha, and opposite to, and to the windward of, Saint Thomas. Rio Hacha is, I think, the nearest point of land to Saint Thomas. Between those coal beds and the sea the land is level and hard, along which a railway for conveying this coal to the Atlantic can readily and cheaply be made.

Ships can run at all seasons of the year, without interruption from adverse winds, from Saint Thomas to this point, for coal.

These facts I have learned from a highly accomplished and respectable English civil engineer who has been in Colombia for the last thirty years, and who has surveyed and mapped the said coal beds. He says this coal is the best in the world.

Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Seward.

No. 49.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, January 20, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith copies (A and B) of correspondence had between the Colombian government and myself on the subject of the Panama commercial war tax.

The international law, as quoted by Secretary Martin, is equitable and just, but, in my opinion, does not well apply to the case at issue. This law presupposes that the native business men of any civilized country exceed in numbers the foreigners who may reside and do business in it. In the State of Panama all the merchants are, I believe, foreigners, principally citizens of the United States, and are to bear the whole of whatever taxation which every successful revolutionist may choose to levy upon them to aid him in his, sometimes, unlawful purposes.

While the government of Panama was trying to sustain one class of revolutionists the government of Bolivar was endeavoring to uphold another, and levied very heavy contributions on foreign merchants for that purpose. Every three or four years this practice has been ruinously pursued by lawless persons in Colombia, and it is high time that it should, so far as our people doing business here are concerned, in some way or other, be restrained.

As there have been no claims as yet presented through me to this government, founded upon said decrees or seizures, and as there is plenty of time to review this subject and fix upon a reasonable rule in the case by which I shall be governed, I have thought it better to submit the matter for the President's consideration and yours, than for myself to reply to Secretary Martin's said answer.

His answer is not altogether a very unfavorable one.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Bogota, August 27, 1867.

SIR: I have to inclose to your excellency a copy of instructions addressed to me on June 13, 1867, by the honorable Secretary of State of the United States of America, on the subject of the rights and obligations of citizens of the United States of America residing in the United States of Colombia.

Having previously read these instructions to your excellency, I now beg leave to entreat you to receive with favor the wisdom and good intentions which they impart towards your country; and believe me to be, sir, your excellency's most obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

His Excellency Señor Doctor CARLOS MARTIN,

Secretary of the Interior and Foreign Relations U. S. C.

Señor Martin to Mr. Sullivan.

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogota, December 3, 1867.

MR. MINISTER: I had the honor duly to receive the communication of your honor dated the 27th of last August, marked No. 32, and inclosing the instructions issued on the 13th of last June by the department of the United States of America to your honor, as resident minister to my government, and to the different American consuls and commercial agents in the Colombian Union.

As these instructions refer to certain acts of the government of the sovereign State of Panama, the executive has had to wait for official and detailed information of said proceedings before handing to your honor the reply which I herewith have the honor to address to you to-day. At the same time as I give this answer permit me to make a short résumé of the occurrences which have given rise to the claims made by certain North American citizens before the Department of State at Washington, so as to be able to duly appreciate the justice of said claims and the spirit of the instructions referred to, which were the result of said claims.

The 24th of October, 1866, the legislative assembly of the sovereign State of Panama, issued the seventeenth law granting certain authorization to the executive of the State; in therein is found, in the second paragraph of the first article, that which authorizes the raising, to double the value in the present year the commercial contributions, perueria, &c.; and the third paragraph of the same article first, which allows the State executive to anticipate the collection of the rents and contributions of the State, so as to be prepared for any eventuality which might produce the derangement of public order, the executive of Panama issued the decrees of the 11th of April and 24th of May last, making use of the authorities granted by said law seventeenth of the State.

These decrees were matter for the consideration of the foreign consuls residing on the isthmus when they replied on the 27th of May last to a circular note of the 25th of the same which was addressed to them to inform them that, as General Mosquera had dissolved the national congress, refused to recognize sundry acts of said body, and declared the republic in a state of war, the President of Panama would not admit any force which might be sent by him to the isthmus so long as the situation which then threatened the country might last.

Mr. Francis W. Rice, consul of the United States of America, in giving with his colleagues the above mentioned reply of the 27th of May, manifested that such decrees of the government of Panama were contrary to public treaties and to the law practice of nations.

In view of these opinions, which were not accepted by the President of Panama, he, the President, hastened to call a meeting of various foreigners, so as to agree with them upon some measure which might replace that which they looked upon as prejudicial to their interests; but the arrangement which was sought by the President of Panama in the civilizing spirit of conciliation could not be arrived at, and he was obliged to order that his previous disposition should be carried into effect.

Afterwards he accepted a proposition which was made to him, that the quarter which commenced on the 1st of June should be paid in advance, reserving to himself the right to raise the contribution to the limits of the said seventeenth law in case of need, after temporarily suspending the execution of said decrees.

This is the truth of the circumstances, and on such acts, supported by trustworthy documents in possession of the national executive, do I now proceed to examine the claims referred to, and to take into consideration the instructions which your honor has been pleased to pass me a legalized copy of.

This appreciation would appear useless in consequence of the suspension of the execution of the executive decrees of the government of Panama issued in compliance with a law of the assembly; but as this is a precedent which may in future cause new questions, the federal executive thinks it might be examined.

The seventeenth law of the sovereign State of Panama, and the decrees of the 11th of April and 24th of May last, in the execution of said law, are not contrary to the national constitution, which allows the States to establish contribution to provide for the expenses, so long as the limit set down in the eighth article of our fundamental law is not exceeded.

The treaty of amity, navigation, and commerce, existing between the two countries, was not violated in any way by said acts, there not being any stipulation exempting the citizens of North America from the payment of ordinary contributions of the class now under discussion.

Quite on the contrary, in the third article it is stipulated that the citizens of either of the contracting countries may reside and trade in the territory of the other, enjoying the same rights, privileges, and exemptions as the natives, but subject to the laws, decrees, and usages to which native citizens are subject.

There is now only to inquire if these acts of the government of Panama are contrary to the general stipulations of international law. The general rule is saving only when restrictions are imposed by public treaties, that foreign inhabitants have to bear the burden which the laws impose upon the citizens without any other condition than that of the burden of services; and obligations of this description comprise equally citizens and foreigners.

In accordance with the above prescriptions of international law, the Colombian law of the 21st of June, 1866, defining the condition of foreigners, their rights and obligations, concedes to domiciled foreigners the same guarantees and rights as the Colombians in their persons and property, saving likewise the stipulations of public treaties.

And these prescriptions of international law, which are ratified in the Colombian law, are the expression of a very just obligation. If foreigners come to our country for their convenience, under the protection of our laws, it is natural that if the progress of the country should require it, as actually happened, for the preservation of public order and the support of the authorities, and if this progress should reach them in their private affairs, that they should lend their aid and contribute in a just and equal measure to the preservation of public order, and the support of these authorities who protect them.

This doctrine, wholly equitable, just, and in accordance with international law, is that which is accepted and sustained by the government of the Union in cases of the class to which I have referred.

The instructions which your honor has been pleased to communicate to me, appear to result from a report somewhat partial, and it is on that account, without doubt, that the American government, considering said contributions, destined for war purposes, judged that the treaty between the two countries, as likewise the Colombian constitution and international law, were a just support to the claims. Proceeding on these premises, his excellency Mr. Seward, the Secretary of State's said instructions, that the citizens of the United States of America, resident in Panama, were to refuse the payment of said contributions, except under protest, and his excellency the Secretary of State adds, that after it is fully known the character of the conflict, his government will determine upon the question that might be presented.

Evidently the instructions alluded to were dictated by a spirit of foresight and benevolence for this government, which is appreciated in a high degree by the President; but having been issued under suppositions distinct from the actual facts, and from reports which attributed to the acts of the government of Panama motives and irregular tendencies which did not exist, the national government considers that it ought to place said acts in their proper light, so that the minister, being better informed, may manifest to his government the true facts, that there may be no deception as to the legality of the action of the Panama government with reference to the decrees about the commercial contribution.

The executive considered just the instructions issued by his excellency the Secretary of State of the United States of America with respect to the observance of certain blockades. The federal government, as soon as it received advice of the blockade of the port of Santa Martha, disapproved in the most explicit manner of said acts, in consequence of its having been decreed by incompetent authorities to decree and carry into effect, and for other motives. Timely orders were given in consequence of the blockade, and the necessary measures taken that said orders should be obeyed, as they were accordingly.

Having terminated the reply which the instructions communicated by your honor to my department required, I have the honor to subscribe myself General Sullivan's obedient and faithful servant,

C. MARTIN.

SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith the message of President Santos Acosta to the Colombian congress. I hope that by the next mail I will be able to send you the answer of this government to my note demanding suitable indemnities in behalf of the families of Borchart and Murdaugh, murdered at Carthagena, on the 1st of September last, as well as on behalf of the two survivors of that barbarous outrage.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

Message of the President of the United States of Colombia to the Constitutional Congress of 1868.

CITIZEN SENATORS AND REPRESENTATIVES: I comply with my duty in reporting to you the course of events since the close of the last session of congress, and the condition of affairs in the republic during my administration; but first let me congratulate you and the country on your meeting this day. The assembly of the federal congress at the time fixed by the constitution is one of the most auspicious events in the ordinary life of representative countries, for it announces order and regularity in the system of government, promises satisfaction to the political wants of society, offers light to the rulers in public affairs, and places the responsibility for everything upon those who are charged with supreme command.

I have discharged the duties imposed upon me by Providence and the people of Colombia, to the best of my ability, and with the best intentions.

Now that peace is restored throughout the republic by the defeat of the rebels in Tolima, the federal government will continue quietly in the path traced by the constitution. All branches of the government are working well, and hopes are entertained that they will not again be disturbed by internal commotion.

Tolima became quiet soon after the disappearance of its governor, who took the part of the dictator who wished to subjugate the country. After the national victories in that State the federal forces were withdrawn and the State organization was continued without molestation in any way. Elections were held for a convention which formed a constitution, a governor was elected, and members to the federal congress. But this was scarcely done when opposition arose to the new government, particularly in the southern part of the State. These were hardly suppressed when other revolts broke out, and even now there are many enemies of the present government in the State.

Before I received the new constitution of Tolima, I heard of new revolts. The provisional governor informed me that the State was invaded by armed bands from Canea, and asked for national aid to oppose them.

I have had no official intercourse with the new government, because existing laws do not justify it. The law of the 16th of April, on public order, allows the federal government to acknowledge a new government in a State where rebellion exists only under two circumstances: where there is a complete submission of the insurgents and a return to the old order of things; and where the new government is organized in conformity to article 8, section 1, of the national constitution. This is the plain meaning of that law, although political cliques may give it a different interpretation. Neither of these circumstances have occurred in the new government of Tolima. For these reasons I leave the new government to be confirmed by the congress which is about to assemble.

Next to my care for domestic interests, my solicitude has been to keep up friendly relations with foreign powers, and fortunately this has been attained. Though this state of things is chiefly due to the frankness, honesty, and loyalty of my government, yet the just and benevolent conduct of the distinguished diplomatists accredited to this country has greatly contributed to it. At no former time has our relations with other governments been more cordial. From the United States of America we have recently received touching testimonials of regard.

Besides the foreign ministers that were with us at the last session of congress, we have an envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary from the empire of Brazil, and a minister resident from the American Union lately arrived.

I have thought proper to send a distinguished Colombian as first class minister to Venezuela, to settle our boundary question, tariff regulations between the two nations, and the navigation of common rivers. The mission promises satisfactory results, and I hope it will be confirmed by the senate.

I have not accredited ministers to other countries of America and Europe, because the term of my office expires so soon, I thought it would be better to leave that duty to my successor. I have advised Colombian consuls abroad to act for the legations at their respective posts.

The federal courts have administered justice regularly, and the public department has fully discharged its legal duties.

A national Colombian university was created by the last congress, and the executive power has endeavored to carry out the decrees in the manner you will find detailed in the official paper. This institution, of so much promise to the country, will be organized during the present month. If you will give it the protection it deserves it will be an honor to the government and to the country.

I have adopted other measures to encourage public instruction, to disseminate the useful arts through the country, and to establish literary and scientific relations with societies in other countries. The details of these you will find in the report of the proper department.

The crisis through which the republic has just passed, and its unsettled state for the last few months, disturbed the collection of the revenue and of course the returns have been lessened; but the constant, calm, and energetic action of the public officials begins to restore the normal condition of imports, so important to national existence. The returns for the last fiscal year are as follows:

Custom-house returns	$1, 027, 554, 700
From salines	826, 470, 475
National property	36, 808, 155
From the Panama railroad to the 16th of August last.....	257, 540, 910
Total	2, 148, 374, 240
There is a deficit in coinage cost of.....	$5, 958, 811
In mail service	21, 910, 240
Total	27, 869, 231
Leaving a net profit of.....	2, 120, 505, 009

I recommend to your notice the suggestions that will be made to you by the proper secretary, in regard to the prohibition of foreign salt, to the great injury of our own salines.

In the Panama railroad account you will find the amount received by the last administration, which ought to go to the payment of our foreign debt. The revenues have not been sufficient for the expenses of my administration. Very little has been derived from the custom-houses. But for the million derived from the railroad the government could not have been sustained during its troubles.

During the six months from the 1st of June to the 31st of December last, the receipts were $648,157, and the expenses, $639,378.

I also send to the house of representatives a special message with my estimates of receipts and expenses for the coming year. I have endeavored to practice the strictest economy since the beginning of my administration, and in this view it will be seen that my estimates for the next year reduce the government expenses more than a million of dollars.

In the report of the secretary of the treasury and national credit, you will find the detail of our home and foreign debt, and the result of the redemption of church property.

I regret that, for reasons known to you I cannot give the expenses of last year. The estimates have been incorrect since 1859. Order and subordination of the Colombian civic guard are improving; all its members are giving proof of their courage and loyalty.

As the country is now in peace, and war no longer threatens, I have reduced the army by two thousand men.

The reports of the different departments will furnish detailed accounts of their respective branches of the public administration.

In conclusion, I must say that the glorious deeds of last year have restored our national institutions, the country is once more at peace, and the people breathe the spirit of confidence. The laws are now faithfully observed and federal order reigns in the republic. Though this is not perfect prosperity, it promises the dawn of a better day.

May Providence again smile upon our people, and may its representatives approve of my acts.

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Carthagena, United States of Colombia, January 14, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to remit you herewith a translated copy of the testimony of Mr. Manuel A. Oronoz, before the provincial court, in relation to the occurrences of the 1st of September last, which testimony was only called for on the 31st of December. This copy of the testimony was furnished to me by the President of the State at my request.

I also send you a copy of the Gaceta de Bolivar, No. 532, which contains the report of the secretary general of the State to the general government in relation to the same occurrences, and accompanying the same some remarks of my own in reference to some of the contents of said report.

It may be proper that these remarks should be made public, the same as the report, but this could only be done by communicating them to the authorities of the State, which might lead to a controversy with the government, for which I have neither the time nor disposition.

In the same official paper will be found the report of the judge as to the state of the question before the court encharged with the investigation.

The testimony which has been requested from Santa Martha, as therein referred to, is that of Mr. Dornin, who returned to the United States some three months since.

I was informed a few days since that the carpenter, Franco, one of the persons accused of the murder of Mr. Borchart, was seen and spoken to by the person who informed me, at work at his trade in the street. I mentioned the circumstance to the President of the State in a private interview, when his excellency assured me that such could not have been the case, as this man was confined in the public hospital, from which he could not go out except by permission of the authorities, which permission had not been given.

I have no doubt it is true, however, as also that the other accused persons are allowed to leave the hospital, as has been reported to me, notwithstanding his excellency may not be aware of the fact.

The President also informed me that the national troops which had formed the escort of General Mosquera as far as Panama were to return to the capital instead of remaining in this city, as had been promised.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

AUG. S. HANABERG,
United States Consul.

General PETER J. SULLIVAN,
United States Minister, Bogota.

Translation of the testimony of Manuel A. Oronoz before the provincial court.

In Carthagena the thirty-first of December, one thousand eight hundred and sixty-seven, in which appeared Mr. Manuel Anto. Oronoz, the judge of the province proceeded to receive his oath, previously reading the conducent articles of the penal code, under which charge he promised to tell the truth as to what he knows and may be asked.

Questioned as to his name and surname, age, nationality, residence, profession, and state, he answered: named as is written; forty years of age; native of Puerto Cabello, Venezuela; resident of this place; merchant, and married.

Questioned that he should say what he knows or is aware of in relation to the occurrences which took place the 1st of September of the present year, at 7 o'clock at night, in the building Hotel Bolivar, and which resulted in the death of an American officer of the steamer Rayo, Geo. A. Borchart, he answered: that effectually on the 1st of September mentioned, in the evening, the deponent was in the Hotel Bolivar, as the place had been and is his dwelling-place, and that he cannot deny that he was an actual witness of the horrible scandal which in the end resulted in the death of the North American and a companion also of Borchart; that of the group or multitude of people that was in the hotel that night he knew but very few persons, except a young man, Peñaranda, who may justly be called the general promoter and instigator of the disgraceful occurrences of that night; that he also saw there Mr. Miguel Céspedes, second commander of the battalion rejenerador, Mr. Vicente Barrios, an officer of the same force, and a carpenter named Franco; that at the present moment he does not remember, as he has already said, the name of any of the crowd, because the greater part being unknown to the deponent, it would require time to make reminiscences; that he does not deny, as he said in the beginning, that he was in the hotel on the night of the 1st of September; but he only remained there until the assassins, assisted by armed soldiers of the battalion before mentioned, fell upon Borchart; that during this act, so horrible and repugnant to the deponent, he left the house, leaving therein of the persons who resided there, only the house-maid, Mrs. Antonia Gallardo, and a servant, called Juan; that at about 11 o'clock at night he returned to his lodgings and found all in silence, but from this moment he employed himself with Colonel Perea and the proprietor of the hotel in the means of saving and embarking of Mr. Dornin, who was wounded, and his companion Smith, who were delivered by the deponent and the two persons previously mentioned, to the American consul, at 1 o'clock at night; which is what he recollects of the occurrences of the 1st of September mentioned.

Questioned, who are the assassins who fell upon Borchart as stated by the deponent in his previous answer, assuring that he was an actual witness, and did not leave the house until after the death of Borchart was consummated, as well as the wounding of Dornin, he answered: That in a crowd of so many persons who disputed the means of entrance to the room in which the person who was the victim had taken refuge, and the greater part of those composing the mob being unknown to him, he cannot precisely state who were the authors of the crime. When, even had the deponent been in the midst of the crowd who killed Mr. Borchart, could he say with certainty who struck him first or who afterwards? Questioned, if the deponent knows who were the first who entered the hotel before the concurrence became numerous, and who were the first to attack the American officers, he answered: to the first, that he did not know those who came in at the commencement, and if there was any one known to the deponent he does not remember at present; to the second part, that from this former answer it may be understood that the deponent, incapable of telling falsehoods, cannot conscientiously say who killed Mr. Borchart or who wounded Mr. Dornin.

Questioned, what other persons can give an account of the occurrences which are being investigated, he answered that in the first place Mrs. Antonia Gallarda, who can describe the whole of the terrible drama if she has a good memory; in the second, a servant of the hotel called Juan, whom he has already mentioned; in the third, Mr. Nicolas Penaranda; and in the fourth, the same proprietor of the hotel, Mr. Marcos Isaacs; with which was concluded the examination, and having been read to the deponent he affirmed and ratified it, signing after the judge and before me, the subscriber, secretary.

Report of Eusebio Baena, secretary general of the State of Bolivar, to the secretary of the interior and foreign relations of the federal government.

CARTAJENA, November 14, 1867.

By the mail of the 29th ultimo, I announced to you, by order of the President, that I would send you a circumstantial and authentic account of the lamentable events of the 1st of September last. This has not been done, because it was supposed the occurrences were of no international importance; but as the minister resident of the United States of North America has unjustly blamed the State authorities for them, I will make the report in full, to show the inaccuracy of the assertions made by the respectable minister resident.

On the 27th of June last, Cartajena Bay was the theater of a horrid crime. Political events in the republic prevented its punishment. Its perpetrators were adventurers of the worst character.

The national war steamer Colombia was anchored in the bay. On board were Colonel Flores, Purser Granados, Surgeon Revollo, Ensign Arosemena, Lieutenant Rodriguez, (with eight men,) and some American sailors. Mr. W. Bradford, the American captain, was ashore. Near the Colombia was anchored the steamer Rayo, with an American crew of fifty-five men under the command of Captain E. G. Read. On the 17th of June, at eleven o'clock at night, the crew of the Rayo, commanded by Read, went on board the Colombia, after shooting the sentry, and with rifles and revolvers began shooting in every direction. Four men sprang into the water, to escape certain death; two of them were drowned, and the other two swam two miles to land.

The aggressors then seized the Colombia and forced the pilot to steer out of the bay. This pilot was brought on board the Rayo under the pretext to take Mr. Miguel Vengoechea, jr., and his baggage ashore. The vessel stopped at the castle of Boca Chica and took in coal from bunkers that were broken open. It was bound for Santa Martha.

Early the next morning, far out at sea, not wishing to murder the Colombians on board, Vengoechea put them in an open boat, without rudder, oars, or sails, and sent them adrift, without bread or water. These men were Flores, Rodriguez, Revollo, Granados, and Arosemena, with four common soldiers. Thanks to the wind and current, they reached land safely.

On the morning of the 28th, as soon as the facts were known, the indignation of the people of Cartagena was immense, and the hate of the officers of the Rayo is still intense, though many months have elapsed. Only four days previous, part of the crew took the Italian Star, which had been seized by the Colombia for a transport, though not used, because it grounded in beating out of port.

Before this was done, gunpowder was secreted in the steamer Rayo, so that if the fires were lit in the vessel, an explosion would have occurred, to the destruction of the steamer and contiguous vessels.

This abduction of the Colombia, though effected without bloodshed, caused general indignation. It was done by officers of a friendly vessel, by perfidy and assassination. The only motive was to get a few thousand dollars, and political passions had nothing to do with the act.

Now this crime gave rise to the events of the 1st of September, our main subject.

On Sunday, the 1st of September, at half past five in the afternoon, the royal mail steamer entered the bay, having on board Borchart and Murdaugh, the men who were afterward murdered. Two Americans, late officers of the Rayo, were also on board. Nobody expected them, and therefore the authorities could not prevent what occurred two hours afterwards. It may also be well to state that two residents of this city, Mr. Elói Porto and Mr. Felipe S. Paz, came as passengers on the English steamer, and warned Borchart, Murdaugh, Dornin, and Smith not to come ashore, as the inhabitants were incensed against them for their past conduct. Ramon S. Sanchez, an American, also advised them not to land. They said they would go armed, to defend themselves; and they then got drunk before they put foot on the custom-house wharf.

At seven o'clock they landed, fully armed, as they had been told that they would be attacked. The news of their arrival had already been circulated, and they were expected at the landing.

Instead of going to the authorities for protection, all except one went to the Bolívar Hotel; the one went to the club-house. As they entered the hotel, boasting that they were armed, Mr. Peñaranda circulated the report that Borchart, Dornin, and Smith had tried to kill General Mendoza Llanos, who was stopping at the hotel, and had sworn to take the lives of other State officers, in revenge for the defeat on the Magdalena, on the 1st of July.

This was believed, because David Pereira, governor of the State of Magdalena, had been murdered only fifteen days before, by a band of ruffians at Baranquilla. Commander Cespedes and Captain Barrios then went to the hotel to learn the truth of the report. On reaching there, they found a crowd of two hundred persons, with a few idle soldiers among them. As soon as Cespedes and Barrios arrived the row began by an attack on them by the ex-officers of the Rayo. Revolvers were freely used, and Barrios was slightly wounded. No Americans were hurt. The combat was stopped by the fortunate intervention of Mr. Peñaredenda and others.

When Cespedes and Barrios had left the hotel, the mob broke in, and killed Borchart in his hiding place.

All this was done so suddenly, that the governor of the province, with some troops, could only save the lives of Smith and Dornin, who were wounded. Borchart was already dead.

At the beginning of the fight the President of the State ordered officers to be ready in case of any difficulty; but they were too late to do much good.

While this was going on at the Bolívar Hotel, a party of six or eight men went into the club-house and murdered Murdaugh; by the time the forces got there the murderers were gone.

This is the true account of the affair.

The district alcalde instituted an examination that very night.

The lives of Smith and Dornin were saved by the public authorities, and not by Mrs. Gallardo and Mr. Peñaredenda, as the American consul states.

Between nine and ten at night the consul asked assistance from the President of the State to put Dornin and Smith on board, and he was furnished with a squad of soldiers for that purpose. They were taken from the Bolívar Hotel about midnight, and put on board the royal mail steamer.

In a letter to the governor, Dornin has falsely stated that the American and English consuls asked the President to save the lives of the two men, and he agreed to do so, provided the consuls would give their word of honor to send them off in the steamer Tyne.

Mr. Hanaberg called on the President at ten o'clock, after the murders had been committed, and the mob had scattered. If what Dornin said had been true, the consul would have mentioned it in his note to the minister resident. Neither is it true that the proprietor of the hotel asked the President for a guard to protect his establishment.

In his deposition, the hotel-keeper says nothing of what Dornin asserted to be true.

Dornin confesses that he and Borchart tried to get arms at Logan's before they went to the hotel, and that they passed through a crowd without being disturbed. Why did they not go to the authorities, instead of preparing to defend themselves?

Dornin pretends to give the names of those who attacked them, when he does not know Cespedes, Barrios, nor Vives.

Mrs. Gallardo and Mr. Peñaredenda, eye-witnesses, who could have no inducement to prevaricate, state in their depositions that Borchart was killed by two soldiers, after Cespedes had left the hotel. The witnesses saw Borchart killed, and Dornin was not present. Which must we believe?

Dornin says Borchart's body was mutilated; the medical autopsy does not corroborate it; there were two wounds upon it from fire-arms, and one slight cut. Instigated by the declared enemies of the government of Bolivar, Dornin makes a declaration that is not worth the contradiction. His whole story is prompted by malevolence and the desire of revenge.

You will see from accompanying papers, that a due judicial investigation of the whole affair has been made by the proper authorities.

Commander Cespedes, Captain Barrios, and Lieutenant Marquez have been discharged from the service, and are now in prison; so is Nicolas Franco. This shows the determination of the State government to punish the offenders.

I also send you No. 522 of the official paper, containing the correspondence with the American consul on the subject of the events of the 1st of September, and if I get the report of the trial I will also forward it. (It was received and sent.)

In conclusion, I solemnly protest against the imputation upon the government of Bolivar of the crimes of the 1st of September. This is necessary, not for the Bolivians who know the proverbial honesty of their rulers, but for the people of other States, who are imposed upon by the anonymous publications in some of the Bogota papers, where the people are still angry with the people of Bolivar for their conduct in the crisis of April and August last.

I have not commented on the note of the governor of Magdalena to the President of the Union, in relation to the first events here mentioned, because it would make this communication too long. No one can tell why the governor of that State ventured to give information not asked for, and about occurrences of which he knew nothing, and which, of course, he could not properly appreciate.

EUENIO BAENA.

C.

Remarks in relation to some of the contents of the communication of the secretary general of the State of Bolivia to the secretary of the interior and foreign relations of the national government, in reference to the occurrences of the 1st of September last.

1. It is here stated that two men of the crew of the steamer Colombia were drowned in making their escape from that vessel at the time she was seized by the officers and crew of the Rayo. I doubt if this was the case, for the following reason: On that occasion a man swam on board of an American brig lying in the harbor, and stated that himself and a companion had jumped overboard from the Colombia, and as his companion had not reached the same brig he supposed he had been drowned, but he may have reached the shore, which was not more than a quarter of a mile distant.

2. There appears to be no doubt but that the furnaces of the Rayo were found to be charged with powder and combustibles a few days after she was abandoned by her officers and crew, but Commander Read and several of the officers have most emphatically denied that either themselves or any of the officers of that vessel had any knowledge of anything of the kind, and intimate that it must have been done after they left the vessel.

3. The assertion that the officers and crew of the Rayo were induced to take off the Colombia by the offer of several thousand dollars for so doing, is evidently false, as it has been most emphatically characterized by an impartial foreign official at Santa Martha, who was in a position to know, as he was discharged with the settlement of the claims of those officers and crew against the State of Magdalena.

4. If the four ex-officers of the Rayo came on shore from the royal mail steamer Tyne perfectly armed, as here stated, what necessity was there for their endeavoring to procure arms at Mr. Logan's, as stated in this same communication?

5. The Señor Peñaredenda Transante here mentioned was a secretary or attaché of some kind of General Mendoza Llanes. He was never arrested, or called upon even for his testimony.

6. Commander Cespedes and Captain Barrios went to the hotel from the cuartel with the avowed intention of attacking the officers of the Rayo, as related to me by Mr. Manuel Gomez, (privately,) who was present when Cespedes expressed such intention to Commander Manuel Gonzales Caraso.

7. The statement that the officers of the Rayo presented themselves to the crowd at the hotel in the "attitude of attack," is destitute of truth, as appears from the declarations of Antonio Gallardo and Juan Maria Callero, the only witnesses who have testified in relation to that part of the occurrence.

8. That the party who entered the club and killed Mr. Murdaugh consisted of "six or eight persons," is a most extraordinary assertion. Mr. Juan de Dios Ruiz, who evidently avoided telling half of what he saw, swore that there were more than one hundred, and Dr. del Real and Dr. Juan W. Pombo state that it was a multitude of armed men.

9. There is not the least ground for the statement that the presence of the authorities was the cause of saving the lives of Messrs. Dornin and Smith. According to all testimony on the subject there was no lawful exercise of authority in the premises, neither did the governor present himself until the outrage was terminated by the murder of Mr. Borchart, and the secretion of Messrs. Dornin and Smith, which was done by the mother of the proprietor of the hotel and by the proprietor himself, in such a manner that even the governor himself and his picket of soldiers could not discover them, although they searched the house with that object after the excitement was over, as stated in the testimony of Mr. Marcos Isaacs. Besides, if those officers were rescued by the intervention of the authorities, as it pretended, those authorities should be able to state how, where, and from whom they had rescued them.

10. It is not only Mr. Dornin who states that the body of Mr. Borchart was found to be mutilated. Eye-witnesses have sworn to the fact that they saw the carpenter, Nicholas Franco, striking him with a chisel at the time he was killed.

11. If, as here stated, there were among the two hundred or more persons in the attack at the hotel but a few soldiers who happened to be on the streets, not on duty, the retreat not yet having been called, how is it that the witnesses swear that the crowd was composed principally of soldiers, who were armed with muskets or rifles? There is no doubt that one of the wounds of Mr. Borchart was caused by a ball from a rifle or musket.

I would also remark that the charge having been made that the victims of these outrages were shot at by the soldiers, an examination of the arms and munitions of those soldiers who were outside of the cuartel at the time would have proved the truth or falsity of the charge, and in the first case have discovered the criminals. Why was such an examination not made?

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, February 15, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 14th ultimo, with inclosures, commenting on the report of the secretary general of the State of Bolivar to the secretary for foreign relations of Colombia on the outrage and murder committed on American citizens at Carthagena on the 1st of September last, has been received.

I have again to repeat my thanks for the vigilant and efficient manner in which you have discharged your duty in this memorable matter, and the concise mode in which you have carried out my intimation to you to give me your comments on the testimony and result of these cases.

I shall make use of your said dispatch and most valuable accompaniments in due time.

I am, sir, your most obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, March 22, 1868.

SIR: * * * * *
On the 20th of January last, in conformity with your instructions of September 23, No. 14; October 30, No. 25; December 3, No. 28; I addressed a supplemental note, of which Inclosure A is a copy, to the Colombian government, demanding indemnities in behalf of the families of the American citizens murdered, as well as on behalf of the survivors of the outrage at Carthagena on the 1st of September last.

Secretary Martin had given me to understand, from time to time, that this demand would be settled without any difficulty; * * * but as the present administration was about to go out of office, and finding no communication from you on the subject, it addressed me a note, of which Inclosure B is a translation. * * * As I have resolved to defer my reply to said communication until after the new administration shall have been inaugurated, on the 1st of April instant, I thought I ought to inform you of the progress of this perplexing case up to the present time.

Unless changed by the action of President Johnson, * * * I shall in my said reply hold the Colombian government responsible for said indemnities, believing that this is the desire of our government.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

A.

Mr. Sullivan to Señor Martin.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, January 20, 1868.

SIR: In obedience to instructions from my government, and as supplemental to my note which on the 5th of October last I did myself the honor to address to your excellency on the subject of the murder of George A. Borchart and J. W. Murdaugh, and of the murderous attack upon T. L. Dornin and Lieutenant Smith by a mob of Colombians at Carthagena on the 1st of September last, I now further demand of the Colombian government indemnities in money for the relatives of the persons so murdered, as well as on behalf of the survivors of said outrage.

Colombia owes it to herself and to the high position which she occupies among the family of republics to convince her oldest sister and best friend, the United States of America, that justice and fair play shall ever be the unselfish object of the younger toward the children of the older republic.

I request that your excellency will inform me without delay of the action of your government on this demand.

I have the honor to be, sir, your excellency's obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

His Excellency Señor Doctor CARLOS MARTIN,

Secretary of the Interior and of Foreign Relations, U. S. Colombia.

B.

Señor Carlos Martin to General Sullivan.

OFFICE OF THE INTERIOR AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogota, March 24, 1868.

I have had the honor to receive the note of 20th January last, in which your excellency, in addition to that of the 5th of October last, which referred to offenses committed in Cartagena on 1st of September, 1867, upon the persons of Messrs. G. A. Borchart, J. W. Murdaugh, J. L. Dornin, and J. Smith, demands of the Colombian government indemnities in favor of the families of the two former, who died in consequence of the said offenses, and of the persons of the two latter.

The government has entertained a feeling of regret upon being informed of the contents of the said additional note, because it cannot perceive upon what basis the demand made therein can be supported. On the contrary, it finds clear and precise rules in the law of nations, corroborated by the stipulations of the treaty at present in force between this republic and the United States of America, consonant with the internal laws of Colombia, and which demonstrate that the occasion for the government to concede the indemnification which your excellency solicits has not arrived.

Your excellency is aware that the Colombian government, as soon as it was informed of the crimes committed on the 1st of September, condemned them in the most solemn manner, and gave orders to the attorney general of the nation to carry into effect, by means of the respective agents of the public ministry, the investigation of the facts, with a view to inflict upon the parties responsible for the said crimes the punishment which the law decrees.

Your excellency lost no time, in the note which you were pleased to address to this office on the 11th of October above mentioned, to express your satisfaction with the conduct observed by the Colombian government respecting this affair, considering it a "fresh proof of the friendly spirit of the republic of the United States of Colombia toward the government and people of the United States of America," and your excellency will have seen published in the Diario Oficial, No. 1,055, the note which, in consequence of the said requisition, the attorney general of the nation transmitted to the attorney general of the sovereign State of Bolivar, under date 14th October last.

Neither the recommendation of the federal executive power, nor that of the attorney general of the nation, was, however, necessary. On the very night of the 1st of September the competent authorities of Carthagena proceeded to draw up the procès verbal of the occurrence, visiting the places in which the crimes were committed, and receiving the declaration of such persons as were supposed to have been present.

Subsequently nothing has been omitted, with a view to obtain as complete a procès verbal as possible. The North American consul in Carthagena, who had handed your excellency a report of the said events, as being perfectly acquainted with them, was requested to point out the individuals who might be able to give information upon the subject. In this capital the testimony of Señor Juan Manuel Grau was received and added to that of such other individuals as the public papers have pointed out as having been present at the events of the 1st of September. Finally, Messrs. Miguel Cespedes, Teodoro Yates Marquez, Vicente Barrios, and Nicholas Franco were arrested, as your excellency was informed from this office, as appearing to be responsible for the said crimes, and they still remain in prison at the date of the last advices received by the executive power.

As far as regards the design of this note, the narration of the few preceding facts, already known for the most part to your excellency, and taken from authentic documents, is sufficient, together with a statement of the principles of the law of nations, as regards the matter.

Vattel, treating of the responsibility which may accrue to a nation from the actions of the members who form it, after establishing the principle that whoever maltreats a citizen indirectly offends the state whose duty it is to protect him, and that if a sovereign, who has the power to restrain his subjects within the bounds of justice and peace, permits them to offend a foreign nation or citizen, he aggravates the said nation as much as if he himself had offended it, expresses himself in the following terms:

"Nevertheless, as it is not possible for the best organized state, or the most vigilant and absolute sovereign, to regulate at his pleasure all the actions of his subjects, and maintain them always in the strictest obedience, it would be unjust to impute to the nation or to the sovereign all the faults of the citizen, consequently it cannot generally be said that an offense has been received from the nation because it may have been received from one of its members.

"But if the nation, or its chief, approves or ratifies the action of the citizen, he makes it his own affair, and the offended party must then look upon the nation as the real author of the offense, of which, perhaps, the citizen has been but the instrument.

"And since the latter, the sovereign of the individual who has committed the offense, ought not to permit his subjects to molest or injure those of another, and still less audaciously to offend foreign powers, he must oblige the culpable party to make reparation for the injury or the insult, if it be possible, or to punish him in an exemplary manner, or finally, according to the case and circumstances, deliver him up to the offended state, in order that the latter may do justice.

"The sovereign who refuses to oblige his subject to repair the injury caused, or to punish the culpable party, or finally to deliver him up, makes himself, in some respects, an accomplice in the injury, and responsible for the same."

Mr. Bello, in his treatise on international law, while stating the rights and duties of foreigners, established a doctrine similar to that of Vattel.

The before-mentioned author declares "that the foreigner, as soon as he enters the territory of another nation, contracts the obligation of submitting to the laws and local jurisdiction, and the state offers him the protection of the public authority deposited in the tribunals; so that if the latter should unjustly refuse to hear his complaint, or should do him a manifest injustice, the foreigner may then interpose the authority of his own sovereign, having recourse to the minister of the nation near the government in whose territory he resides, or in order to be heard in judgment or to be indemnified for the injuries he may have received. He adds that the acts of jurisdiction of a nation over the foreigners residing therein, if they are in conformity with its own laws, must be respected by other nations, in virtue of the obligations which every person contracts on entering the territory of a foreign state to submit himself to its laws, and consequently to the regulations which it has established for the administration of justice, and finally from the obligation which the state contracts of observing the said laws as regards the foreigner, he infers that if the state approves, instigates, or tolerates the acts of injustice and violence of its subjects against foreigners, it makes them in reality its own, and makes itself responsible for them as regards other nations."

It is apparent, therefore, that the cases in which a government is responsible for the acts of its subjects executed against foreigners are limited to those in which the said government approves, instigates, or tolerates the said acts, refusing to punish the culprits, or that the latter make good the injuries they have caused. The American legation has not made, nor could it in justice make, against the Colombian government the accusation of having approved, instigated, or tolerated the crimes of the 1st of September.

The contrary has been recognized by your excellency, and is proved by the facts related at the commencement of the present note, as well as by the trial in progress in Carthagena in consequence of the said crimes.

The injured individuals will possess the right to be indemnified for the damages received by the persons who caused them, establishing their claim before the authorities of Colombia, and in accordance with the laws of the republic to which they submit themselves, when they entered the territory of the union.

Equally clear with the statements of the law of nations above cited are, as regards the present case, those of the treaty rights between Colombia and the United States of America.

The treaty in force between the two countries states in the 13th article that the two contracting parties undertake reciprocally to dispense their special protection to the persons and properties of the citizens of each one in the territories, subject to the jurisdiction of the other; but in the same article the manner is determined in which the said protection is to be afforded them, "leaving open and free to them the tribunals of justice, in the same terms as are used and accustomed by the natives or citizens of the country."

Besides, the laws of Colombia do not confer either upon foreigners or citizens the right to claim of the Union indemnification for injuries caused by crimes such as those committed on the 1st of September.

The said right is conferred upon the injured parties against the culprits, and consequently it is from the latter that the indemnification which your excellency claims from the government must be exacted. Besides, the amount of the said indemnifications must be taken into consideration, as a matter of proof and judicial settlement.

The conclusion, therefore, of the trial which is at present being conducted in Carthagena, will be the means which may lead to the satisfaction of the claims to which I have referred.

The time has not yet arrived, in the absence of official data, for the solution of this question.

The result of the trial, at present in progress in Carthagena, will afford the clear and precise data required for the examination of the question respecting the responsibility for the lamentable assassinations to which the undersigned had referred. If, in accordance with the results of the judicial investigations actually in progress, the principles of the law of nations, and the stipulations of the treaty in force between Colombia and the United States of America, the Colombian government should appear to have incurred any responsibility, the republic will not refuse to satisfy the same.

The executive power will reiterate the orders communicated to Carthagena for the acceleration of the course of the judicial process before alluded to.

With sentiments of high and distinguished consideration, I have the honor to subscribe myself the honorable General Sullivan's very attentive servant,

CARLOS MARTIN.

SIR: I have to acknowledge the receipt of your dispatch of January 20, 1868, No. 49, inclosing copies of your correspondence with the government of the United States of Colombia on the subject of the Panama commercial war tax.

The instructions of this department, under date of June 13, 1867, were made necessary mainly by the doubt which then existed whether the threatened resistance by the State of Panama to troops acting under the orders of General Mosquera was to be regarded as rebellion against the legitimate government of the United States of Colombia. The progress of events having resolved that doubt in favor of the State of Panama, the further discussion of the general question of the liability of our citizens to extraordinary taxes may be postponed to some future occasion.

SIR: Mr. Goñi, the Spanish minister here, has addressed a note to this department requesting the good offices of this government with that of the United States of Colombia, for the purpose of preventing the departure of the Cuyler from the port where she now is during the state of war between Spain and certain Spanish American republics. The object of the Spanish government in soliciting this arrangement is to relieve the squadron of observation which it now maintains, and otherwise might still feel obliged to keep up for the purpose of watching the movements of the Cuyler. Mr. Goñi expresses confidence in the existing administration at Bogota, and intimates a belief that if it were to engage not to allow the Cuyler to put to sea under the circumstances referred to, that its pledge to that effect would warrant the Spanish government in withdrawing its naval force. He further remarks that a motive for asking the interposition of this government in the matter is, that Spain has no diplomatic representative in that country.

You will consequently make known in the proper quarter the wish of her Catholic Majesty's government above referred to, and request that it may be candidly and dispassionately considered. It is presumed that the presence of Spanish men-of-war in or near Colombian waters cannot be agreeable to the government of that republic, and that the equivalent required for their departure will, under the circumstances, be regarded as sufficient and literal.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, May 13, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copies (A, B, and C) of correspondence just had between the Colombian government and the United States consul at Carthagená and myself, on the subject of the trial and acquittal of the well-known persons who, on the 1st of September last, had most barbarously and cruelly murdered native-born citizens of our country at Carthagená.

My unaltered statement of this inhuman affair, and the causes which led to it, will be found in my note to the Colombian government on the 5th of October last, a copy of which I inclosed to you with my dispatch No. 333, of the 12th of October.

On yesterday the secretary for foreign relations of Colombia had paid me a most friendly visit, and assured me that the President and cabinet of Colombia had fully concurred in my note of the 5th instant, of which inclosure B is a copy; that the President had recommended to congress, yet in session, to empower the executive government to indemnify the relatives of those who were murdered, as well as the two who had miraculously escaped on that awful occasion; and that both houses of congress had introduced bills for that purpose, and that they would most assuredly become a law.

Extracts A, 1, 2, 3, in Inclosure B, are taken from official letters of foreign consuls and consular agents at Carthagena, viz:

Extract A, British consul.

Extract No. 1, Italian vice-consul.

Extract No. 2, British consul.

Extract No. 3, Prussian vice-consul.

But a day or two since Colonel Cespedes, one of the murderers, had applied to the President of Colombia to be reinstated in the army, and the President replied that although he, Cespedes, was acquitted by the jury and judge, he, the President, still considered him as a cruel assassin, and that he should have no favor from his administration.

This is a great triumph for all foreigners in Colombia, and is a double security for our people passing across the Isthmus of Panama, to and from California and Asia.

No. 29.]

CONSULATE OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Carthagena, U. S. C., April 12, 1868.

SIR: I consider it my duty to inform you that the final trial of the persons accused of complicity in the assassinations of the officers of the steamers Rayo and Colombia took place on the 8th instant, before the judge of the province, and a jury of five persons, and they were found to be not guilty, and, consequently, discharged from custody.

A few days previous to the trial, I was summoned before the judge to answer the following question, proposed by the counsel for the prisoners, viz: "If the witness Peñaredenda had not furnished me with copies of his evidence in relation to the assassinations, and if I had not afterwards given to the said Peñaredenda a letter recommending him for employment to Panama Railroad Company at Aspinwall." On answering the summons, I stated what had occurred as follows: That on the night of the murder Mr. Peñaredenda had informed me that he was present at the hotel Bolivar, and saw all that occurred, at the same time showing me his clothing, stained with blood. Some two months afterward, having received instructions from the United States minister at Bogota to investigate the matter, and meeting Mr. Peñaredenda in the street, I asked him if he had any objection to give me his testimony; to which he replied, that he had come to the city to give his testimony before the court, and could furnish me with a copy of the same. I then told him that I should apply to the President of the State for a copy, but in case I should not obtain it through that source, I requested Mr. Peñaredenda to call at my office after he had given his testimony. Several days after this Mr. Peñaredenda called upon me, bringing the copies of his testimony given upon two occasions before the judge. I told him that, having received a copy of his first testimony through his excellency the President, I did not require any from himself, but fearing I might not receive a copy of the second evidence through the same source, he might leave me the one which he had brought, which he did.

That same day, after this, Mr. Joaquin Velez, of this city, sent me, per Mr. Peñaredenda, a note, in which he requested me to give the said Peñaredenda a letter of recommendation to the officers of the Panama Railroad Company. At the same time Peñaredenda informed me that he considered his life was endangered by remaining in this city, on account of his having testified as to what he knew in relation to the assassinations; he had determined to go to Aspinwall and seek employment there. I consequently gave him a letter to a friend connected with the railroad company, merely stating why Mr. Peñaredenda left this city.

On the day of the trial I was summoned to attend the same as one of the witnesses, and after the testimony had been read to the jury, the judge inquired of the procurador general if he wished to examine any of the witnesses, to which the procurador replied, that he wished to examine myself. He then put to me the question: "Do you know who committed the assassination of the Americans?"

This question took me by surprise, and I answered that from personal evidence it was impossible for me to know who committed the murder, as I was not present; but by reference to the testimony of others, the parties who were under accusation appear to have been at least accomplices in the case. I was then asked from whose testimony I derived this opinion. I answered, from that of the persons who had witnessed the murder—such as Mr. M. A. Cronoz, Mrs. Antonio Gallardo, &c. The counsel for the defense then called for the reading of the testimony of those witnesses, after which, I am sorry to say, no further questions were put to me, as I should have stated to the court that those same witnesses had told me, that out of fear of, and consideration for, the prisoners, they had not testified before the court to all they knew and had seen.

In summing up, the procurador general said to the jury, that he could not, upon the evidence, ask for a conviction of the accused, and it remained for the jury to say if they were entirely free from guilt.

The counsel for the prisoners made a strong appeal to the patriotic sentiments of the jury, and was applauded by the audience.

He assured the jury that there need be no fears of any international question in the matter, as there was no room for foreign intervention. He also assured them that the evidence of Mr. Peñaredenda was worthless; that it was formed as a "speculation," as proved by the fact of my having given him a letter of recommendation. This was disputed, however, by the attorney general.

Consequently, this affair terminated as everybody had anticipated. It may be admitted, that by the evidence presented the accused could not be said to be the persons who committed the murder, but certainly there was proof of their complicity.

During the last week the government of the State has published the discovery of a plan of revolution against the present authorities, and a decree has been issued by the governor of the province, the provisions of which are of such an arbitrary character as should be called for by a state of actual war.

However, the President of the State has stated that it does not apply to foreigners.

Inclosed is a copy of the decree.

The United States steamer Marblehead sailed from this port on the 3d instant.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

AUG. S. HANABERG.
United States Consul.

Hon. General PETER J. SULLIVAN,
United States Minister Resident, Bogota.

Mr. Sullivan to Señor Perez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Bogota, May 5, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to inform your excellency that the consul of the United States of America at Cartagena, in an official note of the 12th ultimo, addressed to me, says:

"The final trial of the persons accused of complicity in the assassinations of the officers of the steamers Rayo and Colombia took place on the 8th instant, before the judge of the province, and a jury of five persons, and they were found to be not guilty, and were discharged."

From another source I have also been most credibly informed and believe, "that the jury was composed of an ex-judge suspended from civil rights for a corrupt sentence, two ex-brother officers of the principal accused, and two unobjectionable persons; that one of the topics for the defense was that no such crime as assassination existed according to Bolivian law;" and another, "that the jury need not be afraid of any foreign intervention," &c.

The following extracts from letters now before me, written by gentlemen of the highest standing and social position in Cartagena, for whose honor and integrity I unhesitatingly vouch, will serve to convince any candid and unbiased mind, that the said trial and acquittal of those men were but a mockery of law, of justice, and of international comity.

[Extract No. 1.]

"In a few moments after the two ex-officers of the Rayo were murdered, I was at the Hotel Bolivar, where I saw the dead body of Lieutenant Borchart stretched upon the stone floor of the dining corridor, with a great crowd; and then the governor of the province, Miguel A. Vivez, to my question who had done the deed, said governor answered 'that hundreds of eyes had seen it, but as nobody will dare to give a full deposition, probably the authors of the crime will not be discovered.'

"In the crowd was a young man whose daring looks and movements indicated one of the participators. His name is Peñaranda, and he was, I was told, secretary to General Mendoza Llanes. I was informed by — that said Peñaranda had arrested him in the street, and probably would have killed him had he not been recognized as not belonging to the Rayo. I was also informed by — that said Peñaranda was one of the leaders in causing the death of Lieutenants Borchart and Murdaugh.

"From that day, 1st September last, up to this date, November 19, 1867, I have not spoken to a single person without the confidence of the guilt of the national officers, Cespedes and Barrios, and of the carpenter, A. Franco, aided by the soldiers with their muskets, as having murdered ex-Lieutenant Borchart at the Hotel Bolivar, and of the national officer, Yates Marquez, as having murdered ex-Lieutenant Murdaugh at the club.

"A couple of days after the murder, Mr. O. visted me, and told me privately, that he was present and saw everything with the murder of Borchart, but that he did not dare to come forward and declare the truth, because he knew he would have to pay for it with his life. He said he had seen Lieutenant Colonel Cespedes shooting a number of times at Borchart. He also related to me the saving of Mr. Dorning, which is exactly as represented by Mrs. Antonia Gallardo," &c.

[Extract No. 2.]

"There was ample time for the authorities at Carthagena to acquire a knowledge of what was threatened, and to provide against it.

"About five o'clock p. m., on the day in question, the naval agent of the royal mail steamer Tyne arrived at my house, and from him I learned that there were officers of the Rayo on board. The doctor and purser of the Tyne left the ship at seven, and the ex-officers of the Rayo, Borchart and Murdaugh, followed them.

"About a quarter to eight I accompanied said naval agent to said steamer Tyne, and while there a dark-complexioned person, short, and dressed in the white trousers and blue jacket, with Repi, usually worn as an undress by the officers of the battalion 'Regander,' with a crowd of about thirty or forty persons, rushed towards us, crying 'a la lancha,' and pistols were presented at the naval officer, amid shouts of '¡aqueste es el oficial del Rayo.' I knocked up the revolver presented by the leader of this mob, and asked what he wanted. He replied in an excited manner, pointing to the naval officer, 'es el un oficial del Rayo.' I corrected the mistake, and again asked what he wanted. He replied, 'buscando los oficiales del Rayo que nos han ultra jado de una que no podemos sufrir.'

"On my return from the steamer Tyne I inquired of several persons what was the cause of the disturbance, and received the same reply; and on approaching the Hotel Bolivar I heard several shots, and in passing the door was caught in the midst of a crowd that issued therefrom. Here I saw a tall, thin man, dressed in white, whose hands were dripping with blood. I asked who had wounded him. He replied, 'Un oficial del Rayo.' During all this time not a word was said about any attack on General Mendoza Llanes.

"Soon after this I saw an armed guard at the door of this hotel, and then heard for the first time the story of an attempt on General Mendoza's life. This was at least three quarters of an hour after the said attack upon the naval officer of the steamer Tyne, above alluded to.

"About half past nine o'clock of the same night there was no guard at the Hotel Bolivar, nor did I see then any patrol or preparation to provide against a fresh outbreak.

"It appears that at the first alarm the President, Señor Gonzales Caraso, took refuge in the cuartel, and that at half past ten o'clock that night he was at his house and undressing to go to bed. A moment's reflection would have told him that the mail steamer would leave at day-break, and that there was no other means of sending the surviving Americans out of danger. They owe their lives entirely to the women of the hotel and to the United States consul's exertions.

"As soon as the crowd who had gone to the steamer Tyne, as above stated, were satisfied that those they were in search of were not on board, a cry of 'al Hotel Bolivar' was raised, and they immediately went off in that direction.

"I am particular as to time, in order to show that the story of an attack on General

Mendoza Llanes having provoked the murders is an afterthought; and that the civil authorities were guilty, as I venture to affirm, of at least gross omissions of duty.

"I am not able to say by whom the murders were actually committed, but I state that from the morning of the 2d of September up to this day, (November 22d,) the general report in this city has not wavered in pointing out Colonel Cespedes, Captain Barrios, Lieutenant Marquez, a carpenter named Franco, a policeman called Vivez, (the man whom I had met with his hands bloody,) and Señor Peñaranda, the secretary of General Mendoza Llanes, as active participants in the crime.

"So little shame was felt in Carthagena that a French gentleman who expressed his abhorrence of the crime and his disgust that robbery had been added to murder, was threatened by an officer of the battalion regenerader that he would be treated in like manner if he were not silent."

[Extract No. 3.]

"I must state this crime causes the most painful sensation among foreigners resident in Carthagena, in like manner with natives who possess human feelings.

"The fatal time, about half past seven o'clock, I was in my balcony; saw a mob rushing to and fro in the streets; heard report of fire-arms in direction of the Hotel Bolivar and club.

Mr. Juan N. Pombo informed me that the most atrocious crime had been committed on the persons of the two officers of the Rayo, one in the Hotel Bolivar and the other in the club; the first victim Mr. Borchart, and the second Mr. Murdaugh. Inquiring who effected the hideous action, I was answered that it was a gang of the officers and part of soldiers of the battalion regenerados, actually on duty in Carthagena; that he, Mr. Pombo, was, unfortunately, at the fatal moment, in the club; that he, with others, thought to prevent the crime, but to no avail, as the actors were determined to take Mr. Murdaugh's life. He also then told me that the mob was then leaving the club, when a young man at the door said to them that he knew where Mr. Murdaugh had absconded himself, and, void of honorable feelings, he escorted the officers of the regenerader to the fatal spot, and there Mr. Murdaugh was immediately butchered, and, as is stated by an eye-witness, executed by an officer named Teodoro Yates Marquez. After returning from the spot above mentioned, many persons also state that the said Marquez boasted of having accomplished his savage and hellish deed, brandishing the awful weapon (revolver) with which he had given vent to his unrelenting thirst for human blood.

"Regarding what took place at the Bolivar Hotel, I learned that Messrs. Borchart and Dornin were making calls upon their friends after they had landed from the Royal Mail steamer, arrived from Santa Martha in the afternoon of the 1st of September last. Repairing to the Bolivar Hotel, they noticed a large crowd on the corner, front door, and steps of the hotel. Unconcerned, they walked through; but, on reaching the last steps to the corridor, they were fired upon.

"It seems that Borchart had no arms to defend himself. Mr. Dornin had his revolver and a small dagger. He commenced to make his defense against an overwhelming concourse, and throwing the dagger to Mr. Murdaugh with the object that he should also make his own defense, Mr. Dornin was severely wounded; and when the mob started upon Mr. Borchart, who had reached one of the rooms, Mr. Dornin was taken care of by the landlady of the hotel, and secreted in her own room, to prevent his being assassinated as his two comrades.

"Entering the room, Mr. Borchart resisted with all his power against the door to prevent the entrance of his followers. His strife must have been vigorous, as he had to battle between life and death.

"The rush ceased momentarily. He then strove to make a rapid escape towards the corridor to save himself; but unluckily, as he opened the door, although with precaution, he was seized by a man named Nicholas Franco, who commenced struggling with him, and from whom Mr. Borchart received in the hip a mortal cut with a carpenter's chisel, which brought him down to the pavement of the corridor.

"In this awful situation revolvers were discharged at him, of which one ball, entering the left side of the breast, immediately caused his death.

"Antonio Gallardo, a servant in the hotel, and Mr. Nicholas Peñaredonda, were, I am informed, present, and can give their testimony as to these facts.

"The next morning I went to the hospital, and there found and examined the dead bodies of Borchart and Murdaugh; found several wounds upon each, more especially the one which each had received upon the left breast, which must have been the mortal one, penetrating, as is supposed, the hearts of those two American citizens.

"The facts above stated are well known to the community at large in this city."

So far as I have been able to learn, none of the gentlemen from whose letters I have taken the above four last extracts are citizens of the United States of America.

The following are extracts from translations of evidence in the case, by eye-witnesses: Señor Antonio del Real, in a note to the United States consul at Carthagena, dated November 12, 1867, says: "Was in the house called the Club, on the night of the 1st of September last, when Mr. Murdaugh came in, and after a polite salutation to ourselves he went into the dining hall. Mr. Juan N. Pombo then requested Mr. Ruiz, the proprietor of the house, to persuade Mr. Murdaugh to retire, because there was much alarm, &c. After Mr. Ruiz had spoken to him he went out; and after hearing some shouts in the street he returned, and a servant boy of the house, as we were told, indicated to Murdaugh where to hide himself.

"This occurred in the midst of a great tumult, especially observable in the lower part of the house and in the street, where I saw some shots fired. I heard some shots fired inside of the house, and then I was told that Mr. Murdaugh had been found on a flat roof, in the midst of some boxes of flowers, and that they had killed him with pistol-shots," &c.

Señor Juan N. Pombo says, in a like note, "that he was in the house called the Club on the evening of the 1st of September; heard some shots fired. The principal corridor and interior of the house had been invaded by a crowd of armed individuals, who were searching for the officers of the Rayo," &c.

Señor Eugenio de Janon, in a note of November 21 last, says: "On the 1st of September last, about 6 o'clock in the evening, more or less, I came off from the steamer Tyne in company with Messrs. Borchart, Smith, Dornin, and Murdaugh, and together we went to the Hotel Bolivar. On arriving up stairs, in the corridor of that hotel, I found directly in front of me a young man named Temistocles Peñaranda, who, seeing the four ex-officers of the Rayo with me, expressed himself in improper terms against them, calling them pirates, bandits of the Rayo, thieves, &c. Be it that the ex-officers referred to not wishing to take any notice of Mr. Peñaranda, or be it they did not understand the epithets which he directed towards them, the fact is they did not answer a single word, but went towards the room which opens on the hall.

"I told him that he ought not to express himself in the manner he was doing, because he might provoke a quarrel; and I told him that those gentlemen brought a letter of recommendation from General Santos Gutierrez for the President of the State. He then went to his room.

After this I was in the bed-room a few moments with the ex-officers, whom I soon left to go out on private business. On my return, Mrs. Antonio Gallardo told me that a mob, composed of the people, officers, and soldiers, had assassinated Mr. Borchart and wounded Mr. Dornin."

Mrs. Antonio Gallardo, in the city of Carthagena, on the 1st of September last, testified before the alcalde of the district as follows:

To the query about her knowledge of what has taken place this evening at the Hotel Bolivar, where she was, she answered, "that she was in the said establishment and saw Mr. Peñaranda insulting four Americans that were in the corridor of the hotel, and who had just come up stairs, to which insults said Americans did not answer, when Peñaranda withdrew into his room; that a few moments later appeared an armed party looking for the Americans, which found only one, and he locked himself up in a room; that, nevertheless, they forced the door and fired at him every time that door was ajar; that the forces of that American giving way in holding the door, he thought to save himself by flight, but was detained by Mr. Nicholas Franco, who took hold of him, threw him on the floor, striking him at the same time with an instrument in his hand; that, after this, soldiers of the battalion regenerader shot at him with muskets and left him dead."

Questioned if she had heard, and from whom, that the intention of the Americans was to kill General Mendoza Llanes, and if she saw any movement or anything else to indicate such intention, she answered, "that she did not hear or see anything of the kind, but that she knows General Mendoza was not in the hotel.

Evidence of Nicholas Peñaredenda, taken before the provincial court at Carthagena, November 5, 1867, is substantially as follows:

"Am a native of Maganque, twenty-eight years of age, married, and a merchant; was in Carthagena on the night of the 1st of September last, and that while in company with a young man named Falquez, from Santa Martha, Mr. Diego Leon approached and asked them the cause of the alarming movements observable at that time in the vicinity of where they were. They answered that they did not know. Said Leon then said he thought it was a question with the Americans, and then withdrew.

"Then witness and said Falquez went towards the Hotel Bolivar, and on their way having met General Mendoza Llanes, they stopped him, and having asked him if the report that the Americans had attacked him was true, he answered them in such a vague manner that the witness understood from him there had not been any such attack make upon him.

"That after this the witness proceeded alone to the Hotel Bolivar, and on going to the stairs of this establishment he heard the report of fire-arms, and, accelerating his steps, he found in the upper part of the house a multitude of persons, among whom he recognized Manuel Cespedes and Vicente Barrios, who, armed with revolvers, were firing upon two Americans who were then defending themselves from the shots thus fired at them; that the witness being obliged to observe this occurrence, being then in the midst of it, interposed between Vicente Barrios and one of the Americans with whom Barrios was struggling; that the witness succeeded in saving the American and shutting him up in a room of the house; that the said American was wounded in this attack, but the witness cannot say who wounded him because there were so many attacking with sabers, &c., (arma blanca,) and at the same time the witness was wounded below the left nipple, by a stab from an instrument in an unknown hand; that this crowd went down stairs in search of another American, and the witness remained at the door of the room in which he had placed the American; then heard a voice in the house shouting: 'How? are you going when there remain enemies up stairs' and observing at the same time that the people, with armed soldiers, were coming up stairs, then the witness resolved to leave the said door, and on going below he found Mr. Cespedes and begged of him to save the American; that a few minutes afterwards he heard shots fired inside the hotel, and the voice of a man who came out of the house, saying: 'Now they have killed him!' that witness then went up and found the American, whom he had shut up in the room, dead; that he then went out, and, late at night, found the American consul, and helped that officer to take on board the royal mail steamer two Americans who had been saved, of whom one was wounded; that shortly before leaving for the steamer the United States consul succeeded in procuring a public force, under the command of Cruz Diez and Colonel Caraso, who had helped the consul and myself to get these two Americans on board of the said steamer," &c., &c.

Mr. Manuel A. Orezoz testified before the provincial court at Carthagena, on the 31st December last, substantially as follows:

"Am forty years of age, a native of Puerto Cabello, Venezuela, resident of Carthagena, merchant, and married; that on the 1st of September last, in the evening, he was at the Hotel Bolivar, as the place had been and is his dwelling-place, and was an actual witness of the horrible scandal which in the end resulted in the death of the North American, Borchart, and the wounding of Mr. Dornin, also a North American; that of the multitude of people that were in the hotel that night he knew but few persons, except a young man, Peñaranda, who may justly be called the general promoter and instigator of the disgraceful occurrences of that night; that he also saw there Manuel Cespedes, second commander of the 'battalion regenerader,' Mr. Vicente Barrios, an officer of the same force, and a carpenter named Franco; that he only remained in the hotel that night, only until the assassins, assisted by armed soldiers of the said battalion, fell upon Borchart; that about 11 o'clock same night he returned to his lodgings in said hotel, and became engaged with Colonel Perea and the proprietor of the hotel in the means of saving and embarking of Mr. Darnin, who was wounded, and his companion, Smith, who were delivered by said two persons and myself to the American consul at 1 o'clock that night.

"That Borchart was killed and Dornin wounded before he had first left said hotel that night; that in a crowd of so many persons, who disputed the means of entrance to the room of the person who was the victim, had taken refuge, &c.

"He cannot positively say who had killed Mr. Borchart or wounded Mr. Dornin," &c.

On the 6th of November last the United States consul at Carthagena wrote to me, as follows:

"Mr. Manuel Amador Fierro, the President of the State, sent for me to call at his office, and represented to me his disposition to comply with the demands of the national government in relation to the murders committed in this city on the 1st of September last, but stated he had not the power to perform what he knew to be his duty in the case, as the parties against whom he had to proceed composed the only armed force in this city; and should he undertake to carry out the proper measures it is probable he would himself be made a prisoner, which would make the situation much worse; consequently he begged of me, as a favor, to write to you per first opportunity, to request you to apply to the President or government of the nation, and state his desire that a force of one hundred national troops be sent to this city immediately; and in case the one hundred men have already been sent to Baranquilla, under the command of Colonel Ponce, that orders be immediately sent down to that officer to bring that force immediately to this city.

"His excellency also requested me to say to you that any communication from the government to him in relation to this matter he should like to have come through your medium and that of this consulate.

"I inclose a letter from his excellency for the secretary of war."

I duly delivered the above letter for the secretary of war to his excellency Señor Carlos Martin, late secretary for foreign relations of Colombia, and at the same time explained to him the contents of said note of United States consul Hanaberg, when said secretary Martin assured me that the troops that had escorted General Mosquera were ordered to return to and remain at Carthagena, for the purpose indicated, and for the purpose of maintaining the peace, good order, and dignity of Colombia. Such was my understanding with Secretary Martin on that subject.

Said consul has also informed me that the President of Bolivar had complained to him that no troops had been sent to his aid.

Your predecessor, in an official note of the 10th of October last, in reply to mine of the 5th of the same month, says, as translated :

"In the same manner the said government has issued peremptory orders for disbanding the battalion which was in Carthagena, under command of G. Gonzales Curazo, to which the officers referred to by your excellency's note belonged ; the said force will, therefore, no longer be in the service of the republic."

I have been advised by the said United States consul that the said troops, who had garrisoned Carthagena at the time of said murders, and who were charged with said crimes, have ever since been retained in the public service garrisoning said city.

Upon a careful review of the whole circumstances in this unpleasant affair, and mindful of the friendly relations which ought ever to exist between Colombia and the United States of America, I suggest to your excellency the propriety of your acceding to the terms and conditions contained in my note, addressed to your predecessor on the 20th of January last, asking indemnities for the families of the said two murdered Americans, as well as for said Dornin and Smith, their companions and countrymen, who has escaped being murdered at the same time and place.

Relying upon the friendship and good faith of your government towards mine, I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency my highest consideration and respect.

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

His Excellency Señor Doctor SANTIAGO PEREZ,
Secretary of the Interior and Foreign Relations, United States of Colombia.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, May 5, 1868.

SIR: Your dispatch of the 12th ultimo, stating that the persons charged with the assassination of the officers of the steamers Rayo and Colombia had been finally tried and acquitted, has come to hand.

This is, indeed, an alarming state of affairs in Colombia, which makes every foreigner in this country tremble for his property and his life.

I have this day sent another strong note to the Colombian government reviewing this trial—protesting against it as a mockery of law, of justice, and of international comity, and urging a compliance with the terms of my note of the 20th of January last, demanding indemnities for the families of Borchart and Murdaugh, and for Dornin and Smith.

I am fully determined that, in future, all American citizens sojourning in Colombia shall be safe in their persons and property ; and, should those barbarous and blood-thirsty assassins defy me, I have a sure plan by which I can make them as tame as toothless serpents.

Private.—The British consul, in a note on this trial to the British chargé d'affaires here, gives the character of three of the jury who had tried those assassins.

I must again thank you for the great fidelity and zeal which you have shown in this matter.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith copies (A, B, C) of correspondence had between the Colombian government, the United States consul at Panama, and myself, on the subject of the arrest and discharge of Thomas Walsh, at Panama.

The evidence submitted by the Colombian government in this case is so bulky and difficult of translation, that I prefer to await the report of our consul at Panama before I form or express an opinion in this case, which may be intended as a set-off against the Carthagena murder cases.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,

Bogota, April 22, 1868.

The secretary for foreign relations of Colombia has the honor to transmit to the Hon. General Sullivan, minister resident of the United States of America, a copy of various documents which have been received in this office, from which it will be seen that on the afternoon of January 23d last an officer and some marines of the North American navy, being armed, disembarked at Taboga and proceeded to the hotel of the same name, and there seized upon Mr. Thomas Walsh, an English subject and captain of the pilot-boat Petrel, and handcuffed him and conducted him as a prisoner to Panama, where he was set at liberty by order of the consul of the United States of America; that the above-mentioned officer and soldiers seized, also, the papers of the said vessel, which were found in possession of the wife of Mr. Walsh; also the chronometer which he had given to Mr. Casain to keep.

As these facts are in violation of the security which the institutions of this republic guarantee to all individuals who are found in the territory of the Union, and being executed by employés of another nation, they are, in a high degree, subversive of the national sovereignty thereof.

The executive power is under the necessity of formally reclaiming from the government of the United States of America, with the object that it should dictate the most efficacious means to avoid the repetition of deeds of this kind, and that what already had been done should receive the proper reproof.

The Colombian government at present limits its claim to this exigence alone, reserving to itself an addition, if it should be necessary when in the course of the process of law, which, on account of the above facts, is commenced in Panama, the arrest and trial of the individuals who had committed those acts should be ordered.

The undersigned expects that General Sullivan will acquaint his government with the contents of the documents referred to, as also of the present note.

With sentiments of distinguished consideration the undersigned has the honor to again acknowledge himself General Sullivan's obedient servant,

SANTIAGO PEREZ.

Hon. Señor General PETER J. SULLIVAN,

Minister Resident of the United States of America, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Sullivan to Señor Perez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,

Bogota, May 13, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your excellency's note, dated the 22d ultimo, relative to the arrest of Thomas Walsh by an officer and marines of the United States navy, at Taboga, on the 23d of January last, and his subsequent discharge by the United States consul at Panama.

I should have answered your said note ere this had I not waited, but in vain, for a statement of the case from the said consul.

I have written to him to report forthwith the proceedings in this case, both to the Department of State at Washington and to this legation.

I have, in the mean time, forwarded a copy of your said note, with a copy of mine to said consul, to my government.

I have the honor to be, with profound respect, your excellency's most obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

His Excellency Señor Doctor SANTIAGO PEREZ,

Secretary of the Interior and Foreign Relations, United States of Colombia.

Mr. Sullivan to Mr. Smith.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, May 10, 1868.

SIR: The secretary for foreign relations of the United States of Colombia, in a note addressed to this legation on the 22d ultimo, says:

"That on the 23d of January last an officer and some marines of the North American navy, being armed, disembarked at Toboga and then and there seized upon Mr. Thomas Walsh, an English subject, and handcuffed and conducted him as prisoner to Panama, where he was set at liberty by the consul of the United States of America."

The said secretary complains that this act on the part of said officer is a great outrage upon the laws and sovereignty of Colombia, and demands of our government that said officer be reprimanded, and that there shall not be a repetition of similar acts as are alleged to have been committed by said officer.

You will forthwith report the facts in this case both to the Department of State at Washington and to this legation, so as that even-handed justice may be done, knowingly, in the premises.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, June 18, 1868.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith correspondence (A and B) had between the Colombian government and myself, on the request of the Spanish minister at Washington, invoking our friendly aid (per your dispatch No. 39 of April 14th last) not to let the war steamer Cuyler go to sea during the existing war between Spain and certain South American republics. I think the answer is satisfactory.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

HON. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,
Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Mr. Sullivan to Señor Perez.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA,
Bogota, June 6, 1868.

SIR: My government has instructed me to inform your excellency that the Spanish minister at Washington has addressed a note to the Department of State, United States of America, requesting its good offices with that of its sister republic the United States of Colombia, for the purpose of preventing the departure of the war steamer R. R. Cuyler, alias the "El Rayo," from the port where she now is, during the state of war between Spain and certain Spanish American republics.

The object of the Spanish government, in soliciting this arrangement, is to relieve the squadron of observation which it now maintains, and otherwise might still feel obliged to keep up, for the purpose of watching the movements of the Cuyler.

The Spanish minister aforesaid expresses confidence in the existing national administration of the United States of Colombia, and intimates a belief that if it were to engage not to allow the said war steamer to put to sea under the circumstances referred to, that its pledge to that effect would warrant the Spanish government in withdrawing its naval force from Colombian waters.

Said Spanish minister further authorizes me to say that a motive for asking the interposition of my government in this matter is that Spain has no diplomatic representative in Colombia.

In making known to your excellency the wish of her Catholic Majesty's government above referred to, as well as that of mine, I presume that the presence of Spanish men-of-war in or near Colombian waters cannot be very agreeable to the government of that brave soldier and disinterested patriot, General Santos Gutierrez, the popular citizen President of Colombia, and hence I believe that the equivalent required for their departure will, under the circumstances, be regarded as sufficient and liberal, and must naturally result in a source of mutual benefit and lasting friendship between all parties concerned.

I request a speedy and explicit answer to this note.

I have the honor to reiterate to your excellency my unbounded confidence in and respect for yourself and the government of which you are so truly worthily the exponent.

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

His Excellency Señor ACOSTA SANTIAGO PEREZ,
Secretary of the Interior and Foreign Relations, U. S. C.

Señor Perez to Mr. Sullivan.

OFFICE OF THE INTERIOR AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogota, June 15, 1868.

The note which your excellency was pleased to address the undersigned, dated 6th of the present month of June, stating that the Spanish minister in Washington has solicited of the government of the United States of America the interposition of its good offices with Colombia, in order to prevent the sailing of the steamer of war R. R. Cuyler or "El Rayo," from the port in which it is at present, so long as the present war between Spain and the allied republics of the Pacific continue, has been laid before the citizen President.

The undersigned has received instructions to state to your excellency that Colonel F. Canez, who will shortly set out in the service of the government near the Colombian Atlantic States, will be the bearer of orders to remove from the said steamer Rayo all such pieces or parts as it may be possible to take out of her with the view to hinder her from sailing or performing any service without the knowledge of the Colombian government.

This said government, in fulfillment of its duties as a neutral power, will not grant, under any circumstances, its permission for the sailing of the said vessel from its waters.

In the same manner the authorities of the State in which the said vessel is at present shall be notified, to the effect that the utmost vigilance be observed respecting the said vessel, to the effect that she be not taken or conveyed away for the service of any of the belligerents, so long as the war continues, or until the ownership of the said vessel be ascertained.

The citizen President hopes that the above-mentioned assurances will be satisfactory to the government of the United States, whose good offices are always so grateful to him, and whose wishes he will lose no opportunity to satisfy upon all occasions, and especially when, as in the present case, they are strictly in accordance with the claims of justice respecting a nation with which Colombia is at peace.

The undersigned renews to the honorable minister his most cordial assurances.

SANTIAGO PEREZ.

Hon. General PETER J. SULLIVAN,
Minister Resident of the United States of America, &c., &c., &c.

No. 73.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, June 18, 1868.

SIR: The policy of the Colombian government is evinced in its reply, marked A, herewith transmitted, to my notes of the 5th of October, 20th of January, and 5th of May last, (copies of which I have duly transmitted to your department with my Nos. 33, 59, and 65, of October 12, March 28, and May 13 last,) relative to the inhuman murder of native-born citizens of our country by national officers and troops of Colombia, at Carthagena, on the 1st of September last.

The Colombian government transfers the whole subject for further consideration to your department. * * *

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

Señor Perez to Mr. Sullivan.

[Translation.]

OFFICE OF THE INTERIOR AND FOREIGN RELATIONS,
Bogota, June 10, 1868.

The undersigned has the honor to reply in accordance with the instructions he has received from the citizen President, to the note which your excellency was pleased to address to this office under date of May 5th of the present year.

The circumstances which took place in the city of Carthagena on the 1st of September, and of which several individuals who had formed part of the crew of the steamer Cuyler or Rayo were victims, are among those which have caused the most disagreeable impressions, not only upon the authorities of the country but also upon every Colombian—especially the individual at present in charge of the national executive power, has deplored such shameful events, and would have desired to have at his command the means of lessening their evil results and of insuring condign punishment to the culprits. As a proof thereof, it will suffice to mention the care and spontaneousness with which he had the tradesman Poñaranda apprehended in this city and conveyed to Carthagena for trial, in consequence of the competent authority having ordered his imprisonment, as being complicated in the above-mentioned events.

At the same time that the citizen President does not conceive that the government has incurred any responsibility on account of the above-mentioned acts, or even that the fact of the parties against whom the attacks were made were North American citizens on the 1st of September, is proved, he desires, nevertheless, to satisfy, in whatever it appertains to him to do so, in accordance with the law of nations and his special obligations, the government of the United States of America, which, by the appreciable intervention of your excellency, has thought proper to claim indemnification.

With a view thereto, and as certain documents are required which at present are in the office of the President of the sovereign State of Magdalena, which will aid in determining the nationality of the parties who were attacked in Carthagena on the day above mentioned, the citizen President has resolved to transfer to Washington the present discussion, and General Santos Acosta being about to be accredited envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of the Colombian Union, one of his duties will be that of continuing there the discussion of this business, and of settling it in accordance with the justice and the honor of the two countries.

The executive power is firmly convinced that the aforesaid affair, argued and brought to a close with the Hon. Mr. Sullivan, would be brought to an equally satisfactory conclusion; but the above-mentioned circumstances and the desire that the other important questions which are confided to your excellency may not suffer any interruption on account of the said claim, have caused him to come to this resolution, in which he hopes the honorable minister will not fail to perceive the ardent desire of the Colombian government to attend, both here and in Washington, to the speedy dispatch of all the questions pending between the two countries.

The undersigned takes advantage of the present opportunity to present to your excellency the most evident proofs of his high consideration.

SANTIAGO PEREZ.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, June 30, 1868.

SIR: I acknowledge the receipt of dispatches of May 13th, Nos. 65 and 66.

In the absence of a full report of the evidence adduced upon the trial of the persons accused of the murder of Messrs. Murdaugh and Borchart, it is impossible to form a confident judgment upon the good faith and integrity of the judicial investigation, and the conclusiveness which should be attributed to its result. Meantime, I am gratified to learn that the government of the United States of Colombia manifests its disposition to stigmatize with unmistakable marks of its displeasure officers who are supposed to have been connected with the outrage, and to provide just indemnity for the families of the deceased and for the wounded survivors of the lawless assault.

I am, sir, your obedient servant,

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, September 3, 1868.

SIR: In reply to your dispatch No. 36, of March 30th, instructing me to inquire into and report upon the nature of the government of the island of Saint Andrew's, the protection it affords to the lives and property of our citizens doing business therein, and whether any national interest of our country is endangered by the condition of affairs in that island?

I beg leave to say that, after due and diligent inquiry into the facts in this case, I have learned that the islands of Saint Andrew's and Providence, which were formerly under the nominal jurisdiction of the State of Bolivar, but now under that of the United States of Colombia, are situated in latitude 13° north, about two hundred miles to the northwest of Aspinwall and about one hundred miles east of the Mosquito coast.

About a year ago the State of Bolivar ceded these islands to the United States of Colombia; and for fifteen years previously Bolivar had exercised no jurisdiction over them.

The only government that has existed there is that of justices of the peace, elected by the inhabitants.

Saint Andrew's is the larger of the two, and is about ten miles long.

There is some trade in cocoanuts and cattle produced on these islands; also, in turtles and tortoise-shells.

Of the population of these islands I know nothing. There is but little or no communication between them and Colombia, which is utterly unable to govern them.

I am unable to learn the extent of the interest of our country in said islands, or about the manner of treatment of our people doing business in or with them, and therefore suggest that one of our war steamers be ordered there, without delay, to examine into and report upon all the facts in the case.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
PETER J. SULLIVAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, September 14, 1863.

SIR: Ecuador is perishing; her capital, Quito, has been assailed by a violent earthquake; her next largest city, of ten thousand inhabitants, has vanished into the newly-opened jaws of mother earth. Earthquakes, volcanoes, have visited her with a red-hot rod of vengeance, which, as the accredited report now stands, has caused her to almost vanish from the fond gaze of her sister republics.

Her minister, now by my side, tells me that all the public buildings in Quito have been either destroyed or shaken to the foundation; that several towns have, with their inhabitants, almost entirely disappeared; that on the 16th of August last, the day of their destruction, a cloud of darkness had gathered over and around the doomed places of fond abode; that deafening peals of thunder and vivid flashes of lightning were answered by horrid shocks of earthquakes and numerous founts of smoke and fire spouting from the trembling earth, which in some parts opened its devouring mouths, and all within their reach had sunk into the gulf below; that the adjacent hills had blazed with jetting fire and thrown volcanic showers around them; that no fewer than thirty thousand persons had perished in this terrible catastrophe, whose loss throws a fearful pall over all the heretofore happy and thriving but now mourning people of Ecuador. The end is not yet fully known here.

The minister also says that our legation's valuable effects in Quito must have been destroyed or greatly damaged, and that at the time of this appalling visitation of God's manifest power there resided a large number of our people in that city. I suggest, therefore, that our government send an authorized officer to Quito to ascertain our loss.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,
PETER J. SULLIVAN.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES,
Bogota, October 10, 1868.

SIR: The people of Bogota are greatly excited. For some time past both the liberal and conservative parties of the State of Cundinamarca were preparing to make war upon each other, for the sake of peace and power only.

Very early this morning the government of the State was overthrown, and its President imprisoned by the national troops, under orders of the national executive government of Colombia, and a provisional State government has been already organized, composed of the friends of the federal government.

So far as I have been able to learn, there were but two persons killed and three wounded in this affair.

The State government was in the hands of the conservatives, who are strongly opposed to the principles and policy of the national government.

Fighting is not only going on in different parts of this State, but, as I have been informed, also in other States of this unhappy country, between the liberals and conservatives.

Bogota is, at noon to-day, quiet. I have not, as yet, formed an opinion as to the merits or results of this gloomy affair.

I have the honor to be, sir, your obedient servant,

PETER J. SULLIVAN.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD,

Secretary of State, Washington, D. C.

P. S.—I inclose, herewith, the Diario Oficial of this date, which reached me after I had written the above dispatch, giving the reasons of the executive government for its conduct in said matter.

P. J. S.

[From the Diario Oficial, of the United States of Columbia, October 10, 1868.—Translation.]

The President of the republic to his fellow countrymen :

Yesterday there appeared on the corners of this city, and, moreover, I heard of it in an authentic manner, a decree of the Governor of Cundinamarca, in which certain laws of the State assembly were violated by the calling of a convention by means of an election, which was to be controlled by two thousand bayonets, in accordance with provisions dictated in usurpation of powers belonging to the legislative department, in actual contravention to the national constitution, which imposes upon the States the obligation to organize themselves under a republican, representative, and popular form of government.

As early as two nights ago, forces quietly recruited in the departments began to enter this city, the residence of the high federal authorities; and yesterday, a few hours after the crime of treason and usurpation, consummated by the executive government of this State, was publicly announced, another body of troops approached the city and made known its arrival by the assassination of a peaceable and innocent citizen.

As the guardian of national public order, as a protector of individual rights, sworn to maintain due respect to the national government and the integrity of the Union by the constitutional harmony of the States, I have deemed it my duty to avenge this outrageous insult to the federal authorities besieged in their own capital.

At the request of the constitutional government of Cundinamarca, and in conformity to law, I determined to make use of my constitutional powers to arrest, without delay, those disturbers of public peace.

I have given ample proof of my profound respect for law, and I am determined to show my impartiality in all party contests; but though I give all my respect to law and justice, nothing will make me bow to revolutions and fly from insurgents.

The general government allows all rights but that of conspiracy.

As far as I am concerned, all political parties may depend upon my support in any victories obtained by legal voting; but I will never allow them to use force, particularly when it is in rebel hands and in the service of perjured officials.

[Editorial on the same subject.]

The constant desire of the present administration has been to preserve peace. In his first message to congress, the President insisted upon the necessity of a law, in accordance with provisions of the constitution, giving the chief executive the power to preserve public order. This was not done, although the government organ demonstrated the evil consequences of such neglect, apparently for the reason that divergences of opinions among the legislators prevented agreement upon the best mode of effecting the desired result.

In this case the good intent and sincere wish of a President charged with the preservation of the integrity of the nation could not be more evident, when he asks the assembled representatives, frankly and urgently, to define a plain and permanent line of conduct for him to observe in any emergency.

Although the law was not passed, the President has the power granted by the constitution, and this he may use to the utmost extent. The error incurred by exercising it, for want of legal authority, urgently asked for, can in no case be attributed to one who persistently demanded that authority; nor can it be comprehended how he can refrain from acting with due severity under the circumstances, particularly when there is no constitutional provision against it. The duty of every government is self-preservation and protection to its subjects; and to do this the government must have the necessary power to act rigorously under all circumstances. The great expenses of the country to sustain the general government, and the immense resources put at its disposal, show the importance of such government, and the object for which it was created, which was certainly for the preservation of peace, the maintenance of friendly relations with foreign nations, and to administer home affairs with justice and economy.

The essential basis of the Colombian Union is the acknowledgment and protection by the general government, as well as by the State governments, of all personal rights justly claimed by the citizens and inhabitants of the national territory. Therefore the chief executive insists upon respect to those rights by all the officials of State governments. In some States where political factions violate or neglect those rights, the executive laments that he has not been able to remedy the evil; but, wherever he could, he has never ceased to try to restore order by moral suasion. Even when the troubles first began in Cundinamarca, he did what he could to quiet them; but all was vain, till finally the revolution broke out in the State, on the 9th instant, and through the governor's influence.

It is well known that he sanctioned the laws enacted by the last assembly, as it was his duty to do; but this sanction was given reluctantly, and he soon violated the very laws he had promised to obey, by decrees tending to produce disturbances in every district. Anarchy and want of confidence is the consequent result.

In contemplating this state of affairs, the chief of the general government omitted no peaceful effort to restore confidence and order; but all was vain. This rebellion against the legislative power was soon followed by resistance to the judicial power of the State. If the governor had not interfered with State institutions, the general government would have remained silent; but that official forced a war between the central and State governments, and the sad consequences of this disruption are now anticipated. He not only armed his own partisans, but old rebels who had become scandalously notorious, and marched them into the capital of the republic, where there was nobody to fight; for neither the judicial nor the legislative power had any armed forces ready to resist an assault or invasion.

Thus the federal government was placed in a perilous condition; the capital was invaded by enemies to all the principles of good government, and the central power saw itself on the point of being compelled to succumb.

The invading forces continued to increase in numbers and to accumulate resources for the overthrow of the legitimate power. The national forces were not armed; they were scattered at a distance from the capital, and could not be readily drawn together; if resistance was attempted, these distinct squads would be intercepted as they came in, and all would have been lost. In fact, the general government was besieged, and its aid and allies could not enter.

What a trying situation for a government that had sworn to preserve order and protect its subjects in the enjoyment of their constitutional rights!

The capital of the republic, the residence of the diplomatic body, to which international law and public treaties place under the protection of the national government, and whose agents need security in their domiciles and persons for the proper exercise of their functions, could not submit to such indignity. And who were these enemies? They were outlaws, who cared for no permanent form of government, but sought perpetual changes for the benefit of plunder. And this was dared in the face of the federal government, by a portion of the Colombian guard, whose duty it was to obey the constitution and protect the city!

Under a government organized in accordance with article 1, section 8 of the constitution, all personal rights may be considered as sufficiently protected by State institutions. The only guarantee that the general government can offer to these rights, according to the federal constitution, is to cause the supreme court and senate to suspend or repeal all legislative acts that may trespass upon such rights. But when the local government treacherously changes its nature, the general government, whose duty it is to protect individual rights and social interests, must not abandon them to a revolutionary faction, without responsibility, depending upon the success of its arms for its existence, and which can have no intercourse with any foreign ministers while it is engaged in the destruction of order and security.

For these reasons the citizen President of the Union has judged it his duty, on the petition of the constitutional government of Cundinamarea, and in concert with it, to disarm the partisans of the revolution which was declared on the 9th instant in the capital of the republic. He believes it his solemn duty to secure order by preventing or stopping a war that would certainly end in the ruin of the country and the destruction of its credit; and this he hastens to accomplish in due time, and in a manner calculated to prevent useless sacrifices of all sorts.

The nation, which bears witness to the impartiality of the present administration, in its attempts to preserve order and its efforts to secure public peace, which has seen the respect it has shown for all legitimate State governments, and which must agree that no usurpation can be tolerated neither morally nor constitutionally, will do justice to the plans we have adopted in compliance with our acknowledged duty to preserve public peace and order. This plan consists in defending citizens and institutions against factions attempting to impose upon them and destroy them in an illegal manner.

The State of Cundinamarea, once more under the control of its constitution and its legitimate rulers, continues in the full enjoyment of self-government.

SIR: With reference to the case of the murder at Carthagena of part of the crew of the steamer Cuyler or Rayo, which it is understood is last mentioned by you in your No. 73, of the 18th of June last, I have to state that, as the further discussion of the subject has been transferred hither, the instruction to the effect that it will not be necessary for you to renew the discussion at Bogota is hereby reiterated.

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA,

Washington, January 5, 1867.

SIR: At the request of the owners of the steamer R. R. Cuyler I have the honor to inform you that, under instructions from my government, I have concluded for it a contract of purchase, and in conformity therewith she is to be delivered, armed, in such port of the United States of Colombia as in due time may be designated. The owners fear that at the moment of departure some hinderance thereto may be offered, from believing that she is intended for hostile action on some nation with which the United States of America hold friendly relations, and therefore I have been asked to make this statement.

I avail of the occasion to renew to you the assurances of my very distinguished consideration.

EUSTORJIO SALGAR.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Salgar to Mr. Seward.

[Translation.]

LEGATION OF THE UNITED STATES OF COLOMBIA,
Washington, February 6, 1867.

SIR: The undersigned, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary, has the honor to submit to the honorable William H. Seward, Secretary of State, the following facts.

On or about the 17th day of December, 1866, the undersigned, through his agent Vernon H. Brown, of New York, made an agreement with Russell Sturges and others, of the city of New York, for the purchase from them of the steamship R. R. Cuyler, to be fitted, under the directions of the said agent, as a ship of war, and when so fitted to receive on board armament, ordnance stores, and such other cargo as might be required, and to be delivered with such armament, ordnance stores, and cargo, to the government of the undersigned at one of its Atlantic ports, when and where the purchase price of said steamship would be payable. The said vessel has been fitted up by the sellers, and the cargo has been purchased and put on board by the said agent for the account of, and is owned by, the government of the undersigned, and the vessel was ready to proceed on her voyage, to be delivered according to agreement, on the 2d day of February instant.

Mr. Sturges, on the day last named, presented at the New York custom-house a manifest of the cargo of the vessel, and demanded a clearance thereof to the port of Aspinwall, a port of Colombia. The clearance was granted and the vessel was about to proceed to sea, when the customs officers of the port of New York went on board, took possession, and claimed the vessel and cargo as forfeited to the United States, and they still hold and detain the vessel and her cargo.

The undersigned is not informed of any facts or reasons which can justify the seizure or detention of the vessel or cargo. The vessel was purchased in good faith by the undersigned for his government and her destination is a port of Colombia for the purpose of delivery to that government. The undersigned claims that the purchase and the voyage are lawful; and he respectfully requests that the vessel may be released, and that she be allowed to proceed with her cargo to the port of destination.

The undersigned renews to the honorable William H. Seward assurances of the high consideration with which he remains his obedient servant,

EUSTORJIO SALGAR.

Hon. WILLIAM H. SEWARD, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Señor Salgar.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, February 13, 1867.

SIR: Recurring to your note of the 6th instant in relation to the detention of the steamer R. R. Cuyler at New York, I have the honor to inform you that the subject having been referred to the Attorney General, he declares the result of his examination to be that if the Colombian government were now the owners of the vessel and had assumed the responsibility of her voyage to a port of that country, he would advise an order for the delivery of the vessel and the dismissal of the libel which has been filed against her. Understanding that by the terms of the contract of sale Messrs. Sturges & Co. continue to be the owners, and the vessel under their control until delivery at a Colombian port, he is of the opinion that they should enter into the bond required by the 9th section of the neutrality act of April 20, 1818, and that thereupon the libel will be dismissed and the vessel delivered to them to proceed on her voyage.

The action of the government will be in conformity with the advice of the Attorney General.

I avail myself of this occasion to renew to you the assurance of my most distinguished consideration.

WILLIAM H. SEWARD.

General Don EUSTORJIO SALGAR, &c., &c., &c.

Mr. Seward to Señor Murillo.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

Washington, November 9, 1867.

The Secretary of State presents his respects to Mr. Murillo, and has the honor to inclose a copy of the instructions,* which were addressed on the 27th of September last to Peter J. Sullivan, esquire, United States minister at Bogota, in reference to the affair of the R. R. Cuyler.
